"To this day, historians have never been able to account for the sudden switch in the Texas delegation, but my former Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Clarence Cannon, told me why the switch took place. At that time he was Champ Clark's administrative assistant.

"Champ Clark called Clarence Cannon and told him to go to the office and get the Texas delegation file and bring it to Mr. Clark's home. Mr. Cannon got the file, which contained the names of all of the delegates, the members of their families and debtors, if any, and considerable confidential information about each delegate which could be used in talking to that particular delegate for his or her vote, along with certain other very confidential information.

"Mr. Cannon then proceeded to get on a streetcar in front of the Old House Office Building and upon reaching a certain point downtown, had to change streetcars. Inadvertently, he left the file on the seat.

"He immediately got off the streetcar and reported it to the police and to the transit company. After waiting for some time and after receiving a report from the transit company that no file was discovered on the streetcar, he then called Mr. Clark and advised him as to what had happened.

"The next morning Mr. Clark and his A.A., Clarence Cannon, returned to the Democratic national convention. Shortly after starting the first or second ballot on that day, with Mr. Clark still in the lead, the Texas delegation suddenly switched and voted for Woodrow Wilson. Several other states followed and this was the end of the road for Champ Clark.

"Mr. Cannon on more than one occasion told me this story, and each time he would hold his hands together at the end of the story, saying that he had let the Presidency of the United States slip between his fingers. He always believed that someone found the file and turned it over to the Texas delegation. This delegation, then becoming incensed at some of the contents of the file, switched."●

FRED RICHMOND

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, during the recess, our colleague from New York, Frederick W. Richmond, resigned from the House. Since his multifarious troubles has brought severe discredit, not only upon himself, but upon the House as an institution, it is clear to me that Fred did the right thing.

I have no firsthand knowledge of Fred Richmond's misdeeds but, from the various published reports and from the nature of his guilty plea, these misdeeds appear to have been criminal in nature and cannot be condoned. Mr. Richmond will now have to pay the penalty for what he described as "foolish" and "mistakes."

My purpose in taking the floor at this time is not, however, to castigate Mr. Richmond. Rather it is to put on the record briefly my own experience with Fred Richmond as a person and as a Member of Congress.

Before he came to the Congress I knew Fred as a public-spirited citizen of New York who was always responsive to appeals to his generosity, whether it was a public cause or a campaign by someone with whose views he sympathized.

The same thing was true after he was elected to Congress. For example, when I was approached to help raise funds for a major monument to the late Ralph Bunche opposite the U.N., I turned to Fred for help and he responded immediately by arranging for and hosting a fundraiser.

As a Congressman, he was a useful member of the Committee on Agriculture, having chosen that assignment as one where he could effectively represent the interests of consumers on a farmer-oriented committee. I frequently turned to Fred for advice on how to vote on an agricultural bill, especially one affecting the food stamp program.

When Ed Koch left the House, Fred became Secretary of the New York delegation. As such, he performed efficiently and cheerfully a host of mundane tasks, such as arranging for the delegation's meals together, sending out minutes, and so forth.

Perhaps Fred's greatest contribution as a Member of the House was as founder and first chairman of the Arts Caucus, an organization of which I was happy to be a rank-and-file member and which arranged for numerous constructive events and programs, most recently a nationwide high school arts contest, which has culminated in an exhibition of paintings by students from all over the country, now on display in the tunnel between the Capitol and the Cannon

Building. I was particularly impressed by this because I had had the same idea some years ago, had talked to a few people about it, but had not had the drive and determination to bring it to fruition.

Fred's leaving represents a loss to the work of the House.●

SEC. 3. AGREEMENTS WITHIN SCOPE OF ACT.

(a) This Act applies to agreements by or among ocean common carriers to—

(1) discuss, fix, and regulate rates, including through rates, cargo space accommodations, and other conditions of services;

(2) pool or apportion traffic, revenues, net losses, or net profits;

(3) allot ports or restrict or otherwise regulate the number and character of sailings between ports;

(4) limit or regulate the volume or character of cargo or passenger traffic to be carried;

(5) engage in exclusive, preferential, or cooperative working arrangements among themselves or with one or more marine terminal operators or non-vessel-operating common carrier; and

(6) enter into other agreements to control, regulate, or prevent competition among themselves.

(b) This Act does not apply to an acquisition by any person, directly or indirectly, of any voting security or assets of any other person.

SEC. 4. AGREEMENTS.

(a) FILING REQUIREMENTS.—A true copy of every agreement entered into with respect to an activity described in section 3 shall be filed with the Commission, except agreements related to transportation to be performed within or between foreign countries. In the case of an oral agreement, complete memorandum specifying in detail the substance of the agreement shall be filed. The Commission may by regulation prescribe the form and manner in which agreements shall be filed.

(b) COMMISSION ACTION.—The Commission shall within thirty days after filing reject any agreement that on its face fails to comply with this section. Unless an agreement has been rejected, the Commission shall, within thirty days of the filing of the agreement, transmit a notice of its filing to the Federal Register for publication.

(c) CONFERENCE AGREEMENTS.—Each conference agreement must—

(1) provide for the admission to conference membership of any carrier operating vessels willing to serve the particular trade or route;

(2) permit any member to withdraw from conference membership upon reasonable notice without penalty; and

(3) provide for retaining the services of an independent neutral body to police fully the obligations of the conference and its members.

(d) CONFERENCES UTILIZING LOYALTY CONTRACTS.—

(1) Each conference agreement must provide that, if the conference has in effect a loyalty contract with one or more shippers, each member of the conference may take independent action on any rate or service item required to be filed under section 8 whenever—

(A) a member requests the conference to amend a rate or service item and announces its intention to take independent action if the conference does not agree to the amendment;

(B) the conference fails to make the proposed amendment within thirty days after the first consideration of the amendment in a conference meeting; and

(C) the member seeking the amendment requests the conference to include in the conference tariff a separate entry for its account as proposed in the amendment.

(2) The agreement must further provide that, if the requirements of paragraph (1) are met, the conference shall include the proposed amendment in its tariff for use by any member of the conference and that the amendment shall become effective on publication and filing, but no later than forty-five days after the initial request.

(e) INTERCONFERENCE AGREEMENTS.—Each agreement between carriers not members of the same conference must provide the right of independent action for each carrier. Each agreement between conferences serving different trades that would otherwise be naturally competitive must provide the right of independent action for each conference.

(f) ASSESSMENT AGREEMENTS.—

(1) Assessment agreements shall be filed with the Commission and shall be deemed approved upon filing. The Commission shall thereafter, upon complaint filed within two years of the date of filing of the agreement, disapprove, cancel, or modify any such agreement, or charge or assessment pursuant thereto, that it finds, after notice and hearing, to be unjustly discriminatory or unfair as between carriers, shippers, or ports. The Commission shall issue its final decision in any such proceeding within one year of the date of filing of the complaint. To the extent that an assessment or charge is found in the proceeding to be unjustly discriminatory or unfair as between carriers, shippers, or ports, the Commission shall remedy the unjust discrimination or unfairness for the period of time between the filing of the complaint and the final decision by means of assessment adjustments. These adjustments shall be implemented by prospective credits or debits to future assessments or charges, except in the case of a complainant who has ceased activities subject to the assessment or charge, in which case reparation may be awarded. To the extent that any provision of this paragraph conflicts with the language of any other section of this Act, the Shipping Act, 1916, or the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, the provisions of this paragraph shall control.

(2) This Act, the Shipping Act, 1916, and the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, do not apply to maritime labor agreements. This section does not exempt from the provisions of this Act, the Shipping Act, 1916, or the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, any rates, charges, regulations, or practices of a common carrier that are required to be set forth in a tariff, whether or not such rates, charges, regulations, or practices arise out of, or are otherwise related to, a maritime labor agreement.

SEC. 5. ACTION ON AGREEMENTS.

(a) EFFECTIVE DATE.—Except with respect to assessment agreements, each agreement entered into with respect to an activity described in section 3 shall become effective forty-five days after filing unless the Commission rejects the agreement under section 4(b), or suspends the effective date of the agreement under subsection (i).

(b) STANDARD.—The Commission shall by order disapprove or modify any agreement that it finds will operate in violation of this Act; but in the case of any agreement filed under section 4(a) that is a renewal of an agreement previously in effect under this section or section 20(d), there shall be a presumption that the conduct contemplated under the agreement so filed will not be in violation of section 10(a).

(c) INVESTIGATION.—The Commission may, at any time after an agreement has been filed, institute an investigation and conduct a hearing under section 11 to determine if the agreement complies with this Act and, if not, whether the agreement should be disapproved, canceled, or modified. Each agreement that is in effect at the time it is the subject of an investigation and hearing shall remain in effect during the investigation and hearing.

(d) FINAL DECISION TIME.—The Commission shall issue a final decision in each hearing under subsection (c) within one hundred and eighty days of ordering the hearing.

(e) DELAY.—If, within the time period specified in subsection (d), the Commission determines that it is unable to issue a final order because of undue delays, the Commission may make a decision in the proceeding adverse to the delaying party on the basis of the delay, or in the case of undue delay caused by a proponent of an agreement, alternatively, toll the period specified in subsection (d) for the period of delay.

(f) BURDEN OF PROOF.—The burden of proof in any proceeding under this section or under section 4(f)(1) is on the party opposing the agreement, including the Commission.

(g) DURATION OF EFFECTIVENESS.—Each agreement, once in effect, shall remain in effect until withdrawn or until disapproved, canceled, or modified by the Commission. The Commission may not limit the effectiveness of an agreement to a fixed term.

(h) COMPLIANCE WITH SUBPENA OR DISCOVERY.—In any proceeding under this section, the Commission may disapprove an agreement for failure of a proponent of the agreement to comply with a subpena or discovery order lawfully issued by the Commission.

(i) SUSPENSION.—At any time before the expiration of the forty-five-day period referred to in subsection (a), the Commission, upon complaint of a common carrier, shipper, or marine terminal operator, or upon its own motion, may upon notice suspend the effective date of an agreement pending the outcome of a proceeding under section 11, if the Commission, after preliminary investigation, believes that there are unresolved issues of fact, which, if determined adversely to the party or parties filing the agreement, will result in a finding that the agreement is in violation of this Act, and either

(1) there is a reasonable probability that upon further investigation the Commission would find that the agreement will operate in violation of this Act; or

(2) a shipper, common carrier, or marine terminal operator is likely to be substantially injured if the agreement is allowed to go into effect before a final decision on the merits.

The effective date of an agreement may not be suspended under this subsection for a period exceeding ninety days unless the Commission, before the expiration of that period, believes that an extension of such period by not more than ninety additional days is required to resolve the outstanding issues.

SEC. 6. LOYALTY CONTRACTS.

(a) CONTRACT REQUIREMENTS.—Ocean common carriers and conferences engaged in foreign commerce may utilize loyalty contracts, if—

(1) the contract is available to all shippers on equal terms and conditions;

(2) the contract shipper is permitted prompt release from the contract with respect to any shipment or shipments for which the contracting carrier or conference cannot provide space as requested on reasonable notice by the shipper;

(3) the contract covers only those goods of the contract shipper as to the shipment of which it has the legal right at the time of shipment to select the carrier;

(4) the contract shipper, carrier, and conference are permitted on ninety days' notice to terminate, without penalty, the contract rate system in whole or with respect to any commodity;

(5) the contract excludes bulk cargo (except liquid bulk cargoes, other than chemicals, in less than full shipload lots) and forest products;

(6) the contract provides that whenever a rate for the carriage of goods under the contract becomes effective insofar as it is under the control of the carrier or conference, the rate—

(A) may not be increased on less than ninety days' notice, except upon the agreement of the applicable shipper; and

(B) may be increased on not less than thirty days' notice if the increase is to a level no higher than that from which the particular rate was reduced within one hundred eighty days immediately preceding the filing of the increase; and

(7) the contract shipper is not denied the right to utilize competing services that involve loading to or from a vessel at a port or ports located beyond a carrier's or conference's geographic scope as defined in the contract; and

(8) the contract provides for a spread or series of spreads between tariff rates and rates charged contract shippers that shall not exceed an aggregate of 15 percent.

(b) INTERMODAL LOYALTY CONTRACT.—Each conference that offers an intermodal loyalty contract must offer an alternative all-ocean carrier loyalty contract. A shipper may not be penalized nor shall an action for breach of contract lie if a shipper elects one of the alternative loyalty agreements for the other for any shipment moving through the exit or entry ports that are the subject of the contract.

(c) TREATMENT OF CONTRACT NOT IN CONFORMITY.—The utilization of a loyalty contract that does not conform with each of the requirements of this section is a violation of this Act.

SEC. 7. EXEMPTION FROM ANTITRUST LAWS.

(a) The antitrust laws do not apply to—

(1) any agreement that has been filed under section 4 and has become effective under section 4(f) or section 5, or is exempt under section 16 from any requirement of this Act;

(2) any activity or agreement within the scope of this Act, whether permitted under or prohibited by this Act undertaken or entered into in the reasonable belief that (A) it is pursuant to an agreement on file with the Commission and in effect when the activity took place, or (B) it is exempt under section 16 from any filing requirement of this Act;

(3) any loyalty contract or any activity pursuant to a loyalty contract;

(4) any agreement or activity that relates to transportation services within or between foreign countries, whether or not via the United States;

(5) any agreement or activity with a shipper's council organized under the laws of a foreign country and operating exclusively outside the United States, including an agreement or activity that affects cargo transported in a United States import or export trade;

(6) any agreement or activity to provide or furnish wharfage, dock, warehouse, or other terminal facilities outside the United States; and

(7) subject to section 19(e)(2), any agreement, modification, or cancellation approved by the Commission before the effective date of this Act under section 15 of the Shipping Act, 1916, or permitted under section 14(b) thereof, and any duly filed and published tariff rate, fare, or charge, or classification, rule, or regulation explanatory thereof implementing that agreement, modification, or cancellation.

(b) This Act does not extend antitrust immunity to any agreement with or among air carriers, rail carriers, motor carriers, or common carriers by water not subject to this Act with respect to transportation within the United States; or to any discussion or agreement among common carriers that are subject to this Act fixing the inland divisions as opposed to the inland portions of through rates within the United States.

(c)(1) Any determination by any agency or court that results in the denial or removal of the immunity to the antitrust laws set forth in subsection (a) shall not remove or alter the antitrust immunity for the period before the determination.

(2) No person may recover damages under section 4 of the Clayton Act, or obtain injunctive relief under section 16 of the Clayton Act, for conduct which is prohibited by this Act.

(d) Any shippers' council organized under the laws of the United States may apply to the Attorney General for certification that the conduct of the council in bargaining with ocean common carriers on the terms and conditions of service is not likely to result in a violation of the antitrust laws. The Attorney General shall grant the application for certification under the same conditions and limitations applicable to an application for antitrust certification of solely export conduct; except that the activities of the shippers' council in bargaining with ocean common carriers on the terms and conditions of service regarding cargo in import trade shall be eligible for the protection of such certification on the same terms and conditions that are made available for similar activities for service on cargo in export trade.

SEC. 8. TARIFFS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—

(1) Except with regard to bulk cargo and forest products, each common carrier and conference shall file with the Commission, and keep open to public inspection, tariffs showing all its rates, charges, classifications, rules, and practices between all points or ports or its own route and on any through transportation route that has been established. However, common carriers shall not be required to state separately or otherwise reveal in tariff filings the inland divisions of a through rate. Tariffs shall plainly indicate the places between which cargo will be carried; list each classification of cargo in use; set forth the level of freight forwarder compensation, if any, by a carrier or conference; state separately each terminal or other charge, privilege, or facility under the control of the carrier or conference and any rules or regulations that in any way change, affect, or determine any part or the aggregate of the rates or charges; and include sample copies of any loyalty contract, bill of lading, contract of affreightment, or other document evidencing the transportation agreement.

(2) Copies of tariffs shall be made available to any person, and a reasonable charge may be assessed for copies provided by the Commission.

(b) TIME-VOLUME RATES.—Rates quoted in tariffs may vary with the volume of cargo offered over a specified period of time.

(c) SERVICE CONTRACTS.—An ocean common carrier or conference may enter into a service contract with a shipper to provide specified services under specified rates and conditions, subject to the requirements of this Act. Each contract entered into under this subsection shall be filed confidentially with the Commission, and a concise statement of its essential terms shall be filed with the Commission and made available to the general public in tariff format, and such essential terms shall be available to all shippers similarly situated. The essential terms shall include—

(1) the origin and destination port ranges in the case of port-to-port movements, and the origin and destination geographic areas in the case of through intermodal movements;

(2) the commodity or commodities involved;

(3) the minimum volume;

(4) the line-haul rate;

(5) the duration;

(6) service commitments; and

(7) the liquidated damages for non-performance, if any.

The exclusive remedy for a breach of contract entered into under this subsection shall be an action in an appropriate court, unless the parties otherwise agree.

(d) RATES.—No new or initial rates or change in existing rates, which result in an increased cost to the shipper may become effective earlier than thirty days after filing with the Commission. The Commission, for good cause, may allow such new or initial rates and such changes to become effective in less than thirty days. Any change in the rates that results in a decreased cost to the shipper may become effective upon publication and filing with the Commission.

(e) REFUNDS.—The Commission may, upon application of a carrier or shipper, permit a common carrier or conference to refund a portion of freight charges collected from a shipper or to waive the collection of a portion of the charges from a shipper if—

(1) there is an error in a tariff of a clerical or administrative nature or an error due to inadvertence in failing to file a new tariff and the refund will not result in discrimination among shippers, ports, or carriers;

(2) the common carrier or conference has, prior to the filing of an application for authority to make a refund, filed a new tariff with the Commission that sets forth the rate on which the refund or waiver would be based;

(3) the common carrier or conference agrees that if permission is granted by the Commission, an appropriate notice will be published in the tariff, or such other steps taken as the Commission may require, which gives notice of the rate on which the refund or waiver would be based, and additional refunds or waivers as appropriate shall be made with respect to other shipments in the manner prescribed by the Commission in its order approving the application; and

(4) the application for refund or waiver is filed with the Commission within one hundred and eighty days from the date of shipment.

(f) FORM.—The Commission may by regulation prescribe the form and manner in which the tariffs required by this section shall be published and filed. The Commission may reject any tariff filed that is not in conformity with this section and its regulations. Upon rejection by the Commission, the tariff is void, and its use is unlawful.

SEC. 9. CONTROLLED CARRIERS.

(a) CONTROLLED CARRIER RATES.—No controlled carrier subject to this section shall maintain rates or charges in its tariffs filed with the Commission that are below a level that is just and reasonable, nor shall any such carrier establish or maintain unjust or unreasonable classifications, rules, or regulations in such tariffs. An unjust or unreasonable classification, rule, or regulation means one which results or is likely to result in the carriage or handling of cargo at rates or charges which are below a level which is just and reasonable. The Commission may, at any time after notice and hearing, disapprove any rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations which the controlled carrier has failed to demonstrate to be just and reasonable. In any proceeding under this subsection, the burden of proof shall be on the controlled carrier to demonstrate that its rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations are just and reasonable. Rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations filed by a controlled carrier that have been rejected, suspended, or disapproved by the Commission are void, and their use is unlawful.

(b) RATE STANDARDS.—For the purpose of this section, in determining whether rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations by a controlled carrier are just and reasonable, the Commission may take into account appropriate factors including, but not limited to, whether—

(1) the rates or charges which have been filed or which would result from the pertinent classifications, rules, or regulations are below a level which is fully compensatory to the controlled carrier based upon that carrier's actual costs or upon its constructive costs, which are hereby defined as the costs of another carrier, other than a controlled carrier, operating similar vessels and equipment in the same or a similar trade;

(2) the rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations are the same as or similar to those filed or assessed by other carriers in the same trade;

(3) the rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations are required to assure movement of particular cargo in the trade; or

(4) the rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations are required to maintain acceptable continuity, level, or quality of common carrier service to or from affected ports.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE OF RATES.—Notwithstanding the provisions of section 9(b), the rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations of controlled carriers shall not, without special permission of the Commission, become effective sooner than the thirtieth day after the date of filing with the Commission. Each controlled carrier shall, upon the request of the Commission, file, within twenty days of request (with respect to its existing or proposed rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations), a statement of justification that sufficiently details the controlled carrier's need and purpose for such rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations upon which the Commission may reasonably base its determination of the lawfulness thereof.

(d) DISAPPROVAL OF RATES.—Whenever the Commission is of the opinion that the rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations filed by a controlled carrier may be unjust and unreasonable, the Commission may issue an order to the controlled carrier to show cause why such rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations should not be disapproved. Pending a determination as to their lawfulness in such a proceeding, the Commission may suspend such rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations at any time before their effective date. In the case of rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations that have already become effective, the Commission may, upon the issuance of an order to show cause, suspend such rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations on not less than sixty days' notice to the controlled carrier. No period of suspension under this subsection may be greater than one hundred and eighty days. Whenever the Commission has suspended any rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations under this subsection, the affected carrier may file new rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations to take effect immediately during the suspension period in lieu of the suspended rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations—except that the Commission may reject such new rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations if it is of the opinion that they are unjust and unreasonable.

(e) PRESIDENTIAL REVIEW.—Concurrently with the publication thereof, the Commission shall transmit to the President any order of suspension or final order of disapproval of rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations of a controlled carrier subject to this section. Within ten days after the receipt or the effective date of such Commission order, the President may request the Commission in writing to stay the effect of the Commission's order if he finds that such stay is required for reasons of national defense or foreign policy which reasons shall be specified in the report. Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the Commission shall immediately grant such request by the issuance of an order in which the President's request shall be described. During any such stay, the President shall, whenever practicable, attempt to resolve the matter in controversy by negotiation with representatives of the applicable foreign governments.

(f) EXCEPTIONS.—The provisions of this section shall not apply to—

(1) any controlled carrier of a state whose vessels are entitled by a treaty of the United States to receive national or most-favored-nation treatment;

(2) any controlled carrier of a state which, on the effective date of this section, has subscribed to the statement of shipping policy contained in note 1 to annex A of the Code of Liberalization of Current Invisible Operations, adopted by the Council of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development;

(3) rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations of any controlled carrier in any particular trade which are covered by an agreement effective under section 4, other than an agreement in which all of the members are controlled carriers not otherwise excluded from the provisions of this subsection;

(4) rates, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations governing the transportation of cargo by a controlled carrier between the country by whose government it is owned or controlled, as defined herein and the United States;

(5) a trade served exclusively by controlled carriers; or

(6) any controlled carrier registered in a state which, on the effective date of this Act, is among those designated a beneficiary developing country for purposes of the generalized system of preferences, provided for in title V of the Trade Act of 1974 (88 Stat. 2066; 19 U.S.C 2461 et seq.), and set forth in general headnote 3(c) of the Tariff Schedules of the United States, and which has vessels registered within its jurisdiction that are privately owned and not operated by a controlled carrier.

SEC. 10. PROHIBITED ACTS.

(a)(1) Subject to paragraphs (2) and (3), no common carrier, directly or indirectly, may form a joint venture with other common carriers operating in the same trade if such conduct substantially reduces competition in such trade considered as a whole.

(2) Paragraph (1) shall not apply if such conduct—

(A) results in gains in efficiency or services that outweigh any diminution in competition;

(B) is required by an express provision of a government-to-government agreement; or

(C) is in furtherance of foreign policy interests of the United States which outweigh the interests of the United States in preventing the substantial reduction in competition.

(D) permits U.S.-flag carriers to carry cargo of the importing or exporting foreign state which would otherwise be unavailable to such carrier, or available only on unequal terms by reason of the cargo reservation laws or trading practices (governmental or otherwise) of such state, provided that such agreement is not unjustly discriminatory among U.S.-flag carriers.

(3) With respect to conduct by a common carrier that was undertaken in the reasonable belief that the conduct was consistent with an agreement that was in effect under section 5 or 20(d) at the time the conduct occurred—

(A) there shall be a presumption that such conduct is not in violation of this subsection; and

(B) the common carrier, if the Commission determines that such conduct is in violation of this subsection, shall not be liable for reparations under section 11(f), or for penalties under section 13(a) to the extent that such conduct was so undertaken.

(b) No common carrier, including a joint service or consortium operating as a single entity, either alone or in conjunction with any other person, directly or indirectly, may—

(1) charge, demand, collect, or receive greater, less, or different compensation for the transportation of property or for any service in connection therewith than the rates and charges which are specified in its tariffs;

(5) retaliate against any shipper by refusing, or threatening to refuse, cargo space accommodations, or resort to other unfair or unjustly discriminatory methods because the shipper has patronized another carrier, or has filed a complaint, or for any other reason;

(6) engage in any unfair or unjustly discriminatory practice in the matter of—

(A) rates

(B) cargo classifications;

(11) knowingly disclose, offer, solicit, or receive any information concerning the nature, kind, quantity, destination, consignee, or routing of any property tendered or delivered to a common carrier without the consent of the shipper or consignee if that information—

(A) may be used to the detriment or prejudice of the shipper or consignee;

(B) may improperly disclose its business transactions to a competitor; or

(C) may be used to the detriment or prejudice of any common carrier.

Nothing in paragraph (11) shall be construed to prevent providing such information, in response to any legal process, to the United States, or to any independent neutral body operating within the scope of its authority to fulfill the policing obligations of the parties to an agreement effective under this Act. Nor shall it be prohibited for any ocean common carrier which is a party to a conference agreement approved pursuant to this Act, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or employee of such carrier or person, or any other person authorized by such carrier to receive information, to give information to the conference or any person, firm, corporation, or agency designated by the conference, or to prevent the conference or its designee from soliciting or receiving information for the purpose of determining whether a shipper or consignee has breached an agreement with the conference or its member lines or for the purpose of determining whether a member of the conference has breached the conference agreement, or for the purpose of compiling statistics of cargo movement, but the use of such information for any other purpose prohibited by this Act or any other Act shall be prohibited.

(c) No person may—

(1) knowingly and willfully, directly or indirectly, by means of false billing, false classification, false weighing, false report of weight, false measurement, or by any other unjust or unfair device or means obtain or attempt to obtain ocean transportation for property at less than the rates or charges which would otherwise be applicable;

(2) operate under an agreement described in section 3 that has not become effective under section 5, or that has been rejected, disapproved, or canceled; or

(3) operate under an agreement described in section 3 except in accordance with any modifications made by the Commission to the agreement.

(d) No conference or group of two or more common carriers, other than a joint venture operating as a single entity, may—

(1) boycott or take any other concerted action resulting in a refusal to deal;

(2) utilize a device or means that sets conditions or otherwise restricts the ability of a shipper to select an ocean common carrier in a competing trade, an ocean tramp, or a bulk carrier;

(3) restrict the employment of intermodalism or other technological innovations by member carriers;

(4) permit any predatory practice designed to eliminate the participation, or deny the entry, in a particular trade of an ocean common carrier not a member of the conference, a group of common carriers, an ocean tramp, or a bulk carrier;

(5) negotiate with any nonocean carrier or group of nonocean carriers (for example, truck, rail, or air operators) on any matter relating to rates or services provided to ocean common carriers within the United States by such nonocean carriers: Provided, That this prohibition shall not prohibit the setting and publishing of a joint through rate by a conference, joint service, or an association of ocean common carriers authorized to file tariffs;

(6) concertedly deny in the export foreign commerce of the United States compensation to an ocean freight forwarder or limit the amount thereof to less than one and one-fourth per centum of the freight charges;

(7) except as otherwise required by the law of the United States or the importing or exporting country, or as agreed to by a shipper in a service contract, allocate shippers among specific carriers that are parties to that agreement or prohibit any carrier that is a party to the agreement from soliciting cargo from any particular shipper; or

(8) pool or apportion net losses or net profits with other common carriers operating in the same trade.

SEC. 11. COMPLAINTS, INVESTIGATIONS, REPORTS, AND REPARATIONS.

(a) FILING OF COMPLAINTS.—Any person may file with the Commission a sworn complaint alleging a violation of this Act and may seek reparation for any injury caused to the complainant by that violation.

(b) SATISFACTION OR INVESTIGATION OF COMPLAINTS.—The Commission shall furnish a copy of a complaint filed pursuant to section (a) of this section to the person named therein who shall, within a reasonable time specified by the Commission, satisfy the complaint or answer it in writing. If the complaint is not satisfied, the Commission shall investigate it in such manner and by such means and make such order as it deems proper.

(c) COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS.—The Commission upon its own motion may, in like manner and with the same powers, investigate any conduct which it believes may be in violation of this Act.

(d) SPECIAL INVESTIGATIONS OF CONDUCT PURSUANT TO POOLING AGREEMENTS.—(1) The Commission, upon its own motion or at the request of the Attorney General or the Federal Trade Commission, may initiate an investigation under this section of conduct pursuant to an agreement to pool or apportion traffic or revenues, or charter space with other common carriers operating in the same trade if it believes that conduct pursuant to the agreement substantially reduces competition in such trade.

(2) The Commission shall reject, modify, or terminate any agreement subject to investigation pursuant to paragraph (1) if it determines that conduct pursuant to the agreement substantially reduces competition in the trade concerned unless the agreement—

(A) results in gains in efficiency or services that outweigh any diminution in competition;

(B) is required by an express provision of a government-to-government agreement; or

(C) is in furtherance of foreign policy interests of the United States which outweigh the interests of the United States in preventing the substantial reduction in competition.

(D) permits U.S.-flag carriers to carry cargo of the importing or exporting foreign state which would otherwise be unavailable to such carrier, or available only on unequal terms by reason of the cargo reservation laws or trading practices (governmental or otherwise) of such state, provided that such agreement is not unjustly discriminatory among U.S.-flag carriers.

(3) The sole remedy under the Act for conduct found to violate paragraph (2) shall be rejection, termination, or modification of the agreement.

(e) REPORTS.—The Commission shall make a written report of every investigation made under this Act in which a hearing was held, which states its conclusions, decisions, findings of fact, and order. A copy of this report shall be furnished to all parties. The Commission shall publish each report for public information, and such authorized publication shall be competent evidence of those reports in all courts of the United States.

(f) REPARATIONS.—For any complaint filed within four years after the cause of action accrued, the Commission shall, upon petition of the complainant and after notice and hearing, direct payment of reparations to the complainant for actual injury (which, for purposes of this subsection, also includes the loss of interest from the date of injury) caused by a violation of this Act. Upon a showing that the injury was caused by activity that is prohibited by section 10(b) (5) or (7) or section 10(d) (1) or (4), or that violates section 10(c) (2) or (3), the Commission may direct the payment of additional amounts; but the total recovery of a complainant may not exceed twice the amount of the actual injury. In the case of injury caused by an activity that is prohibited by section 10(b)(6) (A) or (B), the amount of the injury shall be the difference between the rate paid by the injured shipper and the most favorable rate paid by another shipper.

(g) INJUNCTION.—

(1) In connection with any investigation conducted under this section, the Commission may bring suit in a district court of the United States to enjoin conduct in violation of this Act. Upon a showing that the Commission has reasonable cause to believe that a violation of this Act has or is about to take place, and that the enjoining of that conduct is in the interest of the public, and after notice to the defendant, the court may grant a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction for a period not to exceed ten days after the Commission has issued an order disposing of the issues under investigation. Any such suit shall be brought in the district in which the defendant person, partnership, or corporation resides or transacts business.

(2) After filing a complaint with the Commission under subsection (a), the complainant may file suit in a district court of the United States to enjoin conduct in violation of this Act. Upon a showing that standards for granting injunctive relief by courts of equity are met and after notice to the defendant, the court may grant a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction for a period not to exceed ten days after the Commission has issued an order disposing of the complaint. Any such suit shall be brought in the district in which the defendant person, partnership, or corporation has been sued by the Commission under paragraph (1); or, if no suit has been filed, in any district in which the defendant person, partnership, or corporation resides or transacts business.

SEC. 12. SUBPENAS AND DISCOVERY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—In investigations and adjudicatory proceedings under this Act—

(1) depositions, written interrogatories, and discovery procedures may be utilized by any party under rules and regulations issued by the Commission which rules and regulations, to the extent practicable, shall be in conformity with the rules applicable in civil proceedings in the district courts of the United States; and

(2) the Commission may by subpena compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, documents, and other evidence.

(b) WITNESS FEES.—Witnesses shall, unless otherwise prohibited by law, be entitled to the same fees and mileage as in the courts of the United States.

SEC. 13. PENALTIES.

(a) ASSESSMENT OF PENALTY.—Whoever violates any provision of this Act, or any regulation issued thereunder, or Commission order is liable to the United States for a civil penalty. The amount of the civil penalty, unless otherwise provided in this Act, may not exceed $5,000 for each violation unless the violation was willfully and knowingly committed, in which case the amount of the civil penalty may not exceed $25,000 for each violation. Each day of a continuing violation shall constitute a separate offense.

(b) TARIFF SUSPENSION.—

(1) For any violation of section 10(b)(1), (2), (3), (4), or (8), the Commission may suspend any or all tariffs of any common carrier, or that common carrier's right to use any or all tariffs of conferences of which it is a member, for a period not to exceed twelve months.

(2) For failure to supply information ordered to be produced or compelled by subpena under section 12, the Commission may, after notice and opportunity for hearing, suspend any or all tariffs of any common carrier, or that common carrier's right to use any or all tariffs of conferences of which it is a member.

(3) Any common carrier who accepts or handles cargo for carriage under a tariff that has been suspended or after its right to utilize that tariff has been suspended shall be subject to a civil penalty of not more than $50,000 for each shipment.

(4) If, in defense of its failure to comply with a subpena or discovery order, a common carrier alleges that documents or information located in a foreign country cannot be produced because of the laws of that country, the Commission shall immediately notify the Secretary of State of the failure to comply and of the allegation relating to foreign laws. Upon receiving the notification, the Secretary of State shall promptly consult with the government of the nation within which the documents or information are alleged to be located for the purpose of assisting the Commission in obtaining the documents or information sought.

(5) Before any tariff suspension ordered under this subsection becomes effective, it shall be immediately submitted to the President who may, within ten days after receiving it, disapprove the order if he finds that disapproval is required for reasons of the national defense or the foreign policy of the United States.

(c) ASSESSMENT PROCEDURE.—Every civil penalty provided for in this Act may be assessed by the Commission after notice and an opportunity for hearing. In determining the amount of the penalty, the Commission shall take into account the nature, circumstances, extent, and gravity of the violation committed and, with respect to the violator, the degree or culpability, history of prior offenses, ability to pay, and such other matters as justice may require. The Commission may compromise, modify, or remit, with or without conditions, any civil penalty which is subject to assessment under this section.

(d) REVIEW OF CIVIL PENALTY.—Any person against whom a civil penalty is assessed under this Act may obtain review thereof under chapter 158 of title 28, United States Code.

(e) FAILURE TO PAY ASSESSMENT.—If any person fails to pay an assessment of a civil penalty after it has become final or after the appropriate court has entered final judgment in favor of the Commission, the Commission shall seek to recover the amount assessed in any appropriate district court of the United States. In such action, the court shall enforce the Commission's order unless it finds that the order was not regularly made or duly issued.

(f) LIMITATIONS.—

(1) No fine or other punishment may be imposed for criminal conspiracy to violate any provision of this Act, or to defraud the Commission by concealment of any such violation.

(2) Any proceeding to assess a civil penalty under this section shall be commenced within five years from the date the violation occurred.

SEC. 14. COMMISSION ORDERS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Orders of the Commission relating to any violation of this Act or any regulation issued thereunder shall be made only after opportunity for hearing and upon sworn complaint or on its own motion. Each order of the Commission shall continue in force for the period of time specified in the order or until suspended, modified, or set aside by the Commission or a court of competent jurisdiction.

(b) REVERSAL OR SUSPENSION OF ORDERS.—The Commission may reverse, suspend, or modify any order made by it, and upon application of any party to a proceeding may grant a rehearing of the same or any matter determined therein. No rehearing shall, except by special order of the Commission, operate as a stay of such order.

(c) ENFORCEMENT OF NONREPARATION ORDERS.—In case of violation of any order of the Commission, or for failure to comply with a Commission subpena, the Commission, or any party injured by such violation, or the Attorney General may seek enforcement by any United States district court having jurisdiction over the parties. If after hearing, the court determines that the order was properly made and duly issued, it shall enforce the order by an appropriate injunction or other process, mandatory or otherwise.

(d) ENFORCEMENT OF REPARATION ORDER.—(1) In case of violation of any order of the Commission for the payment of reparation, the person to whom such award was made may seek enforcement of such order in any United States district court having jurisdiction of the parties.

(2) In any United States district court the findings and order of the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and the petitioner shall not be liable for costs, nor for the costs of any subsequent stage of the proceedings, unless they accrue upon his appeal. A petitioner in a United States district court who prevails shall be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee to be assessed and collected as part of the costs of the suit.

(3) All parties in whose favor the Commission has made an award of reparation by a single order may be joined as plaintiffs, and all other parties in such order may be joined as defendants, in a single suit in any district in which any one such plaintiff could maintain a suit against any one such defendant. Service of process against such defendant not found in that district may be made in any district in which is located any office of, or point of call on a regular route operated by, such defendant. Judgment may be entered in favor of any plaintiff against the defendant liable to that plaintiff.

(e) STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—Any action seeking enforcement of a Commission order shall be filed within four years after the date of the violation of the order.

(f) REPRESENTATION IN COURT.—Attorneys employed by the Commission shall, if the Commission so directs, appear for and represent the Commission in any case before a court of the United States or a State of the United States.

SEC. 15. REPORTS AND CERTIFICATES.

(a) REPORTS.—The Commission may require any common carrier, or any officer, receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or employee thereof, to file with it any periodical or special report or any account, record, rate, or charge, or memorandum of any facts and transactions appertaining to the business of that common carrier. The report, account, record, rate, charge, or memorandum shall be made under oath whenever the Commission so requires, and shall be furnished in the form and within the time prescribed by the Commission. Conference minutes required to be filed with the Commission under this section shall not be released to third parties or published by the Commission.

(b) CERTIFICATION.—The Commission shall require the chief executive officer of every common carrier and, to the extent it deems feasible, may require any shipper, consignor, consignee, or broker to file a periodic written certification made under oath with the Commission attesting to—

(1) a policy prohibiting the payment, solicitation, or receipt of any rebate that is unlawful under the provisions of this Act;

(2) the fact that this policy has been promulgated recently to each owner, officer, employee, and agent thereof;

(3) the details of the efforts made within the company or otherwise to prevent or correct illegal rebating; and

(4) a policy of full cooperation with the Commission in its efforts to end those illegal practices.

Failure to file a certification shall result in a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each day the violation continues.

SEC. 16. EXEMPTIONS.

The Commission, upon application or on its own motion, may by order or rule exempt for the future any specified activity or class of agreements subject to this Act from any requirement of this Act, if it finds that the exemption will not substantially impair effective regulation by the Commission and is not likely to result in any significant lessening of competition in any trade serving the United States in which ocean common carriers operate. The Commission may attach conditions to any exemption and may, by order, revoke any exemption. No order or rule of exemption or revocation of exemption may be issued unless opportunity for hearing has been afforded interested persons who, for purposes of this section, include the departments and agencies of the United States.

SEC. 17. REGULATIONS.

The Commission may promulgate rules and regulations as necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 18. COMMISSION ON THE DEREGULATION OF INTERNATIONAL OCEAN SHIPPING.

The membership of the Commission shall be selected in such a manner as to be broadly representative of the various interests, needs, and concerns which may be affected by deregulation of international shipping.

(6) The first meeting of the Commission shall be called by the President no later than thirty days after the beginning of the first fiscal year occurring after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(7) The term of office for members shall be for the term of the Commission.

(8) A vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, and shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(9) Twelve members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum (but a lesser number may hold hearings).

(10) The Commission shall select a vice chairman from among its members.

(b) COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION.—(1) Officials of the United States Government and Members of Congress who are members of the Commission shall serve without compensation in addition to that received for their services as officials and Members, but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission.

Such statements shall be available for public inspection at the Commission's offices.

(c) COMMISSION FUNCTIONS.—The Commission shall conduct a comprehensive study of, and make recommendations concerning, the deregulation of international ocean shipping by common carriers. Such comprehensive study shall specifically address—

(1) various options for deregulation of the international ocean shipping industry, with reference to their ability to promote an efficient, stable, and competitive United States common carrier fleet;

(2) the opportunities for harmonizing United States policy toward international ocean shipping with the policies of our major trading partners;

(3) the system for determining tariffs based on the classification of goods and its role in a future deregulated industry; including the most effective method for eliminating unnecessary cargo classifications as a basis for establishing tariffs and the feasibility of establishing a single tariff by each conference or common carrier for all cargoes shipped in units of comparable size, weight, and handling characteristics.

(4) the role of the antitrust laws in the international shipping industry and their impact upon our relations with foreign nations;

(5) the impact of the "rules of competition" being considered by our trading partners and their relationship to the trend in the developing world towards structured cartelization;

(6) the impact deregulation may have on the growth of State-owned or State-controlled merchant fleets;

(7) the size of the United States liner fleet, by number and cargo capacity, which each of the deregulation options may produce; and

(d) POWERS OF THE COMMISSION.—The Commission or, on the authorization of the Commission, any subcommittee thereof, may, for the purpose of carrying out its functions, hold such hearings and sit and act at such times and places, administer such oaths, and require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses, and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as the Commission or such subcommittee may deem advisable. Subpenas may be issued to any person within the jurisdiction of the United States courts, under the signature of the chairman or vice chairman, or any duly designated member, and may be served by any person designated by the chairman, the vice chairman, or such member. (2) For purposes of sections 552, 552a and 552b of title 5, United States Code, the Commission shall not be considered to be an "agency", as such term is defined in sections 551(1) and 552(e) of such title 5. (4) Subject to such rules and regulations as may be adopted by the Commission, the chairman shall have the power to—

(A) appoint and fix the compensation of an executive director, and such additional staff personnel as he deems necessary, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, but at rates not in excess of the maximum rate for GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title, and

(3) annual and sick leave, and

(4) the Travel Expense Act of 1949, as amended (5 U.S.C. 835-842).

(6) The Chairman may rent office space for the Commission, may utilize the services and facilities of other Federal agencies with or without reimbursement, may accept voluntary services notwithstanding the provisions of section 3679(b) of the Revised Statutes (31 U.S.C. 665(b)), may accept, hold and administer gifts from non-governmental sources and transfers of funds from other Federal agencies, and may enter into contracts with any public or private person or entity for reports, research or surveys in furtherance of the work of the Commission.

Any formal recommendation made by the Commission to the President and to the Congress must have the majority vote of the Commission present and voting.

SEC. 4. (a) There is hereby established the Coastal State Maritime Search and Rescue Grant Program, to be funded from sums paid into the Fund during the prior fiscal year and available for obligation pursuant to subsection 3(c)(2), for the purposes of promoting, establishing and maintaining coastal state and local government maritime search and rescue program operations. SENATE—Thursday, September 9, 1982

(Legislative day of Wednesday, September 8, 1982)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Our prayer this morning will be offered by the Reverend Thomas W. Evans, Minister, St. John's United Methodist Church, Springfield, Va. He is sponsored by the distinguished Senator from Virginia, Senator JOHN WARNER.

PRAYER

The Reverend Thomas W. Evans, Th. D., offered the following prayer:

Please pray with me.

Almighty God, our Father, Creator of all the Earth. We thank You for this new day of life. We ask Your blessings upon the President, his Cabinet, the Senate and the House. May each person have an open honest mind, pure intentions, and sound speech. Help us to rise above self-seeking and party zeal to the deeper concerns and needs of the people.

May we hear Your word again (II Chronicle 7: 14), "If My people who are called by My name, humble themselves and pray, and seek My face, and turn from their wicked ways, then I will * * * forgive their sins and heal their land." Help us to know (Psalm 127), "Unless You build * * * our labor is in vain. Unless You watch over the city (and nation) we watch in vain. It is in vain that we rise up early and go to rest late, eating the bread of anxious toil."

O God, we know that You are the Supreme Ruler over all nations, and only through You can we find peace. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

COMMENDATION OF THE GUEST CHAPLAIN

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I commend the guest Chaplain, and the distinguished Senator from Virginia for bringing him to us today, especially on the thought and content of his morning prayer.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

WISHES FOR A SPEEDY RECOVERY FOR BABY GARN

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, our colleagues might wish to know that last evening in an unfortunate accident, the young 3-month-old baby of Senator and Mrs. Jake Garn fell and suffered a fractured skull.

The baby is expected to be all right, but I am sure all Members will join with me in wishing Senator and Mrs. Garn a speedy and complete recovery for their young child.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the time allocated to the two leaders under the standing order there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business which, as previously ordered, will extend not past the hour of 12 noon, in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

At 12 noon the Senate will stand in recess until 1:50 p.m. in order to accommodate the requirement of Members to attend to duties off the floor of the Senate in the nature of caucus activity.

Mr. President, at 1:50 p.m. the Senate will reconvene and will resume consideration of House Joint Resolution 520, the debt limit bill, at which time the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) will be recognized under the previous order.

At 2 p.m. the vote on cloture against further debate on the Helms second-degree amendment will occur under the provisions of rule XXII. The mandatory quorum call under that rule has been waived.

Mr. President, it is anticipated that the Senate will continue in session until the usual and regular hour of recess today, which means perhaps 6 p.m.

Mr. President, I shall have a further announcement to make about the schedule of the Senate sometime early this afternoon, particularly in respect to further debate on the measure at hand, that is to say the debt limit bill and the several amendments thereto.

The schedule, of course, will depend in large measure on whether cloture succeeds or fails in the 2 p.m. vote today.

Mr. President, I have no further need for my time. I am prepared to yield any time I have remaining under the standing order to any Senator but first let me offer it to the minority leader, if I may.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I am glad to accept the time offered by the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. NICKLES). The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to Mr. JACKSON such time as he may wish.

DEPUTY SECRETARY OF ENERGY RECEIVES ENGINEERING AWARD

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, it is important that we be able to attract to and keep people of outstanding qualifications in the highest positions in executive branch agencies. Our ability to manage the difficult problems which our Nation confronts in many areas is only as good as the people who make the policy decisions.

In that regard, I believe that we have as the Deputy Secretary of Energy a man who brings extraordinary management and engineering skill to the job. I have personally known W. Kenneth Davis for many years and can attest to his professional abilities. He also is a man of admirable character.

Mr. Davis was selected in August by the American Association of Engineering Societies (AAES) as the recipient of its National Engineering Award. The award will be presented on September 15. The AAES is an affilitation of virtually all of the national engineering organizations with a membership totalling nearly 1 million men and women from engineering professions. Thus, the AAES recognition of Mr. Davis with this prestigious award provides great recognition of his preeminence in the field of engineering.

If this were the only award that Ken Davis had ever received, it would still be noteworthy. However, he has received many other national awards from engineering and technical associations and has been elected to both the National Academy of Sciences and the National Academy of Engineering. His activities as an engineer and manager have served the Nation exceedingly well. I, therefore, take great pleasure in calling to my colleagues' attention this high honor bestowed upon Ken Davis by the AAES.

I thank the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator is welcome.

Does Mr. PROXMIRE or Mr. STENNIS wish to have me yield some time to them?

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, may I ask the leader to repeat his inquiry?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Does the Senator wish me to yield some of my time to him?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes. I appreciate that, and I wish to have 10 minutes, frankly, at a convenient time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

I yield 10 minutes to Mr. STENNIS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. STENNIS. I certainly thank the minority leader.

MILITARY SUPERIORITY

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, we will be taking up the military appropriations bill in time. I do not know just when. But it is of the utmost importance.

I am not today pushing for any particular action at any particular time. But I do notice repeated statements in the press and by the columnists, made in good faith I am sure, about the expenditure of too much money with reference to our military budget.

There are also statements that tend to downgrade our military preparedness, and, by comparison, rate us as second best to the Soviets. As a background I want to challenge this morning suggestions that tend too far in that direction.

Mr. President, on the eve of beginning consideration of the fiscal year 1983 defense appropriations bill, I rise to disagree with those who would make America a second-rate military power. Out in the country there are those who would charge that America has frittered away its military superiority, thrown away its prowess and now stands naked and afraid before a giant Russian bear. This is dangerous nonsense. It undermines the confidence of the American people and weakens their support for the defense budget. Furthermore it denigrates those who wear the uniform and are responsible for fielding the effective military forces that protect our country and our interests worldwide. What we need instead of this rhetoric aimed at creating fear and even panic, is a day-to-day, year-to-year dedication to keeping our military strength modern, lean, well disciplined, and at the ready.

In this time of tight budgets and competing demands for funds, we must reexamine our military posture and rededicate ourselves to military preparedness. There are no loose dollars to be thrown away now, but we must continue to maintain a strong but frugal military preparedness even in the face of economic difficulties. A few years ago, in better economic times, there were those who called for more money for defense. Now, when the going gets tougher, some of those same people are calling for large cuts in defense spending. Some reductions have already been made and agreed to by the President. We are already within a few percentage points of the defense spending outlined in the last budget submitted by President Carter. But the country needs to maintain its military strength through thick and thin. That means we must maintain the consensus for defense spending that was achieved just a few years ago. For my part, I will bend my efforts to this purpose.

Now the President has said that the Russians have caught up with us in one important, but limited field—strategic nuclear weapons. It may be that in this nuclear field no country can achieve military superiority again the way the United States had clear superiority when we had nuclear weapons and the Russians did not. Through no fault of ours, we no longer have the luxury of sole possession of these weapons. That does not mean the United States cannot carry out its missions and deter the Russians in this field. What it means is that we must take the steps needed to make sure that we modernize and keep our guard up in that field. That is why I have long supported the MX intercontinental missile, the B-1 and other manned bombers, the Trident submarines and missiles and the whole new families of cruise missile and Stealth technology.

But to extend this nuclear problem to a statement of general American military weakness—as some have tried—is misleading and false. America is not a weak and threatened second-rate power and statements to that effect are damaging.

Let me point out with emphasis, Mr. President, that should those statements of our inferiority, our being second rate, be true then they should become the basis for immediate action by the Government—a call up of the National Guard and Reserve, immediate induction of young people under a fair Selective Service System, immediate halt in the retirement or sale of ships, aircraft, nuclear missiles and bombers that still have useful life in them, increased alert of our bomber, submarine and missile forces, putting more of the fleet to sea, vastly stepped-up maneuvers, training and readiness in general, return of the 350,000 women and children dependents of military personnel overseas, mobilization of industrial production and emergency supplemental increases in the military budget.

No military leader has recommended these actions; no responsible civilian official has recommended these actions; President Reagan has not recommended these actions. In fact, in June of 1982, the President endorsed some reductions in the military budget as part of a program to help the economy.

But if the statements about U.S. military inferiority are false, they should be denounced as harmful and dangerous political rhetoric. These statements encourage enemies such as the Russians and could lead to miscalculation by them. Russian miscalculations could cost thousands or even millions of lives if they mistakenly sought a war. Such statements also discourage our allies and make them less willing to follow our lead. Finally, such statements, which prey on fear, discourage and confuse the American people, and in the end weaken the consensus for a strong defense by making it appear hopeless.

There is no doubt in the Russian mind that U.S. military power is not to be trifled with. They have not moved against it and we must insure that they do not try. This is called deterrence, and it is a strong military posture that makes it effective.

Now, Mr. President, a great deal of the money I have supported, some of which I have taken a lead in over the years, is for weaponry that I look upon as purely for deterrence, and I think it has been effective that way. If we did not have it we would be faced with a much more dangerous situation and could have been the subject of attack. So this word "deterrence" is not something to be pitched around. I believe the President of the United States, as he seeks these agreements that can be enforced and checked on, must have this arsenal at his command to use as an effective deterrent as he approaches—and God help him proceed—a satisfactory settlement of some kind which will at least be a beginning in this field.

There is no doubt in the minds of all our top military leaders who have testified that they would not for one instant trade U.S. military forces today for those of the Russians—or anybody else.

There is no doubt in the mind of our Air Force Chief of Staff when he said on May 19, 1982,

> I have been associated with the air forces of other nations; there are none better, believe me, than the U.S. Air Force.

That is the man responsible for all our nuclear ICBM's and bombers as well as our fighter and attack aircraft who is speaking.

There was no doubt in the mind of our Chief of Naval Operations on May 19, 1982, when he testified about the American "blue chips of superiority." To the question, "What are the Russians afraid of?" he answered,

> Our superior tactical air at sea is number one * * *. Our superior SSN submarines are better—probably 5 to 8 years in technology * * *. We have a superior cruise missile which the Soviets cannot emulate * * *. We have an amphibious force that they cannot match * * *. Weapons systems individually in my judgment, are superior to the individual weapons systems in Soviet combatants.

There could have been no doubt in the minds of the Israel crews of American-made aircraft, missiles and guns in Lebanon as to their ability to knock out Russian-made aircraft, missiles and tanks. In air-to-air battles, 88 Russian-made aircraft reportedly went down while 1 American-made aircraft was lost. Twenty Russian-made missile batteries were claimed with no American-made aircraft lost. Some 400 Russian-made tanks reportedly were destroyed by American-made guns. These are remarkable statistics on military performance using U.S.-made equipment used in actual combat within the last 4 or 5 months.

These are matters that our military have claimed a superiority in, that they have great faith in, that they, the engineers, and the taxpayers backed by paying the bill, and it paid off in such a magnificent way so far as a test for the weaponry was concerned, an overwhelming victory, and the physical demonstration there that could not be had otherwise.

I can relate here, Mr. President, the great number of new weapons that we have. I am not trying to portray a show here. I am not trying to frighten anyone on the other side, so to speak. I am not trying to push around anybody on this floor who may oppose some elements of these appropriation items that are coming up in due time in this bill. But I do want to say that I know we are up against a practical matter here with regard to military weaponry until we find our way along a better road, a better route, with reference to arms limitation agreements. Until we find solid agreements that can be given surveillance and can be checked on, then we must not be guessing, we must not be second-best, we must not take chances.

There is no doubt in my mind that militarily the United States can do today what we need to do to protect our people and safeguard our interests. This fact is no accident and comes from the groundwork laid in past years. It must be kept that way and actions are already underway for that purpose.

Whole families of new long-range, high-accurate cruise missiles are now coming off the production lines.

New powerful Trident submarines and Trident I missiles are being deployed as fast as they can be built.

Two brandnew ballistic missiles—the MX and Trident II—are being developed as rapidly as practical.

Two new strategic bombers—the B–1 and highly classified Stealth bombers are being developed as rapidly as prudence allows.

A whole new family of the best tactical fighter aircraft in the world—F–14's, F–15's, F–16's, F–18's, A–10's—have been and still are rolling off the production lines into the air squadrons.

A whole new generation of Army and Marine Corps ground equipment—tanks, helicopters, cannon, fighting vehicles, trucks, missiles, radios, and all the rest—have been and are coming off the production lines into troop units.

Brandnew, larger and more capable fighting ships—Aegis cruisers, attack submarines, fast frigates, aircraft carriers, and amphibious ships, over 93 ships altogether—have been funded in previous years and are in various stages of completion with new deliveries coming all the time. More new ships are funded in this year's budget.

These results do not come from naive expectations, sweeping rhetoric or scare tactics. What is needed is a steadiness of purpose to field a strong military. Neither alarmism nor complacency serve that purpose.

For years, my watchwords for fielding a military program that is second to none have been the same: Preparedenss; deterrence; discipline; frugality. These watchwords, combined with plain hard work, have successfully shepherded the laws and the money needed for a strong American defense through the entire legislative process, authorization bills, appropriations bills, and joint conference with the House.

This bill does look large. It has not been but a few years though where we had to start rebuilding from the ground up following that most unfortunate of all conflicts in Vietnam. With the advancement of science in many fields, new and additional weaponry of the most expensive kind had to be supplied and many times on quick order.

I can say this, Mr. President, that with all our experiences in weaponry there are many cases of research and development where that process itself proves not to be an inferior weapons system but it proves the insufficiency of certain concepts where many millions of dollars are spent and the process is laid aside and is not proceeded with further.

This is a field now where weaponry is so expensive, so very greatly increased in costs that mount by leaps and bounds that no nation can keep on paying the bill if we proceed in a reckless way, if we recklessly buy items that are not needed, that are not worthy and are not necessary.

I very rigidly apply every rule I know of savings and frugality and its proper accent.

There were and will be many difficult times with challenges coming from many sides against key elements of the defense program. The B–1 bomber, aircraft carriers, Army tanks, troops in NATO, selective service, and many other items have all been subject to sharp challenge and debate. For the B–1 bomber alone, I voted at least 12 times on the Senate floor in favor of this bomber. Many of these debates have been a red-hot test of legislative skill, experience and stamina—some lasting for 7 weeks on the Senate floor and others going around the clock. In May 1982, the Defense authorization bill alone required 2 weeks of debate, including a final 21-hour around the-clock session.

It takes a steady purpose and resolve to provide for the common defense. The list of legislative battles is longmarked mostly by success. Between 1969 and 1981, over 50 new major weapons systems were first authorized or delivered to the combat forces—ships, tanks, aircraft and missiles—and many provoked controversy. During the same period, many major and controversial military policy questions arose. These included selective service, overseas troop deployments, the War Powers Act, military unionization, National Guard and Reserve support, draft registration, military justice and discipline, recruit quality, special pay for specially trained personnel, and limits on the number of generals and admirals.

One small illustration of how steadiness of purpose and resolve paid off for preparedness is the case of the nuclear-powered aircraft carrier. In 1978, after extensive hearings and testimony by the Navy, I proposed an amendment in committee that added funds for another large Nimitz-class aircraft carrier. This ship was not in the budget request, but the committee agreed it was needed by the Navy and recommended it to the Senate. After vigorous debate, the Senate adopted the amendment. Despite opposition by the executive branch, the ship was also approved by the joint House-Senate conference committee and sent to the President. President Carter chose to veto the bill and sent it back unsigned to Congress. The Armed Service Committee mobilized to try to override the veto in the Senate, but the House had to act first and it failed to override the veto. When this occurred, there was nothing else to do but move ahead the other parts of the military preparedness program. However, within 6 months of this debate, the administration budget request included a medium sized aircraft carrier. The Senate Armed Services Committee again recommended a large carrier and in 1979 Congress authorized and appropriated funds for a new nuclear powered Nimitz-class carrier. The keel for this ship was laid in October 1981. Construction is now 27 percent complete. It has been named the U.S.S. Theodore Roosevelt and will be launched in 1984 and delivered to the fleet in 1986. This illustrates how a real fleet is built. It is steady purpose and hard work that pays off—not sweeping rhetoric that plays on fear.

Another illustration is the magnificant work done a few years ago by Gen. Louis Wilson, previous Commandant of the Marine Corps, in restoring the firm discipline and high quality needed for a first rate combat force. It took day to day steadiness of purpose and determined effort to weed out the troublemakers, instill discipline and restore the morale and esprit that so typified the U.S. Marine Corps today all over the world, including in the troubled city of Beirut.

In conclusion, war and the military preparedness to deter it are not child's play. Experience, judgment and steady purpose through thick and thin is what is needed to see a strong military program through the legislative process. The watchwords of preparedness, deterrence, discipline, and frugality have served this country well in the past and are even more necessary in the difficult years ahead.

But let us be thankful, Mr. President, that we have the ability, we have the wherewithal, and we so far are able, within sound financing, to pay the bill. We are not going to be caught napping. This is our insurance. And within the lines of this protection, I believe, in time we will be going into a great new era of expanded production, expanded wealth, you might call it, and an expanded economy of the soundest kind and the best system of government in the world.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, are we in morning business at the present time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 4 minutes of the Democratic leader's time remaining.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the leader's time be set aside so that we can move into morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 12 o'clock noon with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

HOW TO MAKE THE REALITY OF NUCLEAR WAR EVIDENT TO THE HAND THAT CAN PUSH THE BUTTON

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, all of us are now aware of the terrible possibility that sometime in the next 20 or 25 years, maybe at noon today, maybe at 3 o'clock tomorrow morning, maybe 20 years from now, a nuclear war might start and involve the superpowers. Either a President of the Soviet Union or a President of the United States could launch such a catastrophe.

This nightmare haunts all of us. When a single human being possesses this awesome power to virtually destroy our world, what could set him off? What could provoke an American or Soviet President to push the button? More important, what could restrain him, give him second thoughts, stop him from making such a devastating reaction? Some of the top experts on human behavior and international affairs have recently discussed how we might require a President to have long seconds thoughts before he precipitated the nightmare that haunts all of us.

The New York Times on Tuesday reported on all of this and included a shocking suggestion by Roger Fisher, professor of law at Harvard University, that would bring the President of either country to a dramatic realization of what his simple push of that button would do in exterminating hundreds of millions of people. Here is what Professor Fisher suggests:

He would put the codes needed to fire nuclear weapons in a little capsule and implant the capsule next to the heart of a volunteer, who would carry a big butcher knife as he followed the President everywhere. If the President ever wanted to fire a nuclear weapon, he would first have to kill, with his own hands, that human being. "He has to look at someone and realize what death is—what an innocent death is. It's reality brought home," says Professor Fisher.

Mr. President, the psychological forces that might drive the hand that controls the nuclear button have been examined and discussed by the leaders of the American Psychological Society. The New York Times ably reports their conclusion. I think they make a contribution to our understanding of this human and very real aspect of nuclear war and I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOCIAL SCIENTISTS BELIEVE LEADERS LACK A SENSE OF WAR'S REALITY

(By Philip M. Boffey)

WASHINGTON.—One expert on international affairs has an unorthodox proposal to slow the hand of any President who might be tempted to unleash a nuclear attack. It has long been feared that a President could be making his fateful decision while at a "psychological distance" from the victims of a nuclear barrage; that he would be in a clean, air-conditioned room, surrounded by well-scrubbed aides, all talking in abstract terms about appropriate military responses in an international crisis, and that he might well push to the back of his mind the realization that hundreds of millions of people would be exterminated.

So Roger Fisher, professor of law at Harvard University, offers a simple suggestion to make the stakes more real. He would put the codes needed to fire nuclear weapons in a little capsule, and implant the capsule next to the heart of a volunteer, who would carry a big butcher knife as he accompanied the President everywhere. If the President ever wanted to fire nuclear weapons, he would first have to kill, with his own hands, that human being.

"He has to look at someone and realize what death is—what an innocent death is. It's reality brought home," says Professor Fisher.

Although Professor Fisher's proposal has not gained adherents among decisionmakers in the nation's capital, it would go far toward answering a need voiced by many political psychologists. In his recent presidential address to the International Society for Political Psychology, for example, Morton Deutsch of Columbia University suggested that nuclear weapons were "psychologically seductive," largely because they provide "a tremendous emotional kick for those with strong power drives." The kick comes, he said, because the stakes high, decisions have to be made quickly, and use of the weapons is inherently aggressive. Dr. Deutsch also thinks the tidy, abstract character of nuclear war scenarios "appeals to the talented, imaginative gamesmen" who are the leading strategic analysts in the United States and Soviet Union. Meanwhile, he lamented, "the real horrors of a nuclear war are not faced," and some way must be found to make them "psychologically real."

Whatever the merits of this analysis, it illustrates the potentially important role played by psychological factors in momentous issues of war and peace. Ever since Albert Einstein, in a famous letter written 50 years ago, urged Sigmund Freud to analyze the "strong psychological factors" blocking peace in the troubled world of the 1930's, a parade of behavioral scientists has speculated on the psychological factors that may cause or prevent wars, or at least mitigate their consequences.

There is little agreement among those scientists, no central core of accepted research findings, little evidence that they have had much influence on political leaders, and no real indication that the field is growing. But there is continuing evidence that the small band of professionals who grapple with these issues is alive and well and still scratching to bring its insights to bear on the most profound questions of human survival.

At the annual meeting of the American Psychological Association two weeks ago, several social, political, military and behavioral psychologists presented papers or led discussions on the psychology of war and peace. A month earlier, similar discussions dominated the meeting here of the five-year-old International Society for Political Psychology. And in a recent issue of the journal Foreign Policy, a psychiatrist and a Foreign Service officer argued that political-psychological analysis "can help illuminate human barriers to the resolution of political problems."

On a less theoretical level, the American Psychiatric Association and the tiny Institute for Psychiatry and Foreign Affairs held major conferences in 1980 and 1981 with Egyptian and Israeli delegations, composed of psychiatrists, military officers and other policymakers, in an effort to lay the psychological groundwork for peace and coexistence.

Psychologists and psychiatrists believe their professions may be able to provide guidance on a host of political-military issues. Among them are the factors that influence decision-making in a crisis, the perceptions that rival societies have of each other, the shaping of public opinion and national goals, the conduct of successful negotiations, the value of weapons as deterrents or bargaining chips, and the effects of such psychological phenomena as denial, habituation and psychic numbing on arms control efforts.

But it has proved difficult, in many cases, to transfer findings from one level of psychological analysis—say the behavior of individuals—to a wholly different level, such as international conflict. Freud himself, in his response to Einstein, was dubious about the relevance of psychiatry to international conflict.

The diagnoses and prescriptions offered by psycologists and other behavioral scientists vary widely. Some see the nature and behavior of man—his aggressiveness and greed and fear of strangers, for example—as perhaps the most important underlying cause of war; others believe wars result primarily from dispute, over territory and natural resources or other concrete differences, with psychological factors as important secondary causes. Some believe that wars often result from misperceptions and misunderstandings; others suggest they result from an all-too-perfect understanding of another nation's hostile intentions. There are almost as many different analyses as there are psychologists and wars.

Here is a sampling of the thinking presented in recent papers and conferences:

Dr. Deutsch told the political psychologists' convention that sane, decent, intelligent leaders of the two superpowers have allowed themselves to become enmeshed in a "crazy" and "malignant" social process in which the actions they take to enhance their national security end by making both sides feel less secure, much as married couples or parents and adolescents sometimes get trapped in vicious process that lead to hostility and violence. He suggested that military actions should be taken only if they plainly increase the security of both sides.

B. F. Skinner, the dean of American behavioral psychologists, presented a pessimistic analysis to the American Psychological Association in an address called "Why Are We Not Acting to Save the World?" He argued that "something in the very nature of human behavior" makes it difficult for people to respond to advice on how to avoid future disasters that they have not yet experienced.

Herbert C. Kelman, a Harvard social psychologist who has had extensive contact with government leaders and scholars in the Middle East, presented an optimistic analysis of the thinking of Yasir Arafat, head of the Palestine Liberation Organization. After two extensive conversations with Mr. Arafat in 1980 and 1981, Dr. Kelman concluded that his language, images, thought processes and past actions indicated that he had the capacity and will to come to an agreement with Israel, if he was offered the necessary incentives and reassurances. The hypothesis, Dr. Kelman said, is "well worth putting to the empirical test."

Ralph K. White, professor emeritus at George Washington University and formerly a leading psychologist with the United States Information Agency, argued that a policy of tension-reduction is needed far more urgenty than a policy of deterrence.

Although some behavioral scientists in the past have offered sweeping guidelines that they suggested would produce world peace, the mood among those working on international conflict today seems far more modest and restrained. Most would probably agree with Irving L. Janis, professor of psychology at Yale, who believes that "a psychological analysis is essential for understanding outbreaks of war" but that current knowledge is "grossly incomplete." Dr. Janis said he would oppose any effort by a committee of psychologists to give "definitive advice" to decisionmakers because of the "tentative nature" of current psychological knowledge.

DO NOT TEACH HATRED TO THE CHILDREN

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, there is probably no more odious act than the teaching of hatred to little children. Parents often teach their children hatred rather unthinkingly. Wanting to prepare their children for the harsh realities of life, they will point out that certain groups or nationalities are "bad people" or are "the enemy." In such a way, conflicts are often perpetuated through the prejudice which is passed on to children.

In a recent issue of Life magazine August 1982, the passing on of hatred to children was captured in two startling photographs. The first photograph shows a little girl of 2½ years of age. She is wearing white shoes and a bright yellow dress with short, puffed up sleeves and red lace trim. She is standing on a gravel-covered sidewalk. She is staring into the camera, her large brown eyes shaded by her father's military cap on her head. Clasped between her tiny hands is her father's 9 millimeter pistol. In a second photograph, a boy of approximately 10 years of age is shown mocking death lying face down in a freshly dug grave. These two photographs are encaptioned with an old Middle Eastern dictum which reads: "Learn who the enemy is, never forget, and carry on the struggle through your children's children's children." Whether this is a formula for eventual victory in a protracted armed struggle is not certain. But it certainly is a formula for countless numbers of senseless deaths, vast destruction, and a future of little hope for the children.

The tragedy of the dictum is that when carried to its logical, though extreme, conclusion, it is in effect a statement sanctioning genocide. For in a fight to the death, the end result would be the destruction of an entire people.

These photographs must not be, as the inscription reads, a call to continue the struggle, but rather a call to end it; not a call to perpetuate hatred, based on ethnic, racial, religious, or national origin, but to eradicate it. The memories of a bitter past should not be used to poison the minds of our children and their children, but rather to enlighten them.

Hatred is already so abundant, Mr. President, that it hardly needs to be taught. The seemingly endless circle of perpetuated conflict will only be broken when we and our children and our children's children learn the true lessons of that violence.

As I have said time and time again on the Senate floor, we need to learn the lessons of history. We do not accomplish that by forgetting past conflicts, but rather by drawing on these as a spur to do everything humanly possible, no matter how small any step may be, to insure that such tragedy will not be repeated.

The Genocide Convention establishes punishment for those responsible for genocide. But our attempts to prevent genocide should not stop there. The hatred and prejudice that drives people to commit heinous crimes against an ethnic or national group must be stopped. Fighting hatred is the first line of defense against genocide and senseless conflicts because it seeks to stop genocide before it occurs. But inevitably, or so it seems, the battle against hatred breaks down and that is when the Genocide Convention is needed as a second line of defense against the most abominable of crimes: the destruction of an ethnic, religious, or racial group. When the battle against hatred breaks down, it would be reassuring to know that in the most extreme case of purposeful violence, genocide, there is an international basis for nations to stand together and punish the perpetrators. I would hope that all my colleagues would join me in my endeavor to ratify the Genocide Convention.

Mr. President, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary of the Senate proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HABEAS CORPUS REFORM

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, since May Senator NUNN and I have been coming to the floor of the Senate every day to speak out on the urgent need for the Senate to pass legislation to fight crime and to reform our criminal justice system. For the last 2 months, we have spoken out on a particular aspect of our legal system, the Federal habeas corpus statute for State prisoners. It is our belief that today's habeas corpus system and the way it operates runs far afield of what the purposes of the writ of habeas corpus should be. Rather than a shield to protect the exceptional case involving a miscarriage of justice, today's habeas statutes have created an entirely new system of appeals which a convict can use, time and time again, to challenge issues which had been resolved years earlier. Indeed, as one Supreme Court Justice said, under today's habeas system, the State trial and appeal is no more than a try out on the road. You do not get to Broadway with your case until you start filing habeas petitions.

Several weeks ago, Hon. Frank J. Kelley, the attorney general of the State of Michigan, wrote in support of efforts to modify the current habeas corpus statutes. He singled out one habeas reform proposal in particular, the need to put some sort of time limit on the ability of convicts to file habeas petitions. In doing so, he referred to the case of Nealy Buchanon against Charles E. Anderson as an illustration of the need for some sort of finality in the habeas corpus system.

The story begins back in 1956, when Buchanon pleaded guilty to two counts of first degree murder and was convicted and sentenced. Twenty-three years later, in 1979, Buchanon filed a habeas corpus petition in the Federal court, alleging in part that his guilty plea, since it had been made without counsel, violated the sixth amendment. Mr. President, I do not quarrel with Buchanon's underlying appeal concerning the need for a lawyer. But that principle had been announced back in the early 1960's, and Buchanon had waited some 15 years after it had been announced, and over 20 years after his original conviction, to raise his claim.

The State of Michigan, in investigating Buchanon's claim, found that every relevant witness, except the trial judge, had either died or had no independent recollection of the events in question. In addition, during the 23-year lapse, much of the documentation and the evidence in the case had disappeared. The State of Michigan therefore asked the court to dismiss the case, asserting that the delay in the filing had prejudiced the State's ability to respond to the allegations made.

The Federal district court refused to grant the State of Michigan's request for dismissal. Instead, it appointed a lawyer for Buchanon and held a lengthy evidentiary hearing. At that hearing, the court determined that Buchanon in fact had voluntarily waived his right to counsel back in 1956. So the State ultimately prevailed. Nonetheless, as Attorney General Kelley correctly pointed out, the decades-long delay resulted in an unnecessary duplication of effort and unnecessary expenditure for State and Federal funds. The Buchanon case is yet another example of the pitfalls in today's habeas corpus laws, and yet another example of the need to establish some sort of limit on when a prisoner can file a habeas corpus petition.

There are presently two habeas reform proposals on the Senate calendar. Each one is ready to be considered and passed by the Senate. The first, title 4 of S. 2543, is identical in substance to a habeas reform proposal that Senator THURMOND and I introduced last year. It sets up a time limit on filing habeas corpus petitions, to assure that habeas cases are heard while relevant evidence is still relatively fresh. The second, S. 2838, was introduced by Senator THURMOND and is cosponsored by Senator NUNN and I. It is similar in substance to the administration's habeas corpus reform proposals.

Both measures contain time limits, which require persons filing habeas petitions to file them at some point soon after their convictions have become final or after they have exhausted their State remedies. Whether you set that time limit at 1 year or at 3 years is not critical. What is essential, however, is the principle contained in both measures, and that principle is that, at some point in time, there must be an end to the numbers of appeals that a convicted criminal can file. Each bill also provides that, in special circumstances, where a new constitutional principle is announced and is made retroactive, a person could file a habeas petition on those specific grounds during a specified time period.

In this case, under either habeas reform proposal, Buchanon would have had an opportunity to raise the issue of not having an attorney in the early 1960's, immediately after the courts announced their interpretation of the right to counsel under the Constitution. However, Buchanon would not have been able to delay for an additional 15 years before raising a claim.

Mr. President, it is imperative that the Senate act promptly to heed the calls for reform raised by Attorney General Kelley and by so many others, and act on habeas corpus reform legislation. Time is running short. We are now in the last lap of this Congress, with as few as 16 days remaining in this session. It would be tragic if the Senate did not act, especially since we have this unique opportunity to make these necessary reforms.

TRIBUTE TO FORMER UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH CAROLINA TRUSTEE JAMES W. COTHRAN, SR.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, it is with sadness that I rise today to pay tribute to my good friend, James W. Cothran, Sr., of Bishopville, S.C., who passed away on August 3, 1982. To his devoted wife, Dorothy, his three loving children, and other family, I extend my deepest sympathy.

Though Jimmy Cothran was a man of numerous abilities and interests, he will perhaps best be remembered for his undying partiotism, his commitment to quality education, and his zeal for justice in law.

Jimmy Cothran's military career began when he volunteered for service in the Navy in 1943. During World War II, he saw action in the Aleutians and in the South Pacific. Upon completing his service in the Navy, Jimmy returned to Bishopville where he continued his patriotic duties with the Veterans of Foreign Wars. Holding numerous important positions with VFW, Jimmy served ably as their commander-in-chief from 1952 to 1953, the only South Carolinian to hold this national office.

His love for America never wavered. Jimmy had a profound respect for American tradition and for its institutions which provide opportunity for anyone bold enough to pursue their own dreams. Such a belief was the basis for his lifetime of continuous dedication to education.

For Jimmy Cothran, the University of South Carolina was more than his alma mater which presented him with an undergraduate and law degree. It was an institution that held a special place in his heart. As an expression of gratitude and loyalty to the University of South Carolina, Jimmy sought to give of his time and talents in a way that would greatly benefit the university.

He fulfilled this desire through his valuable leadership on its board of trustees, where he served from 1953 to 1981. His 28 years in this capacity helped make USC one of the foremost universities in the country in areas of academics, athletics, and numerous other activities.

His work as a trustee was an extension of his genuine desire to help young people attain the best education possible. I know that his fellow trustees would attest to the fact that Jimmy's efforts were not in vain. He enjoyed close interaction with the students, faculty, and staff, who provided him with the necessary input to better understand the needs of today's college students. This unique relationship granted Jimmy the keen insight to see which direction the university should be going to meet those needs.

University of South Carolina President James B. Holderman said of Jimmy Cothran, "The University community will cherish his memory for his wise and enthusiastic leadership. . . ." It is that enthusiasm which served as a common bond between Jimmy and the students.

Yet, his enthusiasm was felt in every other area of his life as well. He was enthusiastic about helping people in his law profession, and served his clients well for 35 years, insuring that they received the attention and skillful advice they deserved.

Though he was heavily involved in many organizations, he managed to devote 100 percent of himself to each cause. To Jimmy, every activity was important, and for this reason he gave his best.

Mr. President, James W. Cothran, Sr., was a soldier whose victories brought peace; a leader whose abilities brought positive results; and a man whose unshakable faith in God gave him the inner strength to overcome any external obstacle. His life served as an example for all.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a recent article from The (Columbia) State newspaper and a tribute by VFW Commander-in-Chief Arthur J. Fellwock about this courageous American, James W. Cothran, Sr., be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the State, Aug. 4, 1982]

JAMES W. COTHRAN, SR., FORMER USC TRUSTEE

BISHOPVILLE.—James W. Cothran Sr., 67, former member of the University of South Carolina board of trustees, died Tuesday after a long illness.

Born in Florence County, he was a son of the late Malcolm C. and Sophia Frierson Cothran.

Mr. Cothran was a graduate of the University of South Carolina and the USC Law School. He was a member of Bishopville Presbyterian Church.

Mr. Cothran practiced law in Bishopville for over 35 years and was a member of the American, South Carolina and Lee County bar associations and the South Carolina Trial Lawyers Association. He was active locally in the V.F.W., the American Legion, the Kiwanis Club and Elks Club.

Mr. Cothran volunteered for military service in January 1943 and served in the Navy during World War II in the Aleutians and South Pacific Theaters until the end of the war. He attained the rank of lieutenant.

He devoted much of his talent and energy to further patriotic and educational causes. He was the only South Carolinian to serve as National Commander-in-Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and was active in V.F.W. affairs until his death. He served on many V.F.W. committees, including the finance committee and the National Council V.F.W. for many years. He was a director of Freedom's Foundation at Valley Forge from 1952 until his death, serving as a local and national judge of the Voice of Democracy Contest.

Mr. Cothran was a member of the University of South Carolina Board of Trustees from 1953 to 1981 and served as its vice chairman from 1960 to 1978. He also served on many committees of the board, including the Executive Committee and the Building and Grounds Committee. He actively assisted many local young people further their education.

University of South Carolina President James B. Holderman said of Mr. Cothran, "His death means that the university has lost one of its most dedicated supporters. As an active member of the board of trustees for 28 years, Mr. Cothran shared generously of his time and great expertise to improve his alma mater and higher education in South Carolina.

"The university community will cherish his memory for his wise and enthusiastic leadership in higher education and for his outstanding, lifelong service to the university. We have lost a true friend," Holderman said.

Cothran of Florence and Mrs. Terry P. (Virginia) McCarrell of Charlotte; a brother, H. Lawton Cothran of Florence; and a number of grandchildren, nieces and nephews.

Services will be held at 2 p.m. Thursday at Bishopville Presbyterian Church.

The family suggests that those who wish may make memorials to the University of South Carolina Educational Foundation.

Hancock Funeral Home is in charge.

A TRIBUTE TO JAMES W. COTHRAN—1981-82 MEMORIAL SERVICE

(By Arthur J. Fellwock, Commander-in-Chief, The Veterans of Foreign Wars)

The Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States has a special place in its heart for Los Angeles, for it was in this city in 1952 that James W. Cothran was elected as its Commander-in-Chief at the 53rd National Convention.

To the thousands and thousands of members of the VFW and its Ladies Auxiliary who knew Jimmy Cothran during his long years of service to our organization, he was a very special person.

He was never too busy to pause and chat with them, to encourage them or by the warmth of his smile to make their day a little easier. And everyone who heard him speak was moved by the power of his oratorical gifts.

Jimmy Cothran was born Jan. 6, 1915, in Cartersville, S.C., and was educated in the schools of nearby Timmonsville. In 1937 he earned his bachelor's degree from the University of South Carolina and his law degree from his alma mater's Law School two years later, when he began practicing law in Bishopville, where he made his home for his remaining years.

During his three years' service in the United States Navy, he spent 22 months aboard the USS Charles J. Badger as communications officer. He saw action at Matsuwa, Kurabu Zaki, Paramushire and Kurile islands as well as the invasions of Leyte, Luzon, and Okinawa.

No sooner had he joined Post 3096 in Bishopville in 1946, than he was elected Junior Vice Commander of the Department of South Carolina. He was elected Department Commander for 1949-50. South Carolina's success in membership under him led to his election as Junior Vice Commander-in-Chief in 1950 at the National Convention that year in Chicago.

Jimmy Cothran, a dedicated husband and father, married the former Dorothy Parke, a Columbia, S.C., girl, who presented him with two sons, James W., Jr. and Thomas Parke, and a daughter, Julia Lea.

Although he devoted much of his time to his family, the VFW and his law practice, Jimmy Cothran was never too busy to do anything that would better his community and his state. He was a member of the Board of Trustees of the University of South Carolina, long active in the Lee County Fair Association and the Lee County Christmas Fund and a member of the Bishopville Presbyterian Church.

He was a Mason, a Kiwanian, an Elk, a Kappa Sigma and a member of the American Legion and the Military Order of the World Wars. He also served on the Freedoms Foundation Board of Directors.

Underlying his achievements always was a sense of humility, exemplified by his remarks after his election as Commander-in-Chief:

". . . I pray that God will give me the ability, sound judgment and the strength that it takes to make a wise and competent Commander-in-Chief for the Veterans of Foreign Wars—one whose willingness to work hard for the organization will encourage countless thousands of our members to do the same thing."

His prayers were answered and the VFW grew and its influence spread through his inspiration.

"My help cometh of God, who preserveth them that are true of heart."—Psalm 8.

Few men who have been privileged to wear the Cross of Malta Emblem have earned the affection, admiration and acclaim of so many members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States as Past Commander-in-Chief James W. Cothran.

Known to all of us as "Jimmy," he always shouldered his share of the burden when called upon and often volunteered to do so without being asked.

His ready wit and charm, befitting a gentleman whose roots were solidly and deeply grounded in a more gracious, more serene era, won the hearts of all who met him.

It was a rare person, indeed, in the VFW or outside, who did not become a better person for meeting, if only for a fleeting moment, Jimmy Cothran. He imparted to all his firm religious conviction that all men are created in the image and likeness of God.

He served the VFW and America's veterans as Commander-in-Chief in 1952-53. For our country, this was a period of severe strain. The Korean War had been grinding on. Major alarm over internal subversion gripped the American people. Under the strong and wise leadership of Jimmy Cothran, however, the VFW kept to a steady course, ever mindful of the veterans' loyalty to the United States, the innate patriotism of the American people and the needs of the veterans who were coming home from Korea.

In his service to the VFW after his year of leadership, Jimmy Cothran worked constantly for the betterment of our Order. He served on numerous sensitive committees as chairman, always contributing his wealth of knowledge, experience and common sense.

Although it has been nearly 30 years since Jimmy Cothran was Commander-in-Chief, the lives of all of us in the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and its Ladies Auxiliary have been made richer, fuller, because he walked among us.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF FRANKING STATUTE UPHELD

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on September 7, 1982, a three-judge panel for the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia dismissed a lawsuit which had been pending since 1973 and which challenged the constitutionality of title 39, United States Code, section 3210. That statute grants to Members of Congress the privilege of sending official mail through the U.S. Postal Service as franked mail. Pursuant to Senate Resolution 476, 96th Congress, 2d session, the Senate appeared as amicus curiae in support of the statute. In order that all Members of the Senate may be promptly informed of the court's decision, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the order and memorandum opinion be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was order to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

[U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, Civil Action No. 1887-73]

MEMORANDUM OPINION

Statement of the case

By an amended complaint filed March 12, 1974, plaintiffs seek a declaratory judgment that 39 U.S.C. § 3210, granting to Members of Congress the privilege of sending mail through the United States Postal Service as franked mail, is unconstitutional. Plaintiffs claim, in essense, that the franking privilege afforded by the statue provides an unconstitutional "subsidy" to incumbent candidates for Congress because franked mail inevitably has the effect of aiding Members' reelection efforts. Plaintiffs reason that because they are not afforded similar campaign advantages, section 3210 abridges their First Amendment rights to associate freely for the advancement of political beliefs, as well as deprives them of equal protection under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. In addition, plaintiffs seek a judgment that section 3210 permits an unlawful use of public funds for a non-public purpose in violation of the General Welfare Clause of Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution.

The Postmaster General[1] and the Secretary of the Treasury were the original named defendants in this case. Subsequently, on September 8, 1976, the House Commission on Congressional Mailing Standards was permitted to intervene as a defendant and the United States Senate, through its Select Committee on Ethics, formerly the Select Committee on Standards and Conduct of the United States Senate, was allowed to participate as amicus curiae.

It is the position of all defendants and the amicus that the franking statute and the congressional rules enacted thereunder facilitate the necessary and constitutionally protected communication between Members of Congress and their constituents and draw a proper line between legitimate and illegitimate uses of the frank, i.e., between communications on official business and communications for personal political advantage. They deny that the franking statute violates any of plaintiffs' First or Fifth Amendment rights. The case therefore presents a classic example of the tension which sometimes arises between conflicting claims of right.

Prior proceedings

On July 1, 1974, after denying defendants' motion to dismiss, the court granted plaintiffs' motion to convene a statutory court of three judges pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2284.[2] This court, in turn, considered and denied defendants' renewed motion to dismiss on February 10, 1975. Both motions to dismiss were predicated in part on plaintiffs' alleged lack of standing to bring this action, and were denied. Thereafter, all parties engaged in discovery through interrogatories, documentary requests, depositions and requests for admissions. Because of the nature of much of the material, a protective order was issued on March 1, 1976 and various coding systems were established to protect the confidentiality of Members of Congress and other witnesses. Without detailing the precise nature and volume of the discovery pursued by both sides, it is fair to say that the discovery concluded on April 22, 1981 has been thorough and complete. Many of the basic facts are not in dispute; what is sharply contested are the inferences to be drawn therefrom.

Present posture

Pursuant to the Court's timetable, plaintiffs, defendants and the intervening defendant filed motions for summary judgment on May 22, 1981. Oppositions were filed by the parties on June 12, 1981, as well as a memorandum of the United States Senate in support of the motions of defendants and intervening defendant and in opposition to plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment. The matter was argued at length on September 30, 1981.

Statutory basis for the franking privilege

1. The History of the Frank

The origin of the franking privilege can be traced to 17th Century England, when the privilege was granted to Members of the House of Commons concurrent with the establishment of the first public postal service in that country. The clear purpose then, as it is today, was to facilitate the carrying on of official business.

In 1775, the Continental Congress authorized the use of the frank by its own members and by those on active duty in the Continental Army. The First Congress, when it acted to establish a postal system in 1789, retained the privilege for official correspondence and documents. In 1873, after the Civil War, the privilege was temporarily abolished by Congress, but was restored in proprio vigore in 1985. 28 Stat. 593, 622 (Sec. 85).

Until the comprehensive revision of 1973, the Act of 1895 authorized Members of Congress to use the frank for correspondence on "official business." The responsibility to interpret the meaning of the term "official business" was exercised by the Post Office Department, which, upon request of anyone, including members of the public, provided official guidance in the form of advisory opinions as to whether a mailing or contemplated mailing could be franked.

This procedure was changed in 1968 when, in recognition of the practical as well as possible constitutional problems of its advisory position, the Department decided to give up its practice of issuing opinions to members of the public. It did, however, continue to give advisory opinions to Members of Congress until 1971, when, with the establishment of the new Postal Service, the Post Office Department relinquished any remaining responsibility in this area.

This confused state of affairs led to a spate of lawsuits in the federal courts of four different circuits by candidates running against incumbent members. At least two of these challenges, focused on the propriety of certain franked mailings by particular members,[3] were an acute embarrassment to Congress. Other more flagrant abuses surfaced, among them the reported event of a member mailing his lawn furniture to Bimini in the Bahamas, under a frank with the tag reading "Official Business." The combination of these factors plus the threat of further lawsuits led to Arizona Congressman Morris Udall's introduction of H.R. 3180 in Early 1973. Similar proposals were introduced in the Senate, and after the differences between the two bodies were accommodated in conference, the Franking Act of 1973, Pub. L. No. 93-191, was signed by the President and became law on December 18, 1973.

2. The 1973 Statute

The statute is set forth primarily in 39 U.S.C. §§ 3201, 3210-19. In this litigation, our attention is focused on section 3210.

In its opening declaration of policy, the statute states that the privilege of sending mail under the frank is "to assist and expedite the conduct of the official business, activities, and duties of the Congress of the United States." 39 U.S.C. § 3210(a)(1). "official business" is defined to "cover all matters which directly or indirectly pertain to the legislative process or to any congressinal representative functions generally or to the functioning, working, or operating of the Congress and the performance of official duties in connection therewith, and shall include, but not be limited to; the conveying of information to the public, and the requesting of the views of the public, or the views and information of other authority of government, as a guide or a means of assistance in the performance of these functions." 39 U.S.C. § 3210(a)(2).

There follows a list of what the Congress considered to be frankable mail matter. The list includes, but is not limited to:

(a) Mailings to any person or any government official regarding programs, decisions and other matters of public concern. § 3210(a)(3)(A);

(b) The "usual and customary congressional newsletter or press release." § 3210(a)(3)(B);

(c) The "usual and customary congressional questionnaire." § 3210(a)(3)(C);

(d) Mail expressing condolences to a person who has suffered a loss or congratulations to a person who has achieved some personal or public distinction. § 3210(a)(3)(F);

(e) Mass mailings of federal documents and publications and publications containing items of general information. § 3210(a)(3)(G);

Footnotes at end of article.

(f) Mail consisting of voter registration or election information or assistance. § 3210(a)(3)(H);

(g) Mail including a biography or autobiography of a member or family members which is part of a federal publication or in response to a specific request and not included for publicity puprposes in a newsletter or other mass mailing. § 3210(a)(3)(I);

(h) Mail containing a picture, sketch or other likeness of a Member which is part of a federal publication or in response to a specific request, or, when contained in a newsletter or other mass mailing, is not of such size or does not occur with such frequency as to lend to the conclusion that the purpose is to advertise the Member, rather than illustrate the accompanying text. § 3210(a)(3)(J);

By way of contrast, the unauthorized uses of the frank are specified to cover the following: purely personal mailings unrelated to official business, § 3210(a)(4); mailings "laudatory and complimentary" of a member "on a purely personal or political basis," § 3210(a)(5)(A); "greetings" from the spouse or other members of the member's family, § 3210(a)(5)(b)(i); reports on how and when the member or his spouse or family spends time other than in connection with legislative, representative, and "other official functions," § 3210(a)(5)(B)(ii); mail "which specifically solicits political support," § 3210(a)(5)(C); and "any mass mailing . . . less than 28 days immediately before the date of any primary or general election . . ., § 3210(a)(5)(D).

The statute therefore permits franked mass mailings (defined to mean newsletters and similar mailings of more than 500 pieces) when they are made at least 28 days prior to a primary or general election. 39 U.S.C. § 3210(a)(5)(D). The statute also allows a member of the House to use the frank on postal patron mass mailings addressed not only into the area of his congressional district, but also into an area which he does not presently represent, but in which he will be a candidate in the next election because of redistricting. 39 U.S.C. § 3210 (d) (1)(A) and (B). Accordingly, material may be mass mailed under the frank to points outside the district of a Representative or outside the state of a Senator, subject only to the 28-day restriction.[4] Materials such as newsletters and press releases printed with campaign contributions are specifically permitted to be mailed under the frank. 39 U.S.C. § 3210(e).

It is clear from the legislative history, as well as from the text of the statute, that the 1973 Act was designed to give explicit approval to the traditional uses of the frank. As Congressman Udall, the leading supporter of the legislation, stated more than once, the approved uses were intended to be a summary of present practices. He emphasized that "we are simply confirming the sound, solid, responsible use of the frank which the vast majority of Members of Congress have always followed."[5] The entire legislative history confirms the position expressed by Congressman Udall.

3. The House Commission on Congressional Mailing Standards and the Select Committee on Standards and Conduct of the Senate (now Select Committee on Ethics)

The 1973 statute also established for the House of Representatives a special commission composed of members and know as the "House Commission on Congressional Mailing Standards," (hereinafter House Commission) and for the Senate, the Select Committee on Standards and Conduct of the Senate (hereinafter Senate Committee). 2 U.S.C. § § 501, 502. Both groups are required to "provide guidance, assistance, advice, and counsel, through advisory opinions or consultations, in connection with the mailing or contemplated mailing of franked mail" under the 1973 Act. 2 U.S.C. § § 501(d), 502(a).

The Act also specifically provides for an administrative procedure for the receipt, investigation and hearing of complaints concerning alleged violations of the franking statute and limits the jurisdiction of the federal courts hearing such complaints.[6] Both the House Commission and the Senate Committee are required to "prescribe regulations governing the proper use of the franking privilege." 2 U.S.C. §§ 501(d), 502(a).

Each House of Congress, in response to the statute, has enacted formal rules which set further limits on the kind of material which may be franked. House Rule XLVI;[7] Senate Rule XLVIII, renumbered as 48(3).[8] While varying in certain respects, the Rules of both branches of Congress reflect concern as to the adequacy of the 1973 Act in two important respects:

(a) They extend the prohibition on mass mailings before a primary or general election in which the Member is a candidate from the 28 days permitted under the statute to 60 days.

(b) They require that the costs of mass mailings be defrayed exclusively from appropriated funds, although the statute permits the franked mailing of such material when paid for out of campaign funds.

4. Public Law No. 97-69

Most recently, Public Law No. 97-69, enacted on October 26, 1981, has further amended the 1973 statute by embodying the above two provisions of the House and Senate Rules as well as the prohibition barring mass mailings outside a member's district, when he is a candidate for another public office. The new law also extends the postal patron mailing privilege to the Senate and directs the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration to establish limits on such mailings.[9] Furthermore, the statutory authorization for letters of condolence and congratulations for personal distinction is eliminated and letters of congratulation can be sent only for "some public distinction."

To summarize, since this action was originally brought, the Congress has tightened considerably the respective features of the 1973 Act, particularly by incorporating into law the two important limitations embodied in the House and Senate Rules and implementing regulations and by eliminating authorization for the franking of all letters of condolence and certain letters of congratulations. The plaintiffs nevertheless remain firm in their challenge.

The issues

It is in the context of the foregoing statutory scheme governing the use of the franking privilege that two paramount issues are presented:

1. Whether the statute, as written and implemented, deprives the plaintiffs of their right to a fair political process, in violation of their constitutional rights under the First and Fifth Amendments.

2. Whether the statute recognizes and protects the constitutional right and duty of Members of Congress to communicate with their constituents and at the same time limits any incidental adverse effects on the political process.

The factual record

We are convinced, after careful review of the evidentiary record[10] amassed over the length of discovery in this case, that the basic facts underlying plaintiff's challenge are not in dispute. We, therefore, set out our findings of fact in this case for the principal purpose of providing a clear context for our discussion and decision on the differing legal and constitutional arguments made. We preface these findings with two general assumptions, neither of which is genuinely disputed.

First, it stands to reason that incumbency alone is a valuable asset to the public official who seeks reelection. An incumbent Member of Congress enjoys a certain "visibility" among his constituents that a challenger may find difficult or impossible to match. It is also beyond argument that any communication with constituents, whether through local meetings or through the mail or mass media, contributes to such visibility and thus may have a direct effect (however slight) in influencing the outcome of an election. To the extent that the effect is positive from the incumbent's standpoint, it is undoubtedly detrimental to his challenger's position. This is so whether the communication is part of an overt campaign effort or made simply in the normal course of a member's representative function.

Second, there is little doubt that the franking privilege is a valuable tool in facilitating the performance by individual Members of Congress of their constitutional duty to communicate with and inform their constituents on public matters. As noted earlier, it is this particular duty which has justified the frank through its history.

Plaintiffs do not argue with the necessity of or public value in some kind of Congressional franking privilege. Their challenge before this court is based only on assertions that section 3210, as it stood in 1973 and, notwithstanding increased restrictions embodied in the Rules of both Houses and in subsequent amendments, even as it stands now, is drafted to enable more than the justifiable uses—that it permits Members of Congress to use the frank to make campaign-related mailings, particularly mass mailings.[11]

On the basis of the convincing evidentiary base offered by plaintiffs to support their argument, we make the following findings and offer a sampling of supporting evidence:

1. Members of Congress and their staff have received advice from many sources to take full advantage of the franking privilege in their campaign efforts. The publication of "The Job of the Congressman," co-authored by Congressman MORRIS UDALL, Chairman of the House Commission on Congressional Mailing Standards and sponsor of the bill which became the Franking Act of 1973, advises Members of the benefits of such use. Campaign committees from both the Republican and Democratic parties have held seminars for congressional staff members concerning the effective use of newsletters, questionnaires and other franked mailings. The Republican Senatorial Committee employed a direct mail consultant to give advice concerning effective campaign use of mass mailings—including franked mailings. A 1974 Democratic Campaign Committee manual entitled "Maximum Campaign Budget" called for integration of targeted franked mass mailings into overall campaign strategy. It is apparent that at least some members and their staffs believed that the use of franked mailings can be politically beneficial and should be employed.

2. At least some Members of Congress used direct mail consultants during the 1972, 1974 and 1976 campaigns to build mailing lists and to help integrate franked mailings into the overall campaign strategy.

3. Several Senators and Representatives have targeted franked mass mailings in ways that frequently have no relationship to official business and which are closely connected to reelection plans and strategy. Such targeted mailings, which are identified and documented, make use of voter registration lists and may be designed to convey views on an issue to a select group which is likely to be receptive to those views. Mailings may be made to voters on the basis of demography (race, religion, sex, age), geography, political affiliation or membership in special interest groups. The importance of special interest group mailings and of targeted mass mailings is demonstrated by the fact that, during the period from 1973–75, less than two percent of franked mass mailings by Senators were general newsletters.

4. The "usual and customary congressional questionnaires," frankable under section 3210(a)(3)(C), are often used for purposes other than merely determining constituents' views on particular issues. They may be used to obtain demographic and other information helpful to identifying recipients for targeted mailings, thus facilitating the member's political "responsiveness" to various groups and interests.

5. Members often include self-laudatory material in franked mailings, including favorable editorials, reports of awards, compliments of others concerning the member's performance of his duties, pressure group ratings, and the like. They also use franked mails to compliment and honor constituents to generate good will which, according to plaintiffs, improves the members' chances of reelection.

6. The House Commission on Congressional Mailing Standards has specifically approved the uses of the franking privilege described above. Mailings referred to in these findings and made by Senators were registered with the Secretary of the Senate.

7. The volume and timing of franked mass mailings, revealed by data stipulated by the parties to be reasonably accurate, indicate widespread use to promote incumbents' reelection efforts. The volume of franked mass mailings is significantly higher in the year preceding House or Senate elections than in the year following elections. The volume builds to a peak just before the preelection cutoff and drops sharply. The volume of non-mass franked mailings stays relatively constant from year to year in both the House and the Senate. It is an undeniable conclusion that the fluctuations in the volume of franked mass mailings are caused by the electoral cycle, rather than by fluctuations in legislative activity.

8. Measured in financial terms, the franking privilege confers a substantial advantage to incumbent Congressional candidates over their challengers. We find that Congress recognized the potential financial benefits conferred by section 3210 on campaigning incumbents at the time it passed the Act.

9. We make no specific finding concerning the extent to which use of the franking privilege has contributed to the electoral victories of any incumbent Members of Congress. We are inclined by the lack of evidence on this point to conclude only that there is no statistical relationship between the use of the frank and the outcome of an election and that proof of the decisive impact of the privilege in any particular election is elusive, whatever the potential financial benefit of the frank.

Analysis

It is the plaintiffs' basic position that the First Amendment and the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment mandate that the government remain neutral in electoral matters and avoid any action which unfairly benefits some participants in the political process to the detriment of others. They claim that by affording what amounts to a postage subsidy which may be used to send materials which promote an incumbent's efforts toward reelection, the franking statute violates this constitutional principle of fairness.

Defendants on the other hand vigorously deny that the franking statute is consitutionally unsound, asserting that the bounds of the franking privilege have been drawn to facilitate the constitutional duty of Members of Congress to communicate with their constituents, and at the same time to limit as much as possible any adverse effects on the political process. It is to the constitutional issues underlying these opposing positions that we now turn our discussion.[12]

The first amendment aspects of plaintiffs' claims

The "Freedom of Speech" clause of the First Amendment, according to plaintiffs, protects several aspects of the political process with which the frank, by providing a subsidy to incumbents, interferes and harms. These include, under plaintiffs' analysis, the ability of candidates to win elective office, to attract financial support, to communicate with citizens, to educate the public and to influence the political discourse of a campaign. While we do not agree with plaintiffs that there is a First Amendment-based right to win elective office, we agree that important aspects of the political process do fall within the general rubric of speech under the First Amendment. As the Supreme Court stated in Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265, 272 (1971), the constitutional standard that a person's speech remain unfettered and unabridged by governmental action "has its fullest and most urgent application precisely to the conduct of campaigns for political office."

While plaintiffs do not claim that their right to speak, to vote and to associate for political ends have been directly restrained by the franking statute, this absence of direct restraint does not render the First Amendment protections inapplicable. It is well-established that "the Constitution's protection is not limited to direct inference with fundamental rights." Healy v. James, 408 U.S. 169, 183 (1972). Claims of First Amendment violations demand heightened judicial sensitivity, "[e]ven where a challenged regulation restricts freedom of expression only incidentally." Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61, 69 n. 7 (1981). See also Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 21 (1976).

The essential element of plaintiffs' argument is that, to the extent that it enables Members of Congress to use franked mail to promote their own campaign efforts, the franking statute works an effective restriction on challengers' access to the political process, thereby violating rights of expression and association. It is argued that the postal subsidy effectively created by the franking statute violates the rule under the combined First and Fifth Amendments requiring that the government neither impose unequal burdens nor grant unequal benefits upon participants' exercise of their rights to speech and association in the political process. Although we endorse the principle that protection of the fundamental fairness of the political process is necessary to ensure the uninhibited competition of candidates and in ideas which "is at the core of our electoral process," Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 32 (1968), and accept that granting financial benefits to some interests may be under some circumstances the same as restricting the First Amendment rights of others, see Taxation with Representation of Washington v. Rogers, 676 F.2d 715, 744 (D.C. Cir. 1982), we do not accept plaintiffs' contention that the facts of this case require strict judicial scrutiny of the statute at issue.

It is clear from our reading of Supreme Court cases involving governmental restrictions on the exercise of free speech that the standard of strict scrutiny, which requires that the government justify a particular regulation by demonstrating that it "is necessary to serve a compelling interest and that it is narrowly drawn to achieve that end," Widmar v. Vincent, 102 S. Ct. 269, 274 (1981), is reserved for those instances where the restriction impacts directly on the content of the restricted communication. See, e.g., Widmar v. Vincent, supra; Metromedia, Inc. v. City of San Diego, 453 U.S. 490 (1981); Central Hudson Gas & Electric Co. v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 557 (1980); Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 530 (1980); Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455 (1980); Police Dep't of the City of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92 (1972). We do not believe that this is such a case, and is distinguishable in important respects from the decision in Greenberg v. Bolger, 497 F. Supp. 756 (E.D.N.Y. 1980), upon which plaintiffs principally rely.

In Greenberg, a First Amendment challenge was raised against a statutory scheme granting the two major political parties special reduced mailing rates while denying similar rates to minor parties. Plaintiffs argued in that case that by denying them the same discounted postal rates enjoyed by the major parties Congress had restricted their access to the mails and thereby had violated their First Amendment rights of expression and association. The court correctly observed that regulation of First Amendment rights of expression must be "content neutral," noting that "[t]he Supreme Court has often explained that ' . . . above all else, the first amendment means that the government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content.' " Id., at 774, quoting Police Department of the City of Chicago v. Mosley, supra at 95–96. The court then determined that the statute challenged in that case was not content neutral. It reasoned that by drawing a line between major and minor parties, Congress had granted a postal subsidy for the expression of the most "popular" political ideas while refusing similar advantages to those who held political positions substantially different from those of the major parties. It concluded that "[b]y subsidizing the mailings of the Republicans and Democrats, the government has chosen to benefit those with popular views and burden those with unpopular views. To handicap the mailing of campaign literature because a political party has not achieved a required level of acceptance is not different from censoring speech because of its substance." Greenberg, 497 F. Supp. at 776.

The principal difference between this case and Greenberg is in the nature of the restrictions worked by the statute. In Greenberg the restrictions were direct and drawn along party lines. They therefore effectively limited the expression of particular political ideas. Although this case involves issues of access to the political process similar to those raised in Greenberg, the impact here is not upon defined political positions. The lines drawn by the franking statute distinguish individuals, not ideas. And because the individuals affected—non-incumbent congressional candidates—must be presumed to represent the full spectrum of political ideology, we cannot hold that the franking privilege creates any discrimination or restriction which is content related. This case does not fall within the rationale for strict First Amendment scrutiny adopted in Greenberg.

In fact, beyond acknowledging that the franking statute has some limited impact upon speech-related rights, the First Amendment finds little place in our analysis. Although the language of the First Amendment ensures that one's own speech be free, unfettered, and unabridged, it does not alone require that each individual be entitled to this particular privilege of incumbency that certain others may enjoy.[13] For this reason, questions of the constitutionality of governmental-created imbalances are much better suited to analysis under the principle of equal protection than under freedom of speech. It is thus to the Fifth Amendment that we now turn.

The fifth amendment claims

The plaintiffs' equal protection argument is direct and straightforward: by permitting the franking of materials which may be sent for no purpose other than to advance incumbency, the franking statute affords campaign advantages to incumbents, seriously imbalancing the political process to the detriment of any challengers. Plaintiffs argue that because of its impact on rights to free speech under the First Amendment the discrimination worked by the franking statute may be justified only by demonstrating a compelling interest.

The cases offered by plaintiffs to support their argument that the government may not discriminate among candidates by unequally imposing handicaps on some or granting benefits to others deal almost exclusively with the same sort of content-based discrimination discussed briefly above—drawing lines of distinction by party affiliation or ideology. We find little discussion in case law relating to the advantages which incumbents may enjoy simply by virtue of their incumbency over any challengers who seek this in public office.

In Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976), for example, the Supreme Court held that patronage dismissals violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The basis of the holding, however, was not necessarily that an incumbent might use the system to tip the electoral balance unfairly against any challenger, but that the threat of dismissal severely restricted the political beliefs and associations of the employees affected. The Court held that the requirement that employees pledge political allegiance to one party or another, work for the election of other candidates of the incumbent party, contribute a portion of their wages to the party, or obtain the sponsorship of a member of the party, all in order to maintain their jobs imposed an unconstitutional condition on the right to continued employment. There is no similar condition in this case. The franking statute imposes no direct condition upon the right of any person to challenge an incumbent, to support one or another party in a particular election, or to use the mails. Its impact upon political speech and association is at most indirect, and then only to the extent that it may make campaign-related communication through the mails more expensive for a non-incumbent candidate than for the incumbent who seeks reelection and uses franked mail to promote that end.

We cannot overlook the fact that, despite their broadside objections to the franking statute, plaintiffs concede that the frank serves an essential public purpose in facilitating communication with constituents and that some sort of franking privilege is necessary in the performance of official congressional business. They concede that the problem is merely one of drawing lines—striking a proper balance between legitimate and illegitimate uses of the frank.

The franking statute effectively draws two lines of demarcation. The first is drawn by the granting of the franking privilege to Members of Congress only. In general, this distinguishes Congress from the general public, and also has the effect of drawing the line between incumbent and non-incumbent congressional candidates. Plaintiffs do not argue that non-incumbents should also be afforded the franking privilege. They seek only to limit its use by Members of Congress. The second line drawn by Congress draws a distinction between official and unofficial use of the frank. Our sole concern is with this second line of demarcation and to this we direct our attention.

Under present practice a mailing is considered to be "official" if, on its face, it falls within the permitted types (or at least outside of the prohibited types) of materials listed under section 3210. The statutory test does not look to motives, but only to "the type and content of the mail." § 3210(e). Plaintiffs argue that attention to content only, without considering the motives for sending a particular mailing, enables Members to use the frank for the unofficial purposes of promoting reelection. Plaintiffs thus fault the present franking statute and congressional practice for failing to subject franked mailings to a test of official versus unofficial motivation. Absent standards based on underlying motives, plaintiffs urge that the franking statute be modified to eliminate categories of mailings which have been prone to abuse in the past. We cannot accept plaintiffs' suggested cause of action.

Were the frank shown to be available and widely used for reelection purposes and had plaintiffs demonstrated that such use has a substantial detrimental impact on opposing candidates or members of the voting public seeking to educate themselves on the candidates and the issues, plaintiffs' claims, particularly those based on the First Amendment, would have considerable merit. But such level of interference with the electoral process has not been shown in this case. We are hesitant to apply a standard under the guise of strict judicial scrutiny to a situation where there has been no demonstration of significant harm to the plaintiffs' constitutional rights. The conceded and undisputed legitmate interests promoted by the franking statute are sufficient to justify the limited impacts on the rights of the plaintiff class and to satisfy the invocation of the rational basis test, which we apply in this case. We cannot hold the franking statute unconstitutional simply because it sets forth a standard to determine "official" uses of the frank different from that proposed by plaintiffs.

It is important to view the franking activities of Members of Congress from an overall perspective. It seems undeniable that all mailings, franked and unfranked, from any particular Member of Congress may be grouped into three types. The first type is composed of "official" mailings, those related directly to the legislative and representative functions of Congress. This is the type of communication which Members of Congress arguably are under a duty to provide and to which the frank has been extended over the past 200 years. At the other extreme are mailings which are on their face political or private and therefore "unofficial" in nature. Congress itself has recognized the dangers, constitutional as well as practical, of extending the franking privilege to these types of mailings and has excluded them or expressly prohibited them under the statute and rules in both Houses. Between these two extremes lies a class of mailings whose purposes are less easily discernible. For example, it is undeniable that Senator X, acting in his elected capacity, should have a right to make mailings within this middle area related to his official duties. It is equally obvious that this same individual acting as candidate for the Senate has an interest in mailing the same material to prospective voters to promote his campaign efforts. Thus the motivations, even behind a particular mailing, may be mixed. Plaintiffs' complaints here can only be about the actions and purposes of the candidate, however, and not the senator.

Congress drafted the franking statute expressly to include many of the types of mailings which unquestionably fall within this middle area. This of itself does not require that we invalidate the scheme as unconstitutional. The question before us is not whether the particular line which Congress has drawn between "official" and "unofficial" uses of the frank necessarily has the least possible potential, in comparison with other methods of drawing the line, for adversely affecting challengers' effective access to the mails. The question is only whether the line is a reasonable one.

A statutory scheme need not be drafted or even administered so as to eliminate completely all possible abuses before it is constitutionally acceptable. We can be concerned only with whether the standard adopted bears a rational relation to the twin goals at hand: one, to facilitate (even encourage) official communication and two, to discourage or eliminate unofficial communication. It is clear from the record that Congress has recognized the basic principle that government funds should not be spent to help incumbents gain reelection. The details of the franking scheme, including its distinction between official and unofficial mailings, appear to be rationally designed to work for that end. (It is relevant in this regard that the record in this case consists principally of abuses rather than routine uses of the franking privilege). It would be most inappropriate for the judiciary to step in and demand that Congress restructure this scheme under the circumstances of this case.

To state the obvious, it simply is impossible to draw and enforce a perfect line between the official and political business of Members of Congress. The franking privilege is only one of many perquisites afforded to them which may be turned one way or another into a campaign advantage over any challenger. We have already accepted as an assumption and stressed the fact that an incumbent is, by virtue of his incumbency alone, much more visible to the voting public than is a would-be challenger. He has greater access to the media, both local and national; he usually has one or more offices in his home district, in addition to his Washington office; he has a staff paid out of public funds; he has a WATS line for telephone calls which he may use to communicate with his constituents.

Plaintiffs do not suggest that the incumbents' use of these tools of office be strictly limited to purposes which cannot possibly contribute to efforts at reelection. This would be a most difficult standard to administer in any case, for each and every act of an elected representative may, in a political context, be seen as an effort to demonstrate that the voters' choice was a good one. It is impossible, without probing into the deepest thoughts and motives of an individual Member of Congress, to determine exactly why he votes as he does on a particular issue, why he casts a letter to a constituent in the terms in which it is cast, why he communicates with other Members of Congress as he does, why he assigns particular staff functions as he does, or why he does any of the myriad of things that a Member does in his day-to-day routine. It is no less difficult to apply and administer a subjective standard in the use of the frank. Moreover, we cannot require that such a standard be substituted for what we accept as an already reasonable objective standard adopted under section 3210.

For similar reasons, we cannot hold that the particular types of mailings to which plaintiffs object are so prone to abuse that they should not be permitted. Just as plaintiffs have identified the suitability of mass mailings (targeted or general), newsletters, questionnaires and other materials for campaign purposes, there is not a type of mailing challenged which is not also suitable for legitimate "official" purposes. Targeted mailings, for example, may be a means of directing discussion or information on particular issues to those groups in a particular Member's constituency which might be most affected, at the same time saving the cost of preparing and mailing information to individuals who are less likely to be interested. And notwithholding allegations that questionnaires are most often used to obtain demographic information beneficial to a candidacy, it goes without saying that any method of obtaining constituents' views and impressions on particular issues may be invaluable to a Member of Congress who truly considers himself responsible to the people.[14] It does little, therefore, for the plaintiffs to emphasize the potential in these types of mailings for abuse, without also acknowledging the legitimate ends to which they are put. We are not convinced by any of plaintiffs' arguments that there exists no rational and legitimate basis for Congress' decision to retain these particular "middle area" uses of the frank within the stated category of "official use," and we defer to the judgment embodied in the statute.

Prudential considerations

Our deference to Congress is guided also by important prudential considerations. We must give weight to the fact, mentioned earlier, that section 3210 was originally enacted in an attempt to curb widespread abuses of the franking privilege. It has since been refined by detailed regulations in each house to meet the more obvious of objections which arise even under its amended language. The House and Senate have also established machinery to monitor, review, and receive complaints concerning uses of the frank.[15] The plaintiffs seek to have the Congress, through judicial compulsion, "redraw the line" and strike a different balance. This we decline to do for at least two compelling reasons. First, the distinction between "official" and "unofficial" cannot be sharply defined or delineated and for the court to assume this burden would be an impossible task. Second, to grant the relief which plaintiffs seek would in effect require us to issue rules of behavior superseding those that Congress, a coordinate branch of government, has responsibly set for itself. It is not this Court's function to examine the policing efforts of committees created by Congress to deal with the particular types of concerns raised by plaintiffs in this case with an eye to compel even more refined standards and closer examination. The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia recently manifested a reluctance "to develop rules of behavior for the Legislative Branch," or "to monitor every action taken by a senator and his aide in an effort to determine whether it is sufficiently 'official' or too 'political,'" United States ex rel. Joseph v. Cannon, 642 F.2d 1373, 1384, 1385 (D.C. Cir. 1981). We follow course in this case.

Conclusion

We do not suggest that the franking privilege may never be shown to create such an imbalance in the campaign process as to constitute a cognizable interference with important rights. We hold only that the level of impact has not been shown to be sufficient in this case for us to assume the responsibility of redrafting a statute or promulgating regulations to govern the congressional use of the frank. Our rationale for rejecting plaintiffs' claims under the First and Fifth Amendments holds as well for the challenge raised under the General Welfare Clause of Article I, Section 8. We find no constitutional violation.

For the foregoing reasons we grant judgment to the defendants and defendant-intervenor and dismiss the complaint.

An order consistent with the foregoing has been issued this day.

[4] In providing that the frankability of mail matter shall be determined "by the type and content of mail sent, or to be sent," this section also overturned the effect of Hoellen, supra, in which Judge (now Justice) Stevens stated that "we should not close our eyes in the face of extrinsic evidence which reveals that an appearance of official business is nothing more than a mask for a private purpose." Hoellen, supra, at 526.

In the case of the Senate, judicial review, while apparently de novo, cannot take place until after the filing of the complaint and decision thereon by the Senate Committee. § 502(c).

In addition, the House Commission on Congressional Mailing Standards, pursuant to its Rule XLVI, has issued extensive regulations governing the use of the frank and rules of practice in proceedings before the Commission. Regulations on the Use of the Congressional Frank by Members of the House of Representatives (February, 1979).

[8] Adopted April 1, 1977 in S.R. 110. The Senate Select Committee on Ethics has similarly implemented its Rule XLVIII through the issuance of regulations. The latest of these are Regulations Governing the Use of the Mailing Frank by Members and Officers of the United States Senate (June 26, 1979).

[9] Present House Rules limit such mailings to six per year.

[10] Contained in plaintiffs' voluminous Statement of Material Facts Not in Dispute incorporating plaintiffs' Request for Admissions (570 requests) and defendants' responses thereto. The extensive response of defendant intervenor alone to plaintiffs' Request for Admissions comprises 622 pages.

[11] Plaintiffs object specifically to several types of mass mailings explicitly or implicitly permitted by the provisions of section 3210; mailings including self-laudatory material; reports concerning visits to Washington by constituents; solicitation of political support (falling short of the specific requests barred by the statute); congratulatory messages; and questionnaires.

[12] The additional issue of plaintiffs' standing to bring this action has been raised at numerous times during this litigation. Defendant-intervenor argues that, despite all the evidence offered by plaintiffs, there is little showing that the "injuries" suffered by members of the plaintiff group who have run against and lost to congressional incumbents were caused by operation of the frank. Our attention is then drawn to several cases, including Winpisinger v. Watson, 628 F. 2d 133 (D.C. Cir. 1980), for the principle that standing cannot be based on speculative and tenuous theories of causation and injury.

We do not regard the issue of standing as a frivolous one and acknowledge that there may be a legitimate concern over whether plaintiffs' limited showings are sufficient to establish standing. We also recognize that the type and cause of injuries claimed in this case are not easily subjected to proof. Rather than to resolve the complexities of this issue, we prefer to confine our holding to plaintiffs' constitutional claims.

[13] We cannot ignore the fact that the plaintiffs' arguments against this particular advantage of incumbency can also be directed against others, i.e., greater access to the media, local and national, one or more local district offices, staff paid out of public funds, WATS line for telephone calls to and from constituents, etc.

[14] While we need not agree with defendant-intervenor's sanguine appraisal that the typical member follows the advice of Edmund Burke to the voters of Bristol in 1774 and votes his own conscience rather than following the expressed wishes of his constituents, it is nonetheless true that members, to be successful representatives, must at least learn at the outset the views of those who put them in office. Thereafter, they must keep themselves informed.

[15] For example, each house has its own method for policing mass mailings, which, as must be apparent, are the greatest single source of plaintiffs' claims of abuse. In the House, before sending a mass mailing a Member must first submit the same to the Franking Commission for an advisory opinion. In the Senate all mass mailings must be registered with the Secretary of the Senate and are available for public inspection.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AND INVESTMENT ACT OF 1982

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join today as a cosponsor of S. 2094, the Reciprocal Trade and Investment Act of 1982. I believe this is an important measure which offers prudent remedies to many of the problems confronting our vital service and high technology industries.

As an original cosponsor, along with Senator HEINZ and Senator HART, of S. 2356, the High Technology Trade Act of 1982, I am delighted that the Senate Finance Committee has acted on S. 2094, which incorporates many of the provisions and furthers the aims of S. 2356.

As reported by the Senate Finance Committee, S. 2094 offers a careful balance of proposals designed to enhance the stability of two industries which must remain at the forefront of American industrial expansion in the decades ahead—the frontiers of high technology and the efficiency of American service industries.

I am a firm believer in the principles of free trade. The growth and maintenance of an open world economy for trade and investment is a common interest of all nations. But it is essential that this trade and investment go forward with a reasonable measure of equity. As we stated in the congressional findings section of the High Technology Trade Act, however:

International competition in high technology products is increasingly characterized by a high degree of government intervention through central planning, joint establishment of industrial objectives, subsidization, anticompetitive practices tolerated or fostered by government policy, non-tariff and tariff barriers, investment performance requirements, access to preferential financing, and sponsorship of limited-access joint research projects.

I do not believe the adoption of blatantly protectionist measures is the appropriate response to this situation. But I also do not believe that the U.S. Government should adopt a laissez faire attitude in the face of unfair foreign competition. I think it is particularly important for the Federal Government to take affirmative, remedial action when industries at the vanguard of American economic growth are threatened.

S. 2094 offers a carefully crafted series of proposals which establish negotiating objectives, insure that executive branch research and recommendations on trade barriers will be coordinated, and provide negotiating authority and access to "fast track" legislative remedies where needed. It would be simplistic to shy away from these reasonable proposals as protectionist. For this legislation is, in its essence, an agenda setter. Its passage would set forth for our trade competitors, for the American business community and for Federal policymakers a clear set of concerns and objectives to pursue and the authority to do so. This statement of congressional concern can only be constructive to each of the parties involved in the process of improving our international trade relationships.

I, therefore, welcome the Finance Committee report on S. 2094 and pledge my support for timely action here in the Senate to see the legislation enacted.

ANDREW CAVACOS RECEIVES OUTSTANDING CITIZEN AWARD

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, the Lord Baltimore Chapter of the American Hellenic Educational and Progressive Association (AHEPA) will honor Andrew Cavacos, a distinguished Baltimore citizen, with their annual Outstanding Citizen Award on Saturday, September 11, 1982.

Andrew Cavacos, a Baltimore native and pharmacist is proprietor of the Cavacos Drug Co., an historic landmark in the Baltimore neighborhood of Hampden, established by his father, Theodore, upon his arrival in this country from the Greek Ionian island of Kythera.

The Cavacos family has long been identified with public service and Andrew Cavacos' involvement in a wide range of community affairs reflects his family's tradition of service. He played a major role in the acquisition of the church located at the corner of Preston Street and Maryland Avenue in Baltimore, which now serves as the Greek Orthodox Cathedral of the Annunciation and has also been a steady contributor to the Greek-American press.

Andrew Cavacos was involved in establishing the first little league for baseball in the United States. He also founded and conducted the all nations exhibit and was one of the original planners of the "I am an American Day" parade held in Baltimore City. Additionally, during World War II, he operated a USO post in his Baltimore home.

Andrew Cavacos was among the first Greek-American gubernatorial appointments in Maryland history serving four terms as police magistrate and has always been active in civic affairs both in promoting his own community and the State of Maryland during his many trips around the world.

I want to congratulate the Lord Baltimore Chapter of the AHEPA, of which I am a member, for honoring this outstanding American and public spirited citizen for his many productive years of service to church, community and Nation. I want to join with his family and friends in commending him for this most deserved honor.

SOUTH DAKOTA HAS ANOTHER WINNER

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, several weeks ago I gave a speech here in the Senate commenting on the fact that South Dakota is the home of five young women who have won national competitions and are reigning national queens. Since that time a sixth young South Dakotan has won a national title and I want to congratulate her and her family for this outstanding achievement.

Miss Nancy Hoar of Rapid City, S. Dak., was recently named the Little Britches Rodeo Queen in the national competition in Colorado Springs. Nancy, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Darrell Hoar, is a senior at Stevens High School in Rapid City and has been an active and successful participant in South Dakota's 4-H program. In fact, last year Nancy was South Dakota's 4-H Rodeo Queen.

These competitions are an excellent test of young people's abilities and talents. For instance, Nancy had to successfully compete in a number of rodeo events to demonstrate her skill and expertise. She was also judged on her speaking ability and personality. I had the opportunity to meet Nancy when I was in Rapid City recently and was very impressed with her poise and intelligence. We are all very proud of this young lady. Nancy exemplifies the dedication and self-discipline characteristic of our home State. I'm sure my colleagues here in the U.S. Senate join me in wishing Nancy the very best in her future endeavors.

END THE REPRESSION IN POLAND

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, over the past 10 days the people of Poland and the people of the United States have courageously reaffirmed their strong commitment to Solidarity and basic human rights. Labor Day, this past Monday in the United States, was an opportunity to recall both the achievements of American workers and the challenges they still face. But in Poland, August 31 was a more difficult day, the second anniversary of the historic Gdansk agreement which led to the free and independent Solidarity trade union. Unlike the first anniversary, it also marked 8 months of cruel repression of that movement, and of freedom in Poland, by the Polish martial law regime under the shadow of Soviet bayonets.

In the demonstrations over this second anniversary, five Poles were killed, and many more were wounded and arrested, in protests against continuation of martial law. But the Polish struggle for liberty goes on. Despite martial law, the faith and aspirations of the Polish people have not abated. The Polish spirit is not broken, but it is frustrated and discouraged in the face of continued military repression.

America and the West would be false to our own past and principles if we stood silent in the harsh circumstances of the present repression in Poland. For the United States and our allies, it is both right and sensible to take a clear stand—and to take measured and meaningful actions that will give substance to our words and warnings. We must continue to do all we can to bring an end to martial law in Poland. We must insist on the reinstatement of Solidarity and the release of Lech Walesa and all other political prisoners. We must make clear our continued commitment to free and constructive dialog among the Catholic Church, Solidarity, and the Polish authorities.

And we and our allies must restore our own unity not only in pursuing these goals but in the means we adopt to carry them out. We must resolve our current disputes over the Soviet gas pipeline to Europe, and over future East-West trade and credits, so that we can concentrate our attention once again where it belongs: on the cause of freedom and security in Europe, not a growing rift in the Western Alliance.

In the end, the ruthless practice of repression cannot endure in Poland, in Eastern Europe, or elsewhere in the world. The Polish generals and their partners in the Kremlin have made a critical error in their plan. They have forgotten the Polish spirit. They have underestimated the Polish people. They do not understand the power of the idea of freedom in Poland and in all history. It is an idea whose time will come again and again, springing up from a well of faith and hope, just as the flower crosses continue to appear and reappear across the length and breadth of Warsaw.

The correspondent of the New York Times in Poland, John Darnton, has written numerous thoughtful accounts of the political, social, and economic forces that have shaped the Polish existence since the birth of Solidarity in the summer of 1980. I ask unanimous consent that his articles of August 22 and September 1 appear in the RECORD, so that we may be reminded of the great goals and the great promise of Solidarity, and the hope it represents for the Polish people.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 22, 1982]

POLAND STILL DEFIANT—AN AMERICAN CORRESPONDENT IN WARSAW RELIVES THE DAYS WHEN THE WORKERS AROSE TO CHALLENGE THE COMMUNIST PARTY AND WERE BEATEN BACK BY FORCE

(By John Darnton)

Dusk, with a steady, bone-chilling drizzle. An abandoned concrete watchtower sits at one end of the bridge. The car slowly dodges the potholes.

The span over the Oder is ugly and dilapidated. Neither the East Germans on one side nor the Poles on the other would dream of repairing it, a sign of their mutual disdain. The river below is a thin brown stream, disappointing, considering the bloody course it has wended through history.

The East German guardhouse squats on the other side, technically on Polish ground. Eric Ambler would love it here. The reek of black tobacco, the hard stares at the passport held under the gooseneck lamp, the inquisitions, the rubber stamp pounded down with an executioner's swing.

But the waiting is nerve-racking, hours and hours behind the drome of windshield wipers. The East Germans are being relentless. Car panels torn out; body searches. The guards hold up each piece of paper and read it, sometimes upside down. This is strange, for it is February 1982 and Poland, plunged into martial law, is supposedly once again a reliable "fraternal" nation. The Poles returning from visits abroad look nervous. They are bringing in coffee, soap, meat wrapped in plastic bags that bleed on the wet pavement. Many, you are sure, are smuggling in gold, clothes to sell, zlotys purchased in West Berlin at one-tenth the official rate. There are guns everywhere; officials moving with abrupt darting motions; a pervasive sense of fear.

And then, incredibly, it is over. The road beyond is deserted and dips around a bend into a forest. It is dark.

Half a mile ahead, five men in Polish Army uniforms step out of the bushes. Their bayonets gleam in the headlights. The commander flags you down ferociously. He leans against the roof, demands to know your nationality, where you are coming from.

Then he reaches into his pocket. He thrusts something through the window. It is an old, crumpled French note, 100 francs. "I was wondering," he says, "if you would be good enough to exchange this for dollars. I'll give you a good rate."

You have left behind the Oder, the efficiency, the stares, and you are back in Poland, the same old inscrutable, confused, troublemaking, muddling-through Poland, martial law or no martial law.

It is also the third Poland I have seen in my nearly three years here. First, there was the Poland of Edward Gierek, the former party chairman, with his ambitious development schemes who is now in disgrace. That was a time of cynicism, apathy and pretense—and of prosperity disappearing before everyone's eyes like milk down a drain. Then there was the Poland of Solidarity and Lech Walesa. It was a time when horizons suddenly opened up, the blinkers came off, and there was hope of creating a livable, productive, nonschizophrenic society within the Soviet bloc. And now the Poland of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, a Poland of tanks and underground leaflets, where the structures of control are in place, but just barely—a crumbling facade with a scaffold around it. In this new Poland, the fear and the dream commingle and everyone waits for something to happen—something . . . .

Confusing—this moonscape. On our first day in Poland, my wife Nina, and I dine at Bazyliszek, the one luxury restaurant in the Old Town section of Warsaw. An atmosphere of faded Viennese elegance, with crystal chandeliers, brass samovars, wild boar on the menu and a string quartet in the corner playing Mozart. Outside, on the cobblestones of Market Square, sits a young woman with straight blond hair, a gold star pasted under one eye and a guitar. She sings an old Dave Van Ronk song in strangely accented English. The words rise up, distinct between the spaces in the Mozart: "Baby, you been away too-o-o long."

The Old Town is, for my money, the most magnificent nub of any city in the world. In Nuremberg, Cracow and Prague, the medieval buildings totter and list with authentic age. Here they are as neat as picket-fence slats, instant Gothic, dating from the 1950's, when the Government decided to rebuild the heaping ruins of the Nazi-occupation era brick by brick. Crafts that had died out over a century ago were revived; old Canaleto paintings were copied to re-create the archways, gutters and gargoyles.

Later, I drive by the sprawling housing developments on the outskirts of Warsaw. Huge concrete slabs are scattered about like giant cinder blocks, monotonous in design and appalling in their cheap regard for living space. The priorities sink in the sense of a golden, royal past, a desperate attempt to climb backward in time, and a gray future that crawls ahead without a vision of what shall be or should be. I have been here three weeks and I have yet to meet a self-professed Communist.

But, house-hunting, I discover the money-eyed operators. In the exclusive Mokotow section, I come up against the same landlord four times. It is illegal in Poland to own more than one house. He feels compelled to explain. One house belongs to his wife; another, to his sister; a third, to his son. His son, I learn later, is in primary school.

The landlord shows me an upstairs bedroom. Its window has been bricked down to the size of an envelope. Regulations, he explains: This way, it's only a storage room. In the living room, metal rods hang down from the ceiling, so low that we have to stoop.

Technically, he has reduced the room's dimensions so that it's not a room at all. Don't worry, he assures me; the rods will come down as soon as the inspectors come and go.

The rent for the house, officially set at 9,000 zlotys ($300) a month, will be paid to the State, but he wants five times that sum for himself, in dollars, under the table. Also, to reduce the Government's take, he proposes that we say we are sharing the house. He begins to pace off "his" half of the kitchen. I protest. The deal falls through. I hear him mutter, "Idiot. Doesn't know what country he's in."

An official guide is showing me around. He seems a bit defensive about my interest in the 500,000 Jews who lived in Warsaw before the Holocaust. He shows me where the tracks were of the trains that took them off to Treblinka. The raised foundations of earth under the high-rise apartments of the former ghetto still contain human bones. The monument to the heroes of the ghetto uprising is built with the very same granite that Hitler had planned to use to commemorate the liquidation of Poland's Jews. The monument is impressive. But it is the only one in Warsaw without flowers.

The guide then takes me to a church. He guides me stealthily down an aisle to plaques on the wall in memory of the war dead. Lists and lists of names, towns, dates. Finally one name leaps out: "Katyn."

"The date, the date, look at the date," whispers the guide.

I see the year 1940. I realize he is telling me the church believes that the Katyn Forest massacres of an estimated 15,000 Polish prisoners of war took place at a time when the area was in Soviet hands—that it was Stalin's work, not Hitler's, as Moscow claims. And the deeper meaning that this is the agony of Eastern Europe, where Germans kill Jews and Russians kill Poles, where the flagstones are steeped in blood, and where thousands can slip into graves unnoticed by history.

The next day, I go into a furniture store to buy a chair.

"Nie ma" ("There are none"), says the saleswoman, barely looking up from her newspaper.

But how about all those chairs in the window?

"Dekoracja" ("Decoration"), she says, mumbling something to herself. I think I hear that word again: "Idiot."

NOVEMBER 1979

The town of Czechowice-Dziedzice, in the mining region of Silesia. A flat landscape of blackened smokestacks, dirty red-brick buildings and concrete high-rises, with an occasional clump of sad, scraggly pines. There has been an explosion at a mine. Two men are dead and 20 are trapped in a tunnel 600 feet underground, where a methane-gas fire is still raging.

It is the third mine disaster in the past month; in all, some 43 lives have been lost. The accidents coincide with a new brigade system that keeps the mines going 24 hours a day, seven days a week. The Government is desperate for foreign exchange; it is squeezing the miners for more and more of its "black gold."

Appointments with officials at the mine are made for me at the Mining Ministry office in Katowice, 32 miles away; they send me off with handshakes. I arrive at Czechowice-Dziedzice and something has gone wrong. The official has been called away, the gate is locked. I bounce back and forth for two days. A local party secretary finally loses patience and tells me to get the hell out of town. My car is followed by a Polonez, the favored model of the U.B., the secret police.

My translator and I find a small bar named Barborka, after St. Barbara, the patron saint of miners. We enter a smoky cavern smelling of beer and sweat, and the bawl of conversation stops. Hostile eyes rimmed with coal dust turn to the stranger in a necktie. No one moves to ease our path to the bar.

Two beers later, my translator explains to the nearest table that I am an American journalist who has read about the mine disaster and has come to see what happened. A miner lurches up; his face is three inches from my own.

"First thing," he says, "you've got to realize that all the papers in this country are crap—crap and lies."

"They're scared of the truth and they're scared of us," says his companion. "And, by Christ, the Government better do something and do it fast, or we'll do something ourselves."

There follows, over the next hour, an unremitting stream of complaints, threats and curses, despite the presence of a shadow who creeps in and sits down nearby. Rarely have I encountered such burning anger, a pure, white-hot, we're-going-to-get-the-bastards anger. And these are the miners, the elite of the Polish work force, coddled with special meat shops and goods unavailable to others. These are the men who refused to join in the anti-Government upheavals of 1956, 1970 and 1976.

We toast cousins in Chicago. Leaving, I see the Polonez sitting empty down the street.

The next morning, I return to the mine. The party secretary tells me I got his workers drunk to elicit the kind of information spies are interested in.

And the fire in the mine? "None of your business," he says. "And don't you worry. Everything here is under control."

Three days later, they bring up the dead bodies.

When the revolt comes, it is deeper and more disciplined than anyone expected. At the Lenin shipyard in Gdansk, the strikers' faces are dirt-streaked but radiant, solemn and lighthearted at the same time. The workers lounge about on the grass, listening to their leaders on loudspeakers, and, on transistor radios, to the BBC, Voice of America and Radio Free Europe. They marvel at the speed of news when it flows freely; they can take a vote and hear it come back over the little box within the hour.

The hall swarms with delegates from other factories joining the strike. A life-size plaster staute of Lenin gazes reflectively into the distance. To my surprise, I am given a seat on the raised stage of the strike committee. The delegates sit at long tables, as at a banquet—dockworkers, shipbuilders, tool-die machinists, assembly-line workers, bus drivers. Some write the names of their factories on placards as if they were attending a Rotarian convention.

More strikes are announced. Somewhere in the list, after an electrical factory in Elblag, I hear: "The New York Times." A cheer goes up. With everyone expecting an attack by armed troops, the foreign press seems to offer a glimmer of protection. At least, the world will know.

Food is brought to the locked gate by well-wishers. Overhead, a plane drops leaflets proclaiming the strike is over.

Lech Walesa is rushing around, bobbing his head in hurried conferences, giving orders, grabbing the microphone to calm the workers with joking patter. Only a month ago, he was an unknown, unemployed activist for the minuscule Baltic Coast Free Trade Union. I talk to Anna Walentynowicz, the 50-year-old crane operator whose dismissal sparked the strike. She describes the agony of 1970, when workers were shot down. She got into trouble later for passing a hat to buy flowers to their memory. This time, it will be different, she says. No more marching through the streets; stay close to the machines and wait. I ask her for her political views. "I'm a democrat," she says. "But mostly, I believe in God."

The strikes are still on. Stefan Cardinal Wyszynski, the Primate of Poland, delivers a sermon that is actually broadcast over state television. A group of workers in the Gdynia shipyard are huddled in a room, hanging on his every word. He is their spiritual monarch, for 30 years the only authority they have respected.[1]

Cardinal Wyszynski calls for peace, calm, reason, respect. True, he criticizes the Government, but he warns that strikes could pose a threat to the nation; he pleads for workers to be patient and postpone some of their demands. He refers to the partitions of Poland: "Let us remember with what difficulty we regained our freedom after 125 years." All this mixed in with religious metaphors honed to perfection from his decades of slipping elliptical meanings past the Communist authorities.

The speech is of critical importance. The church, in so many words, has told the workers to stop. What effect will it have?

The room is silent. A strike leader strides to the front and flips off the television. "Friends," he says, "as we have just heard, the Primate supports us right down the line."

A roar of applause and cheers. I learn, at that moment, a fundamental truth about the Roman Catholic Church in Poland. It resides so deeply in the people's hearts, in those recesses of nationalism and legend, that it can never be uprooted. When it words come into conflict with its own image, they are not ignored, they are magically transposed. The image is stronger; it is, in a sense, the real church.

Five days later, Solidarity is born.

OCTOBER 1980

The country is opening up—a headlong tide. New groups are forming. Liberals, reformers, even radicals, are taking over institutions, such as the journalists' union, that have been instruments of party control. Yet all this is unfolding peacefully, methodically, even democratically. It all seems part of what Jecek Kuron, the brilliant, barrel-chested long-time dissident, calls a "self-limiting revolution." The idea is to turn the authorities upside down without overthrowing them; to transform Poland without disturbing the geopolitical balance and bringing in the Russians. It is a tricky business.

Newspapers, incredibly, are printing news. I am having tea at the house of a friend, a former Polish ambassador, when a political activist arrives. Breathlessly, he pulls a typewritten document from his coat lining and says conspiratorially, "Have you seen the latest demands?"

[1] Cardinal Wyszynski died in May 1981.

My host answers graciously, "Thank you, I have. They're in today's newspapers."

Even the security apparatus seems a bit more human. Janusz Onyszkewicz, Solidarity's national spokesman, is on the telephone talking to a friend in London about whether a Polish exile should return. "Tell him it's safe," Onyszkiewicz says.

"I don't know," says the friend.

"Tell him everything's changed now," says Onyszkiewicz.

"I'm not sure."

A third voice cuts into the line. "For God's sake, tell him we say it's O.K."

NOVEMBER 1980

I go to a political cabaret. There is a curious mix in the audience, dissident intellectuals seated across the room from party and Government officials. But one central table up front is empty until the final moment. When it fills, there is a stir; eyes turn, waiters rush to push in chairs; people drift by, hoping for a nod of recognition. The latecomers are steel-mill workers and Solidarity activists. They are the new celebrities.

Something of a social revolution is under way. It is consummate paradox to feel the winds of class warfare in a Communist state. It is as if all those statues of "worker heroes" had suddenly come alive.

The party is widely seen as the agent of exploitation. People are leaving it in droves. Across the country, workers strike to back up demands that hospitals, clinics, rest homes and vacation spas reserved for the police and party elite be given to "the people." Fancy cars left on the streets overnight are likely to have their windshields smashed.

At the Ursus tractor factory outside Warsaw, thousands gather in the movie hall to prepare for a strike. The issue is the "Narozniak affair," the arrest of a Solidarity volunteer for disseminating a classified state document. Tempers are rising. A lanky political dissident gives advice on how to stand up under police interrogation. Another reads a poem about the glory of dying for Poland; it sends shudders of excitement through the hall. One young man grips the mike earnestly and begins with a gaffe—"Comrades," he calls out. Twitters and chuckles. He blushes deeply and recovers, but two minutes later he slips again—"Another thing we should remember, comrades . . . ." This time there are howls of laughter. Flustered and red-faced, he can only sit down. Party membership has become a scarlet letter.

Things are moving fast. Films previously banned by the censor are playing on television. Universities are preparing to choose their own rectors by democratic elections. Parliament is becoming fractious. There is a kind of national euphoria; the whole country resembles a university coffeehouse plunged into frenetic discussions about unions, socialism, society. It seems that no meeting can adjourn before 3 in the morning.

Passports for travel abroad are available almost for the asking. It's as if the world has suddenly opened up. No matter that the neighboring "fraternal" countries have sealed their borders: Who wants to go there? Poles are coming back from the West to sniff the breezes—writers and scholars who left in official disgrace in 1968, émigrés who had vowed never to set foot in the country again.

New Year's Eve is a frenzied round of parties. The toasts become more and more outrageous, the champagne spills onto the floor. Men kiss each other on the cheek, women hug each other and exchange wishes in intimate tones. Jan, my sardonic friend, raises his glass and says: "And to you, as a journalist, I wish a Soviet invasion." Our friends laugh. It is too unthinkable.

Walking home in the middle of the street, we meet other groups of revelers. Beautiful Ania, who had looked so drawn and sad in the picture taken years before for a passport that never came, sighs and breathes deeply of the dank air. She opens her arms, as though to the night, and says: "All my life I've wanted to live in a free country. And now, just to think, my own country is becoming free."

JANUARY 1981

Breakfast with Lech Walesa at the Solec Hotel, a sort of rundown Polish version of a Holiday Inn. Two busloads of Soviet tourists pull up. They enter—bulky, chattering, the big-bosomed women, the men in their crinkly suits. How will they react when they see Walesa, the devil incarnate, the man threatening to bring down their empire?

They sit down. They order breakfast as if they own the place. They eat. Nothing happens. Of course they know the name, but not the face: He is so dangerous that they've never been shown a picture of him.

I look at Walesa and I realize that I know the face but not the man. How many times have I interviewed him? Maybe 10 or 15. How many times have I seen him sitting in his office, presiding at meetings, speaking to crowds? Maybe 30 or 40. And yet he remains elusive.

He has become such an international superstar there seems to be little left over. The legend of Walesa as dyed-in-the-wool worker, churchgoer, folk hero is beginning to overshadow the man. He is, without doubt, a gifted-leader—courageous, instinctive, articulate. But there is a darker side to his nature—his dictatorial tendencies, his pettiness, his intolerance. These traits have been coming to the fore, affecting his leadership. Some of his top lieutenants are becoming disenchanted; the movement is in danger of splitting.

Walesa repeatedly says that it is unity—millions of unarmed workers standing shoulder to shoulder against the state—that has made Solidarity into what it is. If that goes, the union is lost.

FEBRUARY 1981

The Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Warsaw's Victory Square. The tomb, containing the ashes of a Polish soldier who died in the fighting that repelled a Soviet invasion in 1920, has become a rallying point for all kinds of demonstrations. It is guarded at all times by four Polish soldiers standing erect and immobile. Every few hours, they are replaced by four others, who goose-step from a garrison across the square. On this day, Rural Solidarity, the new independent farmers' union, has been refused legal status by the courts. The farmers, large men with calloused hands, whose Sunday suits are rumpled from all-night bus trips, are confused and angry. They march to the tomb.

The crowd grows; there are thousands. Speeches start up. Tough, defiant words are shouted. Suddenly, from across the square, come the guards. They march straight for the tomb, right toward the crowd—they have no choice. They get closer, 10 feet away, five feet.

Suddenly, the crowd parts, an aisle opens up, and, as the soldiers march through, a chant rises: "Long live the Polish Army!" "God bless the army!"

The soldiers take their places. I look at one of them. He is ramrod stiff and expressionless. But tears flow down his cheeks.

The lines in front of the stores seem endless. They practically merge into each other. The huddled, shivering figures conjure up visions of revolution and turmoil. In reality, the country is remarkably quiet, even subdued. The shortages are so bad that conspiracy theories develop. The Government, it is rumored, is intentionally holding goods off the market to blacken Solidarity. One writer tells his tablemates he has it on good authority that the goods are being stored in a secret tunnel constructed by the Nazis during the occupation. It's hard to tell if he's joking.

The strikes continue sporadically. They sound worse when they are read about outside the country, making it seem that the whole place is swirling in a vortex. But many of the strikes are local affairs, undertaken to oust a local administrator, or to get a police building converted to a clinic, or just to test muscle. I suspect they're not as detrimental to the economy as the Government makes out. I'm at one factory when a one-hour strike ends. The workers move dutifully over to the assembly line, but the conveyor belt doesn't move. "We don't have any parts, anyway," one worker explains.

But the economy, strapped for foreign exchange because of Gierek's live-now, pay-later borrowing policy, is in a state of collapse. A group of farmers from the south persuade the Solidarity chapter at the Ursus factory to build tractors for them on weekends. They go to another chapter and borrow the money, which is to be repaid with potatoes and cabbage. It's the only way to get anything done: Bypass the state altogether.

Mismanagement and inefficiency are rife. Goods are shipped to the wrong places, essential parts are missing, things are ordered and don't arrive. Cigarettes almost run out because there is no glue. Writers, who are guaranteed an allotment of paper, are composing novels on the backs of rejected manuscripts. I hear of a chocolate factory where no chocolates are being produced because there is no paper to wrap them in. But everyone goes to work, punching the time clock in and out.

Back in August 1980, our maid, Kasia Trzcinska, suggested matter-of-factly that I should meet her son, Jurek. I put her off. A few weeks later, she raised the subject again. I explained that I would love to meet her son and her whole family, but that I was up to my neck trying to write about Solidarity and all the changes shaking Poland.

Not long after that, her son telephoned. "I'm coming to Warsaw tomorrow," he announced.

"Good," I said, not very enthusiastically.

"I'll be driving down with some other people," he said. "Lech Walesa, Bogdan Lis, a few others. You see, we have this new union we're trying to get registered."

Jurek Trzcinski, it turned out, was a top Solidarity leader. A large man with a rakish mustache, he had a bemused expression that he put on to parry my queries about Soviet intervention. From Jurek I derived my respect for the integrity, courage and basic level-headedness of the Polish working class. Night after night, he explained the goals—not to drag Poland out of the Warsaw Pact, not to overthrow the state, but to set things right. "We just want a decent country," he would say.

Jurek often visited us with Bogdan Lis, Walesa's right-hand man. One day, they came from a meeting with striking farmers. Lis pinned a new button, a green Solidarity badge, on the lapel of my youngest daughter, 7-year-old Liza. She stood straight, eyes wide and solemn.

"Do you know about Solidarity?" Lis asked her.

"Yes," she replied.

"And what is it?" he prodded.

"Solidarity wants to make the Polish people free."

With a whoop of pleasure, he hugged her and spun her into the air.

For some reason, that scene flashed through my mind when my phone and telex went dead at 11:10 on the night of Dec. 12, 1981, and I drove through the streets to file a story and encountered police vans closing off both ends of the block where Solidarity's Warsaw headquarters is located.

Martial law came down like a sledgehammer. It caught everyone off guard. Solidarity's leaders, who had arrived at Gdansk for a general meeting, were brought meekly down the stairwells of their hotels, their hands behind their backs. Many of our friends were dragged out of bed, some not even given time to put on their shoes. When Walesa was seized at his Gdansk apartment in the early hours of Dec. 13 and flown to Warsaw, he was convinced, reliable sources told me later, that he was going to be thrown out of the plane.

Jurek evaded arrest and went into hiding. But shortly afterward, four policemen with a dog came to his apartment for his wife. She shouted at them: "Criminals, bandits! I will not go with you—you'll have to shoot me right here." Her 8-year-old daughter screamed, "Mama!" and her 87-year-old mother threw herself at a policemen's feet, begging them to leave her daughter alone. But they arrested Jurek's wife and dragged her away.

One reason the military takeover came as such a surprise sounds a bit ludicrous in retrospect. There was no provision in the Polish Constitution for a state of emergency; a bill that would allow for one was being prepared for Parliament. Until the bill passed, the thinking ran, a military crackdown couldn't happen. So great was the illusion that democracy had already taken root that it was difficult to imagine the authorities acting illegally.

The key to the operation was isolation. The whole nation was cut off from the rest of the world and plunged into a blackout. All communications were severed, all travel banned, all meetings prohibited. Every household was isolated from every other, every factory, every division within a factory. The power of the union lay in numbers and concerted action, which depended on communication, openness and visibility. Once these were blotted out with curfews, roadblocks, dead telephones and jammed radio broadcasts, the power dissipated.

The generals did more than arrest 6,000 Solidarity leaders and supporters. Figuratively, they placed the entire population under arrest.

I climb the stairs to the third-floor apartment of an old friend, a journalist and writer who loved to exchange theories and gossip over the kitchen table. He opens the door a crack, peers out and steps onto the landing.

"I can't see you," he says. "They just hauled me in. I was warned not to talk to any foreigners."

His eyes are dark circles. I have never seen them like that before.

The first week of martial law, it snowed heavily. The snow is a metaphor for the stillness and deadness that have descended upon the land. There are strikes, but they are broken up brutally by army tanks and the ZOMO, the dreaded paramilitary police in their camouflage uniforms. At two mines in Silesia, miners stay underground for weeks, convinced that the entire country is on strike. Only when their wives tell them this is not true do they give up and come to the surface, defeated and bitter.

I go to the Huta Warszawa steel mill the morning after a strike there has been broken. About 100 workers cluster about the front gate. They describe how their factory was surrounded by tanks, how the strike leaders were isolated in one part of the plant and the women started crying and fear set in. "We gave up without a struggle," says one man, still disbelieving.

As we are talking, a man in a cloth overcoat comes over and loudly demands to see my identification. The crowd turns on him. "Let's lynch the bastard," someone shouts.

Another man, in a fine imported suede coat, sidles up and politely but firmly orders me to leave.

For Western journalists, accustomed to freedoms of news coverage unthinkable in the rest of the Soviet bloc, it is as if a tight net has been drawn around the country overnight. Borders are sealed to all but a departing trickle of foreigners. Telexes and telephones are dead. Within days, heavy-handed censorship is instituted.

We are followed and at times harassed. My Volvo begins getting flat tires from nails, screws and sharpened belt buckles. A television series called "Who Is Who?" centers on three American diplomats who are called spies; the aim is to cut contacts between Poles and foreigners. The police spread the word that anyone passing petitions or information to Western journalists is liable to be charged with treason and could draw a 15-year prison sentence.

Remarkably, none of my contacts—those who are still at liberty—drop away. But our meetings are fraught with cloak-and-dagger intrigue. We arrange to bump into each other at public locations, in front of a certain picture at the National Museum or in front of a certain post-office box. They slip me notes and underground bulletins. A hiding place is arranged for further written communication.

Every two days, I meet with an especially valuable source, a young man I'll call Karol. We set up an elaborate system of rendezvous points, mostly coffeehouses in the Old Town; if he is not at one, I am to go on to another. I notice that he is almost always a few minutes late. Before he comes, a young woman enters, surveys the room inconspicuously and leaves, barely glancing in my direction.

During one of our talks, I mention the risk he is running and ask him why he is doing it. "Must have been all those movies I saw in my youth about the resistance," he jokes. Like him, I feel as if I'm in a movie most of my waking hours.

The journalists' major preoccupation is getting the story out. There is a single secret channel available once a day. We use it for a pooled dispatch, which goes to every newspaper and radio station in the United States that asks for it. Slipping other stories past border guards strains ingenuity, especially since the authorities begin strip-searching suspicious-looking passengers at the airport. Somehow, one young man walks through with stories stuffed into both of his boots.

One of my stories gets out on a ferry to Sweden. Another is slipped under a cushion in a railroad car that goes through East Germany. A third is stuffed into the bottom of a Marlboro cigarette pack that is then resealed. There is no way of knowing which of them, if any, reaches New York.

Finally, I hit upon a sure-fire system. Because there are no facilities in Poland for developing color film, the Poles permit some photograhers to send their film out undeveloped. The photographers are closely watched anyway, so the film is deemed safe. One of them photographs three of my stories; the undeveloped roll is passed by the censor and ends up in Bonn, where a lab technician, in developing the film, finds a message to pass the copy on to New York.

Poles were proud of the alliance between intellectuals and workers in Solidarity, although differences between them remained. The differences are there under martial law, too. A friend, who is a writer and critic, was detained, and in his jail cell he met another detainee, a bus driver. They talked.

"Do you have any children?" asked the bus driver.

"Yes," the writer replied, "two small children."

"So do I. Were yours awake when they came for you?"

"Thank God, they were asleep."

"Yeah," said the bus driver. "Mine were sleeping too. But I woke them up. I wanted them to remember all their lives how those bastards came and took away their father."

The incident set the writer to thinking. Intellectuals, he concluded, were not "fierce" enough. "We think too much. Workers really know how to hate and how to pass that hatred on."

Martial law has solved nothing, because the Government has done nothing. So far, it has moved neither to create a "national accord" nor to outlaw Solidarity outright. A Polish journalist compares the situation to "a patient slowly waking up after a powerful anesthetic and finding that no operation has taken place.

Others compare it to the Nazi occupation, even though it is clearly far from that. They seem to do this for effect, to indicate the depth of the anger and alienation from the regime. They talk of "the war" as shorthand for "state of war," the martial-law provision. It's a curious turn of phrase, lending a kind of melodrama to what was, when all is said and done, a military operation accomplished with little bloodshed. I wonder if it isn't a psychological crutch of sorts, a way of covering what some concede is their shame over the fact that there wasn't more resistance.

Curiously, regard for the army is still high. The hatred is heaped upon the ZOMO. With their reliability open to question, the conscripted army troops were given only backup tasks during strike-breaking and were quickly withdrawn whenever they fraternized with civilian workers. This does not augur well for a regime whose power now rests upon military might. The army's loyalty has not been tested fully, and how it would respond if things got worse and orders were given to fire upon strikers or demonstrators is open to question. Government officials bristle when the word "junta" is used, but the military is dominant in the power structure and the party shows no signs of reviving.

Officials parrot the line that Poland was on the verge of civil war, that anarchy was threatening to suck it under, and that martial law was a last, desperate chance to save the nation. But they have difficulty mustering evidence to support these claims. Certainly there was no "anarchy" in the streets, in the sense of disorders, nor was there any sign of an opposition ready to take up arms. There was, on the other hand, widespread realization that the political situation was veering out of control and that Solidarity was again preparing to mount a challenge to the party.

This has led to the notion among some observers in the West that Solidarity brought on martial law by going "too far" in its demands. But it could also be argued that the party went back on the power-sharing arrangement struck in Gdansk in August 1980. Most of the 21 original demands of the Lenin shipyard strikers remained unfulfilled.

Faced with the party's intransigence, Solidarity's leadership adopted more radical stances and did battle over once-untouchable issues. But the extremists in the union never really gained control. And the union's actions had a way of ending up more moderate than its rhetoric.

At the end, the union tried—naivley, it turned out—to bypass the Polish party altogether and address itself directly to Moscow. This was the significance of Solidarity's call, at its final meeting on Dec. 12, 1981, for a national referendum on membership in the Warsaw Pact. The union counted on a vote for continued membership; the idea was to convince Moscow that the military guarantee the Russians needed could be provided not just by the Polish party but by Polish society as a whole. The meeting was seized upon as the pretext for the crackdown, although Western military experts believe the move must have been planned much earlier, if only for logistical reasons.

All along, the great unknown was how much latitude the Soviet Union would allow. Clearly conscious of the costs of intervention, Moscow displayed a tolerance that surpassed the expectations of many in the West. What Moscow could not tolerate was any tampering with the Polish party's sacred "leading role." In the Kremlin's view, the party was the one and only reliable instrument of control; without it, both "socialism" and Soviet domination fell apart.

The inherent contradictions were insurmountable. A Communist Party with minority support was trying to pull an entire country away from the direction it wanted to go in. It was struggling with a new, popular rival. Anything that Moscow did to bolster or bully it only reinforced the conviction that it was the agent of alien rule. The "leading role" was a fiction whose time had come.

In retrospect, the critical turning point came in March 1981, when the union voted a nationwide general strike to protest police beatings in Bydgoszcz. That was a do-or-die moment, when the union's strength was at a peak, the resolve of the authorities shaky and Moscow's intentions unclear. A general strike, if won, might have forced the authorities into honest cooperation.

Instead, Walesa and a few other negotiators bypassed the union's democratic decision-making procedures to negotiate a last-minute settlement. This opened up fissures in the movement and strengthened hardliners in the party. Union negotiators said afterward that the authorities had informed them that the Russians would invade if they did not give way. History may never know if that was true or not.

Jurek, I learn, has been arrested. He has gone on trial in Gdynia with eight other defendants. They are charged with distributing antistate leaflets and fomenting a strike at a naval academy. The strike, such as it was, occurred at a time when classes were suspended, and it was quickly called off.

The trial is brief. Even relatives of the accused find it hard to get into the courtroom. Key defense witnesses are not allowed to speak. In his summation, the judge passes quickly over the charges and emphasizes that some of the accused were known Solidarity activists. The sentences are preordained and severe. Jurek is given nine years.

In prison, his head is shaved clean, his mustache is shaved off. His face swells up, apparently from poor diet. His mother weeps often, especially on warm sunny days, when she looks out the window and imagines her son in a dank cell.

Everyone is slumped in a moral depression. Journalists are being fired left and right. Universities are being purged. People direct their energies toward schemes to get out of the country. No one seems to be doing any work.

A campaign is under way to boycott the regime. Intellectuals and professionals withhold their services. One actor I know works as a waiter in a coffeehouse. A well-known singer is pumping gas. A woman television broadcaster in Wroclaw is selling ice cream at a small stand in the market square.

There is an occupation-regime atmosphere about everyday events. A soccer game between a Soviet team and a Polish one is held under tight security; ZOMO troops with automatic weapons ring the stadium; the stands are divided into quadrants by uniformed police. On flights of the Polish airline, a ZOMO with his hand on his AK-47 stands at the back of the cabin, on the lookout for hijackers.

On the other hand, there is a laxity and inconsistency to the crackdown that seems in keeping with the Polish character. One man I know who is in hiding comes up from time to time for a meal at his favorite restaurant. Another public figure in hiding, the former head of the journalists' association, is said to have received heart medication, through an intermediary, from an official in the Ministry of the Interior.

In Victory Square there is a huge cross, made entirely of flowers, lying on the flagstones. Twice the police have removed it, and each time it has been reconstituted, bigger than before. Near the cross is a small shrine to nine miners shot by the police at Wujek in December. One day, someone brought a marble plaque with the nine names engraved on it. The police removed it. The next day, there were nine lumps of coal. They, too, were removed. The next day, there were nine crucifixes. And so it goes.

Last month, a British diplomat was walking across the square when he chanced to see a young man picked up by two ZOMO while kneeling beside the cross. The man did not resist as he was led away into a police van. Once inside, he was beaten savagely with nightsticks. the diplomat, peering through a window, counted 26 blows to the head and stomach before he was spotted and ordered to move on. He felt certain that the young man must have died.

Official thuggery is on the rise. On May 3, during pro-Solidarity demonstrations, policemen bashed heads all over the place. Clouds of tear gas billowed from one end of town to the other. Late in the evening, I went to meet someone at the train station. At an underground track, where there is a television set fixed to the wall a crowd had gathered for the evening news. Four ZOMO were standing in the center, their nightsticks still bent and scuffed. Around them were young men, obviously demonstrators. Everyone was watching the clashes on the news—in effect, watching themselves.

That is the image of Poland I carry away with me—oppressor and oppressed standing side by side, watching the theater of their country's disintegration. I do not know what will happen here; no one does. What everyone knows is that the conflict and the anguish are far from over. Perhaps next time the explosion will be violent. There is not really much to tell Jurek's mother to comfort her, except that there's a chance he will not serve his full nine years, that something will happen before then.

THOUSANDS OF POLES CLASH WITH RIOT POLICE IN THE STREETS OF GDANSK

(By John Darnton)

GDANSK, POLAND, Aug. 31—Polish riot policemen used tear gas, water cannons, flares and concussion grenades today to beat back thousands of anti-Government demonstrators in this port city where the Solidarity union was signed into existence after a victorious strike two years ago.

For over four hours, the narrow cobblestoned streets of the Old City, the broad boulevards downtown and the side streets near the Lenin Shipyard resounded with the sounds of clashes.

The trouble began when riot policemen moved in on thousands of demonstrators in front of the Lenin Shipyard. At least 300 of them retreated into the yard, by breaking down a metal gate.

Shortly before midnight, the northern section of the city was a vast no man's land, with demonstrators armed with gasoline bombs controlling blocks of Grunwaldska Avenue, sectioned off by flaming barricades. Several riot police vans, gutted by fire, lay in the middle of the road.

SOLDIER FLASHES A 'V' SIGN

Young men and women clustered around the barricades, which were made of benches, paving stones, chairs, tables and other material. At one point a convoy of seven army trucks filled with soldiers and accompanied by a bulldozer drew up. As it stopped at one of the barricades, the crowd yelled: "The military with us! The military with us!" After five minutes, the trucks inexplicably turned around, leaving the barricade untouched. A soldier on one of the trucks flashed a "V" sign and the crowd broke into a singing of the national anthem.

Fifteen minutes later, a huge contingent of riot policemen arrived and, firing off tear gas volleys and concussion bombs, cleared the avenue.

Reliable medical sources indicated that at least 11 people were hurt, including one young man apparently struck in the temple by a tear gas cannister.

For at least an hour in the afternoon, groups of young demonstrators dodged flares and cannisters fired by 40 riot policemen in front of the red-brick railroad station near Gorky Square. At one point the youths constructed a barricade of wooden benches and metal trash receptacles, crouching behind it and then jumping up to toss rocks at the policemen 30 yards away.

3,000 TO 4,000 DEMONSTRATORS

Other youths, some wearing kerchiefs over their mouths like wild west bandits, taunted the police by running around the side of the train station, picking up smoking cannisters and tossing them back.

The stench of tear gas hung over the city.

A young man who wandered too close was picked up by the police, removed to the doorway of the station and disappeared inside amid a rain of blows from riot sticks. A woman wearing a red blouse was knocked to the sidewalk by the police and clubbed several times before she managed to scramble up and run away.

The disorders began at 3:20 P.M. when the police converged upon a crowd of between 3,000 and 4,000 assembled around the 120-foot tall monument of three crosses and anchors outside the main gate of the Lenin yard. The monument, whose realization was one of the first demands of the strikers of August 1980, was built to commemorate workers shot by security forces during anti-Government demonstrations in 1970.

Shipyard workers began streaming out of the gate after the 2 P.M. shift and gathering around the sloping flagstones of the monument, covered with votive candles, photographs of Lech Walesa and Pope John Paul II, and flowers arranged in the shape of a giant cross above a "V-for-victory" symbol.

Some of the workers said they had been warned over the public address system in the shipyard earlier in the day not to join in demonstrations, but they came anyway. Delegations from various departments brought flowers to put at the cross, laying them down solemnly while the throng applauded.

"As you see," said a young shipyard worker in a brown jacket with a mustache that resembled Mr. Walesa's, "we are celebrating this anniversary peacefully, without bloodshed." The hope, he said, was to exert pressure to bring the martial law authorities to the negotiating table.

YOU ARE NOT ALONE

A young woman with long dark hair spoke out, saying that she wanted the shipyard workers to know that "you are not alone." The police, she said, had surrounded the area so that supporters from other parts of the city could not come. Tonight's state-controlled television news, she predicted, would describe them all as "irresponsible extremists."

A man with a beard said: "All I want is a contented, prosperous fatherland, and this is denied. I hope nobody is killed or wounded today. I wish the police would go back to being a force that is supposed to protect us."

"There's nothing I want more than for Lech to be with us today," he said. Mr. Walesa is interned in southeastern Poland.

Then, a military helicopter appeared overhead, circling a dozen times, and the crowd thrust up "V" signs defiantly and began chanting slogans—"We want Lech!" "Democracy!" "Free the internees!" "Divorce from Moscow!" and "Put the junta on trial!"

The crowd was begining to thin, as the police moved in from three directions, with columns of armored personnel carriers, water cannons, vans and jeeps fitted out with tear gas cannister launchers. They were met with whistles, jeers and shouts of "Gestapo!"

BEATEN WITH NIGHTSTICKS

For several hours afterward, knots of demonstrators roamed through the streets, with riot police chasing them. Two young men were seen being carried by police on a footbridge over the railroad tracks near Academic Park. The men were beaten with nightsticks before being loaded into a van.

At least three riot policemen, called ZOMO, were also said to have been injured.

By nighttime, demonstrators were battling the police in three separate areas. One group, which overturned and set a tractor-trailer truck ablaze, was holed up inside the Novotel, fending off police assaults. Another was taking on the riot police on the northern road to Gydnia, and a third had fanned out into a forest in nearby Oliwa, which the police were reluctant to enter.

STRATEGIC DOCTRINE: DETERRENCE OR WARFIGHTING?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to disturbing reports that the Reagan administration is planning to develop the capability to fight and prevail in a protracted nuclear war. It is perhaps difficult to imagine that the existing nuclear balance of terror could be made even more perilous, but that would in fact be the result of such a program. By shifting the emphasis of U.S. nuclear strategy from deterrence to warfighting, the administration would render the already fragile nuclear standoff even more precarious; the nuclear threshold would be lowered considerably and the world would be brought one large step closer to nuclear holocaust and oblivion.

In a provocative article in the Los Angeles Times of August 15, Robert Scheer discusses the contents of the Pentagon's new defense guidance statement and a strategic master plan now being drawn up. Every sane American knows that there can be no winner in a nuclear war. Presumably administration officials know this too; yet in the new plans they use the terminology of "prevailing" in a "protracted nuclear war" and the termination of hostilities on terms favorable to the United States." In a letter to 70 newspapers around the globe, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger downplays the significance of this shift in strategy, arguing that the Reagan administration is simply doing what is necessary to maintain deterrence.

Clearly, the issues raised by Mr. Scheer's article and Secretary Weinberger's letter are cause for concern. Not only is the notion of prevailing in a protracted nuclear war inherently contradictory; it is extremely dangerous as well. Such a strategy would lower the nuclear threshold, encouraging Soviet commanders to use nuclear weapons in a crisis to preempt a U.S. nuclear strike. This could precipitate an exchange with great risks of escalation toward annihilation. We are presented with a grim spectre indeed—a vision of United States and Soviet authorities buried away in bunkers, playing a horrible game of tit for tat, trading missile for missile, city for city, while the peoples and civilizations of both countries vanish into radioactive oblivion. I cannot imagine how such a holocaust could be ended "on terms favorable to the United States."

The argument is offered by Secretary Weinberger that the Soviet Union, for its part, is building forces to wage a protracted nuclear war. If so, the answer is not to blindly follow the Soviets' lead, that the world might be doubly imperiled, but rather to prevent such a destabilizing development before it occurs—to freeze it in its tracks.

The prospect of nuclear warfighting programs heightens the need for an immediate, mutual and verifiable freeze on the testing, production and futher deployment of nuclear weapons. The people and Government of the United States must act together to establish a defense policy that truly protects, rather than imperils, ourselves and our children, all that we have created and all that we hold dear.

I ask unamimous consent that the full text of Robert Scheer's article and the letter from Secretary Weinberger be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PENTAGON PLAN AIMS AT VICTORY IN NUCLEAR WAR

(By Robert Scheer)

WASHINGTON.—On the orders of the Reagan Administration, the Pentagon last week completed a strategic master plan to give the United States the capability of winning a protracted nuclear war with the Soviet Union, The Times has learned.

The document was delivered to the National Security Council and is awaiting final presidential approval.

The Pentagon plan was drawn up in response to a presidential directive, which represents the first reported time the U.S. government has declared that nulcear war with the Soviets can be won.

The directive is part of a top secret national security decision document that was drawn up in the fall of 1981 to supersede Presidential Directive 59, which was approved in the last six months of the Carter Administration.

IDEAL IS CONTROVERSIAL

Sources familiar with both highly classified documents report that President Reagan's strategic doctrine goes further toward a nuclear war fighting stance than former President Jimmy Carter's in that it specifically states the goal of winning a protracted nuclear war.

According to one member of the Reagan Administration, the plan would contemplate nuclear warfare that went on for as long as six months. One consequence of this planning has been a commitment of $18 billion to provide a communications systems that could endure such protracted nuclear warfare.

The idea that nuclear war between the superpowers can be kept limited or stretched out over several months—let alone won—is controversial in both military and political circles.

Air Force Gen. David C. Jones, who was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under both Carter and Reagan, has warned that preparations for fighting a limited or protracted nuclear war would be throwing money into a "bottomless pit." In his parting statement on retiring in June, Jones said, "I don't see much of a chance of nuclear war being limited or protracted." He added, "I see great difficulty in keeping any kind of nuclear exchange between the Soviet Union and the U.S. from escalating."

During the 1980 presidential primary campaign, Carter's Presidential Directive 59 was criticized by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and others for assuming that nuclear wars can be fought and survived in a manner akin to conventional wars of the past.

Carter's secretary of defense, Harold Brown, asserted that Presidential Directive 59 was intended to deter any expectations that the Soviets might have of winning a nuclear war but did not endorse the idea that nuclear war could be kept limited or that meaningful victory was possible.

Carter's directive did not contain any specific means of implementation. But Reagan's directive, the sources said, specifically requires the Pentagon to draw up a plan for turning the policy declaration into military reality.

The Pentagon's strategic master plan was to have been sent to the National Security Council for approval in June. However, it was delayed because of the public disclosure of another secret Defense Department document, the annual defense guidance statement.

Parts of that statement, which the Pentagon draws up each year to project its needs for the next five years, were leaked to the New York Times and caused considerable embarrassment for the Administration.

The newspaper reported that the annual guidance plan assumed that "protracted nuclear war is possible" and that "American nuclear forces must prevail and be able to force the Soviet Union to seek earliest termination of hostilities on terms favorable to the United States."

The annual guidance statement contained a general policy of confrontation with the Soviets ranging from conventional wars to battles in space, with the nuclear component being only one part.

CONTAINS MORE DETAILS

Administration insiders report that the new strategic master plan is more detailed and more controversial in its advocacy of nuclear warfare than the annual Defense Department guideline. More significantly, it would carry the imprimatur of the President and his National Security Council, while the annual guidance plan is an internal Pentagon document.

The new strategic master plan concentrates exclusively on the possibilities of strategic nuclear war and reportedly aims at providing more of a "how-to" treatment of the subject. For example, the new plan devotes considerable space to the matter of destroying enemy political centers and command centers while preserving similar U.S. centers.

The Reagan Administration has budgeted $18 billion for the purpose of securing U.S. military command, control and communication, or C3, as it is known to planners. C3 refers to the ability of a nation's leaders to maintain communication with the troops in control of the nuclear arsenal.

The implications of the shift in strategic thinking about nuclear war were spelled out by Gen. James W. Stansberry, commander of the Air Force Electronics Systems Division, who told an Air Force conference:

"In previous years the concept for C3 was that it only had to be able to get off a launch of U.S. strategic weapons in response to a first strike before damage was unacceptable. The idea that there was no way to win a nuclear war exchange sort of invalidated the need for anything survivable. There is a shift now in nuclear weapons planning, and a proper element in nuclear deterrence is that we be able to keep on fighting."

LINKS ARE VULNERABLE

But critics of nuclear war-fighting strategies remain skeptical that C3 can be protected, because the antennas, telephone lines, satellites and other links in the communication system between a nation's leaders and the nuclear arsenal remain far more vulnerable than any other components of the defense system.

One observer on the Reagan staff said sarcastically, "We've been working on this C3 problem for five years now and can report that the system might survive 15 minutes of nuclear war."

But the Pentagon's master plan aims at finding means of hardening U.S. communications to the point that they could survive longer—"as much as six months," one Administration member noted.

The notion that nuclear wars can be fought on a limited and survivable basis toward other than cataclysmic ends has had growing support in the last decade. Increasingly accurate missile technology and sophisticated means of communications have produced the confidence in some quarters that nuclear war need not be fought as one spasmodic episode with little but radioactive rubble to show for the effort.

The result has been a push for rejecting a nuclear strategy based on the idea of a nuclear war as one spasmodic event, requiring as a deterrent only enough power on each side to assure the destruction of the other. This past policy has been challenged by strategies that require even more plentiful and advanced nuclear arsenals and systems of defense ranging from anti-missile systems to civil defense.

In the nuclear war-fighters' view, which Reagan's National Security Council appears to accept, a nuclear war might be fought over a period of several months with selective strikes at primarily military targets. At the end, they believe, one side could emerge victorious, with enough of its resources and populaton intact to begin over.

One leading advocate of this viewpoint, Colin Gray, has recently been appointed by Reagan to the advisory board for the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and as an adviser to the State Department.

In a 1980 article in the magazine Foreign Affairs, Gray and co-author Keith Payne complained that "many commentators and senior U.S. government officials consider it (nuclear war) a non-survival event."

Instead, Gray and Payne argued, "the United States should plan to defeat the Soviet Union and to do so at a cost that would not prohibit U.S. recovery. Washington should identify war aims that in the last resort would contemplate the destruction of Soviet political authority and the emergence of a postwar world order compatible with Western values."

They specified that 20 million U.S. fatalities would represent an acceptable cost.

Others may have a less optimistic view of the likely casualties but still believe it is possible to emerge on top in an all-out nuclear war. Last week, Energy Secretary James B. Edwards defended the Reagan Administration's commitment to testing and building more and better nuclear weapons. He said:

"I hope we never have to get into another war; if we do, I want to come out No. 1, not 2."

On the other hand, there is former Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance, who left the Carter Administration before it formulated Presidential Directive 59. Vance, in an interview with The Times, stated:

"I happen to be one of those who believe it is madness to talk about trying to fight a continuing nuclear war as though it were like fighting a conventional war situation, and that one could control the outcome with the kinds of precision that is sometimes possible in a conventional war situation.

"It is a totally different world, a world that is hard for any of us to conceive, because none of us knows what a nuclear war is like. But, by extrapolation, we can have some idea of the incredible devastation that would come from it and the almost unimaginable consequences that would flow from it."

WEINBERGER VIEW ON NUCLEAR WAR

I am increasingly concerned with news accounts that portray this Administration as planning to wage protracted nuclear war, or seeking to acquire a nuclear "war-fighting" capability. This is completely inaccurate, and these stories misrepresent the Administration's policies to the American public and to our allies and adversaries abroad.

It is the first and foremost goal of this Administration to take every step to ensure that nuclear weapons are never used again, for we do not believe there could be any "winners" in a nuclear war. Our entire strategy aims to deter war of all kinds, but most particularly to deter nuclear war. To accomplish this objective, our forces must be able to respond in a measured and prudent manner to the threat posed by the Soviet Union. That will require the improvements in our strategic forces that the President has proposed. But it does not mean that we endorse the concept of protracted nuclear war, or nuclear "war-fighting." It is the Soviet Union that appears to be building forces for a "protracted" conflict.

The policy of deterrence is difficult for some to grasp because it is based on a paradox. But this is quite simple: to make the cost of nuclear war much higher than any possible benefit. If the Soviets know in advance that a nuclear attack on the United States would bring swift nuclear retaliation, they would never attack in the first place.

They would be "deterred" from ever beginning a nuclear war.

There is nothing new about our policy. Since the awful age of nuclear weapons began, the United States has sought to prevent nuclear war through a policy of deterrence. This policy has been approved, through the political processes of the democractic nations it protects, since at least 1950. More important, it works. It has worked in the face of major international tensions involving the great powers, and it has worked in the face of war itself.

But, for deterrence to continue to be successful in the future, we must take steps to offset the Soviet military buildup. If we do not modernize our arsenal now, as the Soviets have been doing for more than 20 years, we will, within a few years, no longer have the ability to retaliate. The Soviet Union would then be in a position to threaten or actually to attack us with the knowledge that we would be incapable of responding. We have seen in Poland, in Afghanistan, in Eastern Europe and elsewhere that the Soviet Union does not hesitate to take advantage of a weaker adversary. We cannot allow the Soviet Union to think it could begin a nuclear war with us and win.

This is not just idle speculation. The Soviet Union has engaged in a frenzied military buildup, in spite of their economic difficulties. They have continued to build greater numbers of nuclear weapons far beyond those necessary for deterrence. They now have over 5,000 nuclear warheads on ICBMs, compared to about 2,000 only five years ago. They have modified the design of these weapons and their launchers so that many of their land-based missiles are now more accurate, more survivable and more powerful than our own. They have also developed a refiring capability that will allow them to reload their delivery systems several times. They have elaborate plans for civil defense and air defense against any retaliation we might attempt. And, finally, their writings and military doctrine emphasize a nuclear warfighting scenario. Whatever they claim their intentions to be, the fact remains that they are designing their weapons in such a way and in sufficient numbers to indicate to us that they think they could begin, and win, a nuclear war.

In the face of all this, it is my responsibility and duty as secretary of defense to make every effort to modernize our nuclear forces in such a way that the United States retains the capability to deter the Soviet Union from ever beginning a nuclear war. We must take the steps necessary to match the Soviet Union's greatly improved nuclear capability.

That is exactly why we must have a capability for a survivable and enduring response—to demonstrate that our strategic forces could survive Soviet strikes over an extended period. Thus we believe we could deter any attack. Otherwise we would be tempting them to employ nuclear weapons or try to blackmail us. In short, we cannot afford to place ourselves in the position where the survivability of our deterrent would force the President to choose between using our strategic forces before they were destroyed or surrendering.

Those who object to a policy that would strengthen our deterrent, then, would force us into a more dangerous, hair-triggered posture. Forces that must be used in the very first instant of an enemy attack are not the tools of a prudent strategy. A posture that encourages Soviet nuclear adventurism is not the basis of an effective deterrent. Our entire strategic program, including the development of a response capability that has been so maligned in the press recently, has been developed with the express intention of assuring that nuclear war will never be fought.

I know that this doctrine of deterrence is a difficult paradox to understand. It is an uncomfortable way to keep the peace. We understand deterrence and accept the fact that we must do much more in order to continue to keep the peace. It is my fervent hope that all can understand and accept this so that we can avoid the sort of sensationalist treatment of every mention of the word "nuclear" that only serves to distort our policy and to frighten people all over the world. Our policy is peace, and we deeply believe that the best and surest road to peace is to secure and maintain an effective and credible deterrent.

The purpose of U.S. policy remains to prevent aggression through an effective policy of deterrence—the very goal which prompted the formation of the North Atlantic Alliance, an alliance which is as vital today as it was the day it was formed.

CASPAR W. WEINBERGER,
Secretary of Defense.

THE SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL—COMPENSATORY EDUCATION FOR DISADVANTAGED STUDENTS

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, H.R. 6863, the supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1982, includes $148 million for compensatory education for disadvantaged students—the title I program. This additional amount will compensate local education agencies to insure that no State or county loses funding if either the 1970 or 1980 census data forms the basis for making allocations under this program for the 1982-83 school year.

I would like every Senator to know how much each State will gain under this bill. The following table provides this information.

ESTIMATED CHAPTER 1 ALLOCATIONS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1983 USING 1970 AND 1980 CENSUS DATA

This table shows two estimates of fiscal year 1983 chapter 1 local education agency basic grant allocations, one using 1970 census data for the number of children in poor families and the other 1980 census data for such children. Which set of data the Department of Education will actually use to make allocations is presently the subject of a Federal court case, Ambach v. Bell.

The third column shows the higher allocation under the two simulations; that is, what counties would get if they were given allocations based on either the 1970 or the 1980 census data, whichever were larger. The last column shows the additional cost of providing funds for column 3, assuming that such sums would directly supplement allocations made using 1970 census data (column 1).

Allocations in columns 1 and 2 are estimated at a total chapter 1 appropriation of $2,885,969,000, as provided under Public Law 97-161. The estimated total amount for LEA basic grants is $2,386,322,000 ($2,357,663,000 under the base formula and $28,658,000 under the SIE formula). In addition, funds are to be provided for State agency grants, State administration grants, basic grants to territories and to the Secretary of the Interior, and for evaluation and studies grants. No funds would be provided for concentration grants.

POM-1146. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 60

"Whereas, The Discount rate policies of the Federal Reserve Board over the past 18 months together with the recent preemption of state usury law limitations on interest rates by federal statutes have created economic stagnation and accelerated rather than retarded inflationary pressures in the nation's economy for the foreseeable future; and

"Whereas, The impact of high discount rates and unregulated interest rates will, if unchecked, lead inevitably to economic disaster with attendant tragic social consequences; and

"Whereas, It is the opinion of the Members of Legislature of the State of California, that immediate federal action is necessary to forestall a nationwide economic disaster; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and Congress of the United States to immediately enact legislation placing a maximum chargeable interest rate of 2 percent above the level at the time of lending of an index selected by Congress and the President for its accuracy as a measure of the average cost of funds; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-1147. A resolution adopted by the Clergy-Laity Congress of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America urging that the Olympic games be held permanently in Greece where they may be conducted in a manner and in an atmosphere conducive to the true and ancient ideals of the Olympic games; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

POM-1149. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 87

"Whereas, Utility rates throughout the State of California have risen dramatically over the last year; and

"Whereas, The price of natural gas is a major factor in rising utility bills; and

"Whereas, California is particularly dependent upon natural gas; and

"Whereas, The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has already begun to administratively decontrol the price of natural gas transported in interstate commerce, which will result in higher costs to California consumers; and

"Whereas, The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has indicated that it plans to administratively decontrol "old" natural gas; and

"Whereas, "Old" natural gas represents approximately 40 percent of all natural gas consumed in California; and

"Whereas, It has been estimated that administrative decontrol of "old" natural gas could cost California consumers over one billion dollars a year; and

"Whereas, Decontrol of natural gas would have a severe impact upon the already burdened ratepayers, particularly the poor and the elderly; and

"Whereas, Decontrol of natural gas would also have an adverse impact on major portions of California's economy, including agriculture, public services, and small businesses and would result in the loss of thousands of jobs; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California hereby respectfully memorializes the President and Congress to require the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to take no further action to accelerate the administrative decontrol of natural gas prices; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, and to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission."

POM-1150. A joint resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 52

"Whereas, Agriculture is the number one industry in California, which is the leading agricultural state in the country; and

"Whereas, Although California's 33.4 million acres of cultivated land account for only 3 percent of the country's entire supply of farmland, the state produced nearly 10 percent of the 1980 farm cash receipts in the United States; and

"Whereas, Agriculture accounted for approximately 18 percent of the state's gross product during 1980, which amounted to $54.8 billion, using the multiplier factor; and

"Whereas, California leads the nation in the production of 49 different crops and livestock products; and

"Whereas, The diversity of the state's agriculture is truly impressive, for over 250 different commodities are grown here; and

"Whereas, Twelve percent of the nation's agricultural exports were shipped from California last year, which provided numerous jobs and revenue for our three customs districts of Los Angeles, San Francisco, and San Diego; and

"Whereas, The product of approximately one out of every four acres of California cropland is now sold in foreign markets and thus the state's agricultural economy is dependent upon international trade; and

"Whereas, Expansion of markets for agricultural products abroad is needed to supply outlets for growing production of many California crops and to balance declines in domestic consumption of certain important products; and

"Whereas, The trade policies often adopted by many of our important overseas trading partners are clearly discriminatory or otherwise violative of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and are unfairly eroding export markets for California farm commodities; and

Whereas, A group of California food marketers have petitioned the United States Trade Representative to take their case against the European Economic Community before an international court, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That agriculture is California's basic industry, and its well-being is vital to the economic health of the state; and be it further

"Resolved, That it is in the best interest of the state, and of the United States as a whole, that there be the closest and most vigorous possible cooperation between the Office of the Trade Representative and the United States Department of Agriculture in seeking to improve the nation's trade balance by negotiating the reduction or elimination of tariff and nontariff barriers, as well as other policies and programs, which encourage unfair competition in markets which the United States has historically served, which disrupt international trade patterns, and which block access to foreign markets for California agricultural products; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States and its appropriate committees join with the executive agencies involved and urge their active participation in seeking the most effective remedies to the problems of protectionism and subsidized competition which so seriously affect the movement of United States', and particularly California's, agricultural products into international trade; and be it further

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas: The House of Representatives, through House Resolution 533 which was approved on May 24, 1982, directed the Committee on the Judiciary (Penal) to perform an investigation of the agreement existing between the Executive Power of the Commonwealth and the Executive Power of the Federal Government regarding the Haitian refugees in Fort Allen, and on the Present status of the compliance with said agreement by the Federal Government.

"Whereas: The Committee on the Judiciary (Penal) carried out said investigation, conducting, among other things, public hearings which were initiated on the first (1st) of June and which concluded on the seventeenth (17th) of June of 1982.

"Whereas: Twenty-five (25) persons, representing various sectors of the Puerto Rican community, appeared to give testimony in said Public Hearings. Outstanding among said persons were the representatives of the Religious and Civic Community: Cardinal Aponte Martínez, Monseigneur Francisco Reus Froilán of the Episcopal Church and the Reverend Alredo Santiago. Members of the medical profession, psychologists, and personnel that worked in Fort Allen, and representatives of entities for the defense of the rights of the Haitian refugees, also gave testimony.

"Among the latter were Dr. Pedro A. Miró of Dr. Pila Clinic in Ponce; Arturo Geigel Bunker, former Administrative Assistant of the Clinic at Fort Allen, Miguel Arroyo Camacho, former policeman at Fort Allen; Dr. Alba Nydia Rivera, psychologist; André Rheaume, former interpreter at Fort Allen and Dr. Gerald Jean Jusste, Director of the Haitian Refugee Center in Miami, Dr. Anselme Remy, Professor of Anthropology of the University of Columbia, Dr. Paul Latortué, Speaker for the Puerto Rican Foundation for the Liberation of the Haitians, and Dr. Jean Claude Bajeaux, Coordinator of the Inter-Regional Council for Haitian Refugees. The following public officials also gave testimony, to wit: the Mayor of Juana Diaz, the Honorable Angel León Martínez: the Secretary of Justice, the Honorable Héctor Reichard; the Secretary of State, the Honorable Carlos S. Quirós; and Dr. Yamil Kouri, Assistant Secretary of Health, and Official Representative of the Department of Health of Puerto Rico to supervise the compliance with the contract between the Executive Power of Puerto Rico and the Federal Government.

"Whereas: A communication was received from Dr. Adolfo Pérez Esquivel, Nobel Peace Prize Winner, in which he expresses his solidarity with the investigative action of this House of Representatives "for the benefit of human rights in Puerto Rico".

"Whereas: The Committee received ample information on the living conditions of the Haitians refugees in Fort Allen; on the general treatment given to these persons by the Federal authorities as to their mental and physical health; on the aspects of entertainment and cultural expressions; and on the total living conditions in general, of the refugees as members of the community of human beings.

"Whereas: The Committee investigated all pertinent areas of the task assigned by the House except establishing direct contact with the Haitians themselves, and hearing their position, which could not be done due to the refusal of the authorities in Fort Allen to let the Committee hold public hearings and make a visual inspection of the Fort. In view of said refusal, the Committee proposed that a number of refugees be taken to the Town Hall of the Municipality of Juana Diaz so that they could testify before the Committee, but, to this moment there has been no reply from the Fort Allen authorities.

"Whereas: The Committee on the Judiciary (Penal), after a careful evaluation of the evidence obtained in the course of the investigation, has reached the following findings of facts:

"(a) The first condition of the agreement between the Executive Power of the Commonwealth and the Federal Executive Power which says, "The Federal Government shall do everything that is necessary to keep Fort Allen in adequate humane and sanitary conditions" has been violated.

"The elements which justify the Committee's findings are summarized hereinbelow:

"(1) The abundance of mosquitoes is humanly unbearable.

"(2) The degree of heat resulting from the structures they live in makes their life miserable. During the day, the alternatives the refugees have is to remain inside the huts, and suffer the effects of the heat, or to go outside and face the effects of the blazing sun, because there is no cover or protection against the sun.

"(3) The sun has harmed the refugee's eyes, and, in fact, it is alleged that there are three (3) cases of total blindness that have not been treated by an ophthalmologist.

"(4) There is a case of food poisoning on the record which affected forty (40) employees and two (2) refugees in Fort Allen. Worms were found in the food.

"(5) Several cases of a disease known as "gynecomastia" have been found. It consists of the abnormal inflamation of the mammary glands in men. The pertinent medical authorities could not explain the causes of this phenomenon.

"(6) Many cases of pathological alterations in the menstrual cycle of the women refugees have been discovered, consisting of the disappearance or increase of menstrual flow.

"(7) Men and women are kept separate and incommunicated; even those that constitute a family.

"(8) The sanitary facilities are kept open in such a way that the person's biological needs are done practically in public, in clear violation of the cultural habits of the Haitian refugees.

"(9) Evidence was presented that the Haitian refugees are terrified of mosquitoes and that this terror increases when heavy rains create many puddles. The evidence was in the sense that the Fort Allen Authorities have not taken any steps to fill or eliminate these puddles.

"(10) The only furniture in the huts is the cot where they sleep; there are no chairs or benches inside or outside the huts where they can sit, so their options are to sit on the floor or to remain standing.

"(11) The refugees are not allowed to practice their autochthonous religious ceremonies, typical of their culture, thus causing them great spiritual disturbances and a sense of terrible emotional loss.

"(b) There has been a violation of the fourth provision of the agreement between the Executive of Puerto Rico and the Federal Executive which says 'no refugees that have physical or mental disabilities shall be sent to Fort Allen nor shall those identified as 'delinquents'; and to the provisions of the Fifth clause of the agreement, which states that those 'refugees that have contracted Malaria, 'Dengue Fever' or any other contagious disease shall not be sent to Puerto Rico'. There is evidence of the existence of two cases of Tuberculosis which is a highly contagious disease.

"(c) The eighth clause of the above stated agreement which provides "that the refugees located in Fort Allen shall have adequate recreational facilities" has been violated. The evidence was overwhelming in the sense that the refugees are not offered any type of recreational or cultural activities which would allow them to preserve their mental sanity, in a situation of forced detention such as theirs. The refugees are awakened at 4:00 a.m. with an exhortation to return voluntarily to Haiti. Said exhortation is repeated several times during the day through powerful loudspeakers. No explanation was given as to why the refugees are awakened at 4:00 a.m., when they are not provided with any activities to fill their hours of frustrating idleness.

"(d) The Fifth Clause of the agreement which provides "that all refugees sent to Puerto Rico shall undergo a medical evaluation during an observation period of fourteen (14) days prior to their transfer to Puerto Rico", has been violated. The evidence was in the sense that the so-called medical evaluation consisted of stripping the refugees, spreading a white substance over their bodies, and afterwards washing the substance off. A Committee of Federal Executive Government representatives and representatives of the Puerto Rican Executive Power was appointed to supervise the medical evaluation during an observation period of "fourteen days prior to their transfer to Puerto Rico". The two delegates of the Puerto Rican Executive Power were Dr. Yamil Kouri and Mr. Angel R. Aponte, Undersecretary of State. It was clearly established that said persons were present only one day of the fourteen (14) days at the Processing Center.

"Whereas: In addition to the concrete evidence on the living conditions in Fort Allen, which have been summarized in the preceding Whereas: the Committee on the Judiciary (penal) received reactions, opinions, and evaluations from distinguished members of the Puerto Rican Community and from representatives of the religious, civic and cultural sectors, who unanimously agree that the situation of the Haitain Refugees at Fort Allen is one that violates the human rights recognized by the civilized world, and by the most elementary principles of Christianity.

"Therefore: Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico:

"Section 1.—To express the feelings of the House of Representatives with respect to the situation of the Haitian refugees at Fort Allen, which is repugnant to the sense of justice, benevolence and of human brotherhood which is characteristic of the Puerto Rican People; and that said situation is a transgression against the civil and human rights recognized by the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Constitution of the United States, the United Nations Bill of Rights, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and the Universal Declaration of the Rights of Man, approved in December, 1948, by the General Assembly of the U.N.O.

"Section 2.—To express the feelings of the House of Representatives, that the agreement between the Federal Executive and the Executive of Puerto Rico on the transfer of Haitian refugees to Puerto Rico, not be renewed by the Executive Power of Puerto Rico in the coming month of August when said agreement draws to an end.

"Section 3.—A copy of this Resolution shall be sent to the Governor of Puerto Rico, to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the United Nations Organization and to the Organization of American States."

POM-1162. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs:

"Whereas, There are approximately 250,000 veterans in the United States, of whom approximately 25,000 reside in California, who were exposed to atomic radiation during the occupation of Japan and in conjunction with at least 235 atmospheric nuclear weapons tests conducted in the 1940's and 1950's and up to as recently as 1962; and

"Whereas, These veterans are now suffering myriad health problems, including cancer, degenerative bone and nerve diseases, intestinal disorders, blood and respiratory diseases, emotional problems, and birth defects in children and grandchildren; and

"Whereas, Recent medical evidence indicates that all these ailments are associated with exposure to atomic radiation; and

"Whereas, These veterans have typically been hesitant to come forward for fear of prosecution under secrecy statutes and possible loss of employee medical benefits and diminished employment potential; and

"Whereas, Regulators published by the United States Veterans' Administration on December 2, 1981, pertaining to the provision of health care to veterans exposed to atomic radiation do not address health symptoms other than cancer; and

Whereas, Current Veterans' Administration regulations have been used to deny 98 percent of the claims by veterans for health care and compensation; and

Whereas, Under these regulations, it is incumbent upon the veteran to prove his or her exposure to atomic radiation through his or her own initiative in securing records that often are incomplete or missing entirely; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and Congress of the United States to direct the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to revise the current regulations of the Veterans' Administration regarding the provision of health care to veterans exposed to atomic radiation to fully recognize the body of medical evidence associating exposure to atomic radiation with a wide range of health effects; and be it further

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of California further respectfully requests that other appropriate agencies and resources of the United States be brought to bear in an investigation of the health and genetic complaints of veterans exposed to atomic radiation and of the apparent loss of records and documentation pertaining to exposure of individuals and military units; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, and to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. SPECTER (for himself and Mr. HEFLIN):

S. 2881. A bill to amend the copyright law respecting the limitations on exclusive rights to secondary transmissions; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RETRANSMISSION CARRIER COPYRIGHT STATUS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill to bring needed precision to our copyright laws by clarifying the status of retransmission carriers, companies that utilize satellites or terrestrial microwave repeater stations to retransmit television signals to cable operators.

Although the Copyright Act Amendments of 1976 included an exemption from copyright liability for passive carriers, companies that provide the link to secondary transmissions by cable systems, recent court decisions have placed this congressional policy in doubt.

In March 1982, the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of New York held that Eastern Microwave's retransmission of broadcast signals was not entitled to the exemption from copyright liability for retransmission carriers established by the 1976 Copyright Act amendments (17 U.S.C. sec. 111(a)(3)). An appeal from this ruling is currently pending before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. This ruling has created substantial confusion in the cable industry; confusion and uncertainty that can best be eliminated by congressional action to clarify the reach of the law.

Virtually every cable system in the country uses one or more of the so-called distant signals to supplement local television services. There are more than 50 companies delivering such signals nationwide with three firms utilizing satellite for nationwide distribution. This activity has been greatly facilitated by the compromise embodied in the 1976 Copyright Reform Act and by the Federal Communications Commission rules being relaxed to encourage cable systems to utilize distant signals.

In 1976 Congress adopted the compulsory license with royalty fee approach to the use of distant signals. Critical to that mechanism is the role of retransmission carriers who facilitate the opportunities of cable systems to receive and utilize distant signals. Almost one-quarter of the American public receives its television programing via cable. Almost 400 cable systems operate in Pennsylvania. Without the services of retransmission carriers to relay television signals over great distances the variety of viewing opportunities for cable subscribers will be severely limited.

In recognition of this passive and facilitating role, retransmission carriers were granted an exemption from copyright royalties. The cable systems that are the intermediate recipients of the secondary transmission and beneficiaries of the relay are not covered by this statutory exemption. Thus, copyright owners are not left uncompensated, but recover according to the compulsory license and royalty compromise embodied in the law. Indeed, without proper recognition of the exemption of retransmission carriers, the 1976 compromise can be significantly undermined.

While I am anxious to pursue our inquiry into the continuing viability of the 1976 compulsory license and royalty compromise, until we decide to adopt an alternative solution to the distant signal problem I think the current law must be allowed to govern. The amendment I offer today is intended to clarify that law and uphold the working compromise agreed upon in 1976.

The language I offer today is included in the Cable Television Copyright Act Amendments, H.R. 5949, recently reported favorably by the House Committee on the Judiciary. In its report, the House committee explained the need for this amendment:

It is the intent of the Committee that this subsection clarify the copyright law regarding the intent of 17 U.S.C. 111(a)(3) which provides an exemption of copyright liability for common carriers.

In the course of Committee deliberations on this legislation, a decision was issued in a case involving an interpretation of Section 111(a)(3) Eastern Microwave, Inc. v. Doubleday Sports, Inc., 81-CV-303 (N.D., N.Y., March 12, 1982), which leaves the cable industry in a state of turmoil. The holding of that case was that the carrier, Eastern Microwave, Inc., failed to qualify for the Section 111(a)(3) exemption. In the Committee's view, the decision incorrectly construed the carrier exemption. If the decision is applied to other parties, all satellite resale carriers could be held liable for copyright infringement when they deliver distant signals to cable systems. Further, terrestrial microwave carriers could also be in danger of losing their exemption. These carriers are the primary means whereby cable systems receive distant signals for retransmission to cable subscribers; rather than face copyright liability, they may suspend broadcast retransmission. As a result, the signal carriage standards of the FCC could be undone, and the entire compulsory licensing scheme undercut, which would be antiethical to the intent of this committee and the public interest.

There has never been any doubt by this Committee that carriers are exempt from copyright liability when retransmitting television signals to cable systems via terrestrial microwave or satellite facilities. Although the Eastern Microwave case is presently on appeal, in view of the significance of the ruling and the chaotic state in which it leaves the 1976 cable legislation, the committee believes it is useful to clarify the existing language of Section 111(a)(3) by certain technical amendments, thereby restating its intent that the exemption apply to all such carriers. With these changes, qualifying carriers may engage in business promotion and marketing of their services and retransmit one or more television signal via statellite to cable systems pursuant to their FCC tariff without fear of loss of the exemption.

The bill I am introducing, parallels the language adopted by the House Committee on the Judiciary. It would make three technical changes in the current language of section 111(a)(3) of title 17, United States Code, and thereby clarify congressional intent with respect to the limited exemption from copyright liability for retransmission carriers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2881

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 111(a)(3) of title 17, United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"(3) the secondary transmission is made by any carrier who has no direct or indirect control over the content of the primary transmission or over the ultimate recipients of the secondary transmission, and whose activities with respect to the secondary transmission consist primarily of providing wires, cables, or other communications channels for the use of others: Provided, That the provisions of this clause extend only to the activities of said carrier or like entity with respect to secondary transmissions and do not exempt from liability the activities of others with respect to their own primary or secondary transmissions.".

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 2882. A bill to make a technical correction in the provision of the Economic Recovery Tax Act related to the election to have certain life interests qualify for the marital deduction; to the Committee on Finance.

ESTATE AND GIFT TAXES

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today makes a technical correction in the estate and gift tax portion of the Economic Recovery Tax Act.

The Economic Recovery Tax Act made a number of changes in the rules for estate and gift taxes. Two are of concern here. First, the act provided an unlimited marital deduction. Previously, an individual was able to leave up to half of his belongings or $250,000, whichever was greater, to his spouse, free of estate taxes. There was a similar deduction for gifts that an individual makes to his spouse while he is alive.

Last summer, Congress decided that it made little sense to tax transfers between spouses. Such taxes seem especially unfair when one spouse has just died. The bereaved spouse has enough worries without having to figure out how to pay the estate taxes on the couple's belongings. Better to levy the tax when the surviving spouse has also died. Hence, an unlimited marital deduction was provided. Estate and gift taxes are no longer collected on property an individual wills or gives to his spouse.

Second, the tax laws were amended so that the marital deduction covers some terminable interests. A terminable interest is a property interest that is less than full ownership. For example, an individual can have a life estate in a building, meaning he has the right to all the income from the building while he is alive, but at death, the building automatically is transferred to another party. Black's Law Dictionary defines terminable property as "property of such a nature that its duration is not perpetual or indefinite, but is limited or liable to terminate upon the happening of an event or the expiration of a fixed term."

In the past, terminable interests did not qualify for the marital deduction and were taxed upon the death of the first spouse. Thus, if a man left the family house to his wife for life and to his children after her death, estate taxes would be due on the house when the man died. He could avoid estate taxes by transferring the house outright to his wife. Or he could direct who would get it after her death. But not both. Congress decided that tax considerations should not influence how an individual disposes of his property. Consequently, the law was changed.

Today, two kinds of terminable interests qualify for the marital deduction. Qualified terminable interest property. Section 2056(b)(7) defines this as property that passes from the decedent and from which the surviving spouse is "entitled to all of the income." The other kind of terminable interest that qualifies as a charitable remainder trust. An individual can place his property in trust with directions to the trustee to pay over a fixed sum to his spouse periodically during her lifetime and to donate the corpus to charity after her death. The sole requirement—in section 2056(b)(8)—is that the surviving spouse must be the only noncharitable beneficiary of the trust.

A problem has arisen concerning pooled income funds. A pooled income fund is an investment fund established by a college, church, hospital, charity, or other tax-exempt organization. Individuals who die can leave their money to the organization, which places it in the fund, invests it, and pays out the income to the surviving spouse as long as she lives. After the spouse dies, the investments become the property of the college or other tax-exempt organization.

A pooled income fund is not a charitable remainder trust. The staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation says it is covered by the marital deduction because it is qualified terminable interest property. However, in March, the IRS issued a private letter ruling in which it said it could not rule on whether a pooled income fund qualifies for the marital deduction because the issue is one "that cannot be reasonably resolved before regulations are issued." Hence, there is cause for concern.

The IRS has a long history of being highly technical in these matters. In order to be qualified terminable interest property, the surviving spouse must be entitled to all of the income "from the property." Technically, income received from a pooled income fund is a proportionate share of income earned from many, commingled investments. It is arguably not income from the specific property transferred. Another problem is that legacies to pooled income funds sometimes split the income while the widow is alive between the widow and a charity. There is no policy reason to discourage this. It is allowed for charitable remainder trusts. However, there is a fear that the IRS will take too literally the requirement in section 2056(b)(7) that "all" of the income go to the surviving spouse. There are at least two other reasons why the IRS could decide pooled income funds fail to qualify for the marital deduction if the IRS is so inclined.

My bill eliminates any ambiguity. It is a technical amendment, as I do not believe there is any doubt that Congress intended the marital deduction to cover pooled income funds. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2882

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (a) Paragraph (8) of section 2056(b) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the limitation in the case of life estate or other terminable interest) is amended by changing the heading to read as follows:

"(8) Special rule for pooled income funds and charitable remainder trusts.—".

(b) Subparagraph (A) of section 2056(b)(8) of such Code (relating to the special rule for pooled income funds and charitable remainder trusts) is amended by inserting the words "pooled income fund or" after "the only non-charitable beneficiary of a".

(c) Subparagraph (B) of such section is amended by making clause (ii) into clause (iii) and by inserting a new clause (ii) as follows:

"(ii) Pooled income fund.—The term 'pooled income fund' means a trust described in section 642(c)(5).".

(d) The amendments made by this Act shall take effect as if they had been included in section 403(d) of the Economic Recovery Tax Act (Public Law 97-34).●

LONG-DISTANCE TELEPHONE CALL EXCISE TAX

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, common carriers, telephone and telegraph companies, radio stations and radio networks are exempted from the telephone excise tax on calls made on WATS lines. My bill would exempt them from the tax on all long-distance calls.

There is no reason to distinguish between the two calls in the tax laws. The only difference between a WATS call and an ordinary long-distance call is that they are billed differently by the telephone company. WATS stands for "wide area telecommunications service." There are two kinds of WATS lines: a so-called inward WATS, which is a toll-free 800 number, and an outward WATS, which is what each of us is the Senate has on his telephone. A WATS subscriber pays a flat fee per month, plus a variable amount based on the amount of time he spends on the phone. This gives him the privilege of making an unlimited number of long-distance calls.

WATS lines can be rented to cover the entire country or a smaller area. A WATS call travels to a WATS central office, where a computer screens it to insure the subscriber has paid for service to the particular area, and it is then dumped into the regular long-distance network. The routing priority is the same as for other long-distance calls. The telephone wires are the same as used by regular subscribers. The switching mechanism is the same. In 1978, the Federal Communications Commission ruled that WATS and ordinary long-distance are essentially identical and ordered the American Telephone and Telegraph Co. to explain the reason for its rate discrimination in favor of WATS. The Federal Communications Act says that it is illegal for a telephone company "to make any unjust or unreasonable discrimination in charges * * * in connection with like communication service * * * "[Instead of explaining, A.T. & T. took the Government to court. On June 11, 1982, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. circuit decided that the FCC had not done as detailed an analysis as it should have before issuing the "like service" ruling. The court vacated the ruling and remanded it "for such further proceedings, consistent with this opinion, as the Commission may wish to pursue."]

The Government has collected a telephone excise tax since 1917. Common carriers and communications companies have been exempted from the tax for some uses of the telephone since 1918. From 1918 to 1939, the exemption covered "leased wires and talking circuit special services." During that time, the Government collected two telephone taxes: a tax of 5 cents or 10 cents per call on calls costing more than a fixed amount. The minimum charge before a call was taxed was 15 cents at first, but was increased to 31 cents in 1932. Common carriers and communications companies were not exempted from it.

The other tax, from which they were exempted, was a tax of 10 percent—5 percent after 1932—on "leased wires and talking circuit special services." A leased wire was a private line rented between two points. The people at the telephone company do not remember exactly what a talking circuit special service was. They believe it was a special line on which a voice would be transmitted much more clearly than a regular telephone line: the sort of line a radio network might use to feed its programs to member stations. Hence, the designation special "talking" circuit. The House and Senate committee reports for the Revenue Act of 1918 give no reason for the exemption.

From 1939 to 1958, common carriers and communications companies were exempted from tax on leased wires, teletypewriters, talking circuit special services, and "wire and equipment service[s]." In the last category were stock market tickers and comparable devices. However, there was confusion because the telephone tax was completely remodeled under the 1939 code. Taxes were levied on "local telephone service," long distance calls costing more than 24 cents, "telegraph service," "leased wire, teletypewriter or talking circuit special service," and "wire and equipment service." The Government took the position that a common carrier or communications company had to pay a tax on a leased wire used entirely within a local telephone area because the wire constituted a "local telephone service."

From 1959 to 1965, the exemption for common carriers and communications companies covered all leased wires that went outside the local telephone area, "wire and equipment service," and "wire mileage service." The House committee report defined wire mileage service as "generally that communication service which cannot be connected, directly or indirectly, to an exchange operated" by the telephone company. A report the following year on a technical corrections bill added that the 1958 act had changed the definitions of "taxable types of services."

One of the former taxable categories was "leased wire, teletypewriter, or talking circuit special service." Part of this category was separated out into what is now known as teletypewriter exchange service. Most of the remainder of the old category is now in what is called wire mileage service.

From 1965 until present, common carriers and communications companies have been exempted from the telephone tax on WATS telephone calls. They are also exempted on what used to be known as leased wires and talking circuit special services, but since the Government stopped taxing these in 1965, this is no longer technically an exemption. The Government also no longer taxes what used to be known as "wire and equipment services."

The legislative history of the 1939, 1958, and 1965 acts is unenlightening. Nowhere does it say why an exemption was provided—or altered.

A problem with exempting radio stations from taxes on WAT's telephone calls, but not ordinary long distance calls, is that this discriminates against smaller stations and smaller networks. The Black Radio Network, the Mutual Black Network, and the National Black Network cannot afford WATS lines. Their more well-heeled competitors like CBS, NBC, and ABC can. Long distance telephone calls by small black radio networks are taxed; their competitors' calls are not. This is a discrimination that I do not think we ought to allow.

My bill amends section 4253(f) of the tax code and would extend the exemption for common carriers and communications companies to all "toll telephone" calls.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the text of the bill to be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2883

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (a) Subsection (f) of section 4253 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to an exemption for common carriers and communications companies) is amended by deleting "(2)" in the phrase "section 4252(b)(2)".

(b) This amendment shall take effect on the date of enactment.●

S. 2884. A bill to lower the rate of duty on sulfathiazole until the close of December 31, 1985; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 2885. A bill to suspend the duty on sulfapyridine until the close of December 31, 1985; to the Committee on Finance.

DUTIES ON CERTAIN SULFA DRUGS

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, on July 21 I introduced S. 1979, a bill to suspend duties on certain sulfa drugs. Today, I am introducing two bills involving the same subject matter. I have every reason to believe that the controversial aspects of the previous legislation have been resolved.

This legislation addresses the need to reduce the cost of sulfanamides, which include the three compounds mentioned in these bills. These drugs are used in a high percentage of all hogs produced in the United States either for therapeutic purposes or in the feed supply. In closing it must be stressed that there is no U.S. manufacturer of sulfathiozole or sulfapyridine. Thus, lowering the duty will be a positive development for consumers and pork producers alike.

By Mr. MITCHELL:

S. 2887, A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to reform and simplify the individual income tax; to the Committee on Finance.

PERSONAL INCOME TAX REFORM ACT OF 1982

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, public dissatisfaction with the structure of the Federal income tax has reached a level unmatched in recent history. Today, I am introducing legislation to reform and simplify the Tax Code.

We face a major challenge in reforming Federal tax laws. Recent public opinion polls reveal a distributing trend: More and more people now feel that the income tax is the "most unfair" tax that they must pay. Such a finding is of great concern because the Federal Government relies on the personal income tax for almost half of the revenues it collects. This attitude no doubt contributes to the high level of dissatisfaction with the performance of the Federal Government, since the tax system is the means through which many people most frequently come into contact with the Government.

Reforming the income tax can also play a major role in addressing the serious problems now besetting our economy. Economists have long recognized that excessively high tax rates can discourage work effort and distort saving and investment decisions. Last year's tax bill acknowledged these problems but did not address them. This year's tax bill contained some reform provisions, but it was basically a tax increase bill. The fundamental problems of the current tax system remain.

The Congress last year focused on across-the-board rate reductions and ignored the distributional aspects of those reductions. Moreover, it overlooked the available opportunities to broaden the tax base. By eliminating or modifying many tax preferences, my bill will allow a much greater reduction in tax rates.

Senator BRADLEY has offered the most comprehensive tax reform proposal to date. I commend him for the hard work he has performed in drafting his innovative proposal. My legislation is very similar to his in the changes in deductions, exclusions, and credits, but it differs in the schedule of tax rates proposed.

A basic tax rate of 12 percent would apply to all taxpayers. Above $40,000 in annual income for married couples ($25,000 for single taxpayers), a progressive surtax would apply. The net result would be a 20-percent rate applied to income between $40,000 and $50,000 ($25,000 to $30,000 on single returns), 30 percent on income between $50,000 and $60,000 ($30,000 to $37,000 on single returns), and 36 percent on income above $60,000 (above $37,000 on single returns). In effect, the number of tax brackets would be reduced from 13 to 4.

The proposed range of the tax rates of 12 to 36 percent compares to 12 to 50 percent under current law.

Furthermore, the zero bracket amount (below which no tax is paid) for joint returns would be increased to $4,600 from $3,400. The personal exemption would be raised to $1,500 from $1,000.

Complementing these tax reductions would be the elimination or modification of most exclusions, deductions, and credits. This assures that the simplified tax system would produce the same amount of revenues that the current system is expected to produce.

I do not believe that all deductions and exclusions should be eliminated. Because one of the central purposes of this proposal is to restore confidence in the tax system, it would be counterproductive to repeal these tax provisions that enjoy wide public support and serve valid purposes. Thus, my bill would retain the deduction for charitable contributions, which plays an important role in enhancing the voluntary spirit in our society. The bill would also continue the home mortgage interest deduction, which has helped produce one of the highest rates of private homeownership in the world.

Other provisions that my bill would continue include the deduction for State and local taxes, the exclusion for social security and veterans benefits, and the exemption of interest on general obligation bonds.

I feel very strongly that any new system should continue to be based on the ability to pay. That is, differences in tax liabilities should reflect differences in taxpayers' ability to pay their taxes. The share of a family's income that must be devoted to necessities declines as income rises. On that basis our tax system has historically levied higher taxes on those most able to pay them, and lower taxes on those with lower income.

My belief in this approach explains why my bill is not a pure "flat tax" proposal. If adopted a pure flat rate has the potential of even further undermining confidence in government by eliminating all progressivity from the tax system. The very wealthy would have their taxes slashed, while the low- and middle-income taxpayers would end up paying more. That result would defeat the purpose of enacting comprehensive income tax reform.

Once the principle of ability to pay is accepted, the task is to determine what the tax rate schedule will be. In constructing this schedule, I believe that we should not overlook the effect of last year's tax cut on the distribution of the income tax.

Last year, administration officials argued that their proposed across-the-board rate reductions were fair because all tax rates were reduced by the same percentage. In the absence of inflation and higher social security taxes, that argument might have been true. But both inflation and the scheduled social security tax increases raise the tax liabilities of low- and moderate-income individuals disproportionately. Thus, the net effect of the tax cut once those factors are considered, is to provide greater tax relief for the wealthy. By 1984, taxpayers earning more than $50,000 who in the aggregate contribute about one-third of all income taxes, will receive about two-thirds of the net tax cut.

I believe that this result is unfair. Any tax reform that Congress enacts should achieve a more progressive distribution of taxes than current law will provide. My bill attempts to do that.

The benefits of my bill are obvious once the defects of the current system are examined. These defects are largely attributable to the pattern of tax legislation over the last few decades. Special preferences were carved out of the tax base one at a time, either as a result of sincere efforts to accomplish some specific policy objective, or as a result of lobbying by special interests to secure privileged treatment. Consequently, the tax base has shrunk relative to personal income. In 1982, for example, taxable income is expected to be only 60 percent of personal income.

To meet the Government's revenue needs, tax rates have had to remain high.

One result of this system is that middle-income workers are now subject to high marginal tax rates, as inflation has pushed these taxpayers into higher and higher brackets. In contrast, many upper income taxpayers have been able to shield themselves from the high statutory rates by taking advantage of tax shelters. Also, since most special tax breaks relate to investment income, wage earners have not been able to take advantage of the increasing number of tax preferences. Thus, working Americans by and large pay rates very close to the maximum rates set forth for them in the Tax Code, while wealthy Americans do not. Furthermore, these high rates discourage work effort and savings by middle-income workers.

A second problem with the current system is the complexity of determining one's tax liability. It is estimated that 40 percent of all taxpayers rely on professional help to fill out their tax returns. The confusion and costly compliance resulting from the existing individual income tax are far too great.

The current system erodes public confidence in basic government functions and directs too many resources to complying with the tax system that could be devoted to productive users.

Third, the tax system is widely perceived to be unfair. Most preferences are in the form of deductions or exclusions from income. Thus, the value of these preferences to each individual depends on his or her tax bracket. The higher one's income, the more valuable the tax preference. As tax breaks proliferate, progressivity declines and the perceived inequity of the Tax Code increases. Also, two taxpayers with identical incomes may pay very different amounts in taxes, depending on their sources of income or how they spend it. A fairer tax would strive to have all taxpayers with the same income paying the same amount in taxes.

Finally, tax evasion is encouraged by all these factors—a desire to avoid high tax rates, an increasingly complex tax code, and a perception by many taxpayers that they are paying more than their fair share. The IRS estimates that as much as $65 billion in revenues may be lost to tax cheating.

The appropriate response to these problems is a broader tax base accompanied by substantially lower tax rates. This simplified tax system would lower tax rates for the majority of middle-income Americans, encourage economic growth, reduce the cost of complying with the Tax Code, make the tax system more equitable, and reduce the incentives to evade taxes.

This approach differs markedly from past tax reform efforts which have been piecemeal, hastily prepared and usually offered for other purposes. A recent glaring example was the attempt to modify the deduction for business meals, the so-called "three-martini-lunch" proposal. This measure was first proposed in the Senate at about 4 a.m. during the Senate's marathon session on the 1982 tax increase legislation. No debate was permitted on the proposal. The purpose of the amendment was to raise revenue, not to achieve tax reform. Since full repeal of the deduction would have raised more revenue than was necessary at the time, the proposal before the Senate was to preserve the deduction in full for business lunches which occur away from the taxpayer's place of residence and to reduce the deduction to 50 percent of the cost of these business lunches which occur in the locality of the taxpayer's residence.

I voted against this amendment because it was obviously an effort to raise revenue, not to accomplish tax reform. Also, passage of this "modification" could create the impression of reform, making real reform more difficult, even though the "modification" essentially preserves the deduction. If the real objective were to reform the Tax Code, no deduction at all would be allowed for business meals, regardless of whether the meals occurred at home or on a business trip. The vast majority of working Americans eat lunches during the business day for which they are entitled to no deductions. A provision that allows a few taxpayers to force other taxpayers to share the expense of their lunches is exactly the type of provision that undermines public confidence in the tax system. This deduction should be repealed entirely, which my bill would do.

A second example of past tax reform efforts that have fallen short is the minimum tax on individuals. Proposals to impose a stronger minimum tax have a worthwhile objective—assuring that each individual pays a minimum amount of taxes each year—and I have supported such proposals. In the context of our current Tax Code, with all of its exclusions and deductions, there is really no choice other than to oppose a minimum tax on those taxpayers who, by using many of these preferences, reduce their taxes to negligible amounts.

Unfortunately, the minimum tax simply papers over the more fundamental problem of the Tax Code. The fact that the minimum tax has been overhauled twice in the last 4 years is an indication that we are not satisfied with the effectiveness of this approach in producing an equitable tax system. Rather than simply imposing a special tax on the current system, with all of its loopholes, we should directly attack those provisions that allow high-income taxpayers to escape paying their fair share.

Attempts to deal with the marriage penalty also illustrate the advantage of my simplified approach. The marriage penalty, which is the extra tax that two single people must pay if they get married, results from the high tax rates that are applied to the second spouse's income.

Last year's tax bill reduced the marriage penalty by introducing a new deduction for part of the earnings of the low-earning spouse. While this was a step in the right direction, this measure did not eliminate the marriage penalty, and it involves yet another complex calculation in determining a family's tax liability.

My bill would eliminate this new deduction, but it would also virtually eliminate the marriage penalty for most couples with total income under $40,000. Those making more than $40,000 would still have a reduction in the marriage penalty. This is possible because my bill applies a flat rate on incomes up to $40,000 on joint tax returns.

In summary, legislation that would broaden the tax base and reduce tax rates offers the most satisfactory approach to achieving the goal of tax reform. My bill will encourage economic growth and restore respect for the Tax Code while still recognizing the need to distribute the tax burden fairly.

S.J. Res. 239. Joint resolution designating October 16, 1982 as "National Newspaper Carrier Appreciation Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL NEWSPAPER CARRIER APPRECIATION DAY

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a joint resolution proclaiming October 16, 1982, as "National Newspaper Carriers Appreciation Day."

One of the cornerstones of our democracy is a free and open press, as affirmed by the freedom-of-the-press clause of the first amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Every day, more than 107 million Americans read one or more of the 9,396 daily, weekly, or other newspapers published in the United States. Approximately 1 million newspaper carriers deliver 83 percent of these papers.

The Department of Labor ranks newspaper employment as the Nation's largest manufacturing employer with 432,000 employees. Of the newspaper carriers included in this figure, an overwhelming 90 percent of them are 18 years of age or under. Having once been a newspaper carrier myself, I know that newspaper carriers are often subject to inclement weather, and occasionally their hard work goes unappreciated.

For these reasons, I am pleased to introduce this joint resolution, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 239

Whereas newspapers and their availability to the citizens comprise a cornerstone of a free society and of our democracy, as affirmed under the freedom of the press clause of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution;

Whereas every day more than 107 million Americans read one or more of the 9,396 daily, weekly, or other newspapers published in the United States;

Whereas 83 percent of the daily newspapers printed in the United States are delivered to the homes of readers;

Whereas newspaper carriers have always played an important and vital role in the distribution of newspapers;

Whereas there are approximately one million newspaper carriers in the United States;

Whereas 90 percent of such newspaper carriers are 18 years of age or under; and

Whereas it is appropriate to acknowledge the too often unappreciated contribution of newspaper carriers to freedom, and to recognize their devoted efforts in delivering the paper regardless of inclement weather: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 16, 1982, be designated as "National Newspaper Carriers Appreciation Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate celebrations and activities.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the joint resolution offered by my distinguished colleague from Virginia designating October 16, 1982, as "National Newspaper Carriers Appreciation Day."

Newspapers have always been and continue to be one of our primary sources of news, information, and entertainment. And the overwhelming majority of our newspapers are delivered, everyday and often through adverse weather conditions, by approximately 1 million newspaper carriers. These individuals, many of whom are 18 years old or younger, deserve our recognition, indeed our thanks, for their hard work and sense of responsibility. So it is entirely fitting that we should set aside October 16 to honor our Nation's newspaper carriers.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 458—RESOLUTION RELATING TO THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

Mr. JACKSON (for himself, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. CHILES, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. DIXON, Mr. DODD, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. GARN, Mr. GORTON, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MATHIAS, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. PERCY, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. SARBANES, and Mr. WEICKER) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

S. RES. 458

Whereas export of American products are vitally important to our nation's economy and support one of every seven jobs in this country;

Whereas unemployment is a serious concern of all Americans and statistics show that each $1,000,000,000 in exports supports over 30,000 jobs;

Whereas growth in our exports will improve our balance of trade deficit and promote economic growth;

Whereas inadequate budget authority for fiscal year 1983 for the Export-Import Bank direct loan authority limits our competitive position with other industrialized nations for export business; and

Whereas the Export-Import Bank requires only commitment authority and not direct appropriations:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) The Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs of the Senate shall investigate ways to strengthen the Export-Import Bank with the aim of ensuring that United States exports are competitive with respect to financing with other exports in world markets;

(2) The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate shall provide sufficient authority for Export-Import Bank so as to enable United States exporters to compete in world markets;

(3) The Export-Import Bank shall meet its charter obligation by providing United States exporters with competitive financial support and, accordingly, the Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the Export-Import Bank of the United States.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I am submitting today a bipartisan resolution whose aim is to express the sense of the Senate that the Export-Import Bank of the United States should be strengthened.

The Export-Import Bank was created by the Congress. It is supported by the Congress. And it is directed by the Congress to provide competitive financing terms to buyers of U.S. exports. So Congress should speak up regarding the Bank's needs.

Permit me briefly to summarize what the resolution says and why.

First, the resolution calls upon the Senate Banking Committee to investigate ways to strengthen the Export-Import Bank.

The economic realities of the world marketplace must be recognized. These realities involve an interdependent world. The free enterprise system is facing worldwide market competition.

The competition have their roots in a set of national priorities established by their government. The United States has no such commitment. And our lack of resolve shows up in national statistics—statistics on trade deficits, unemployment, business failures, idle capacity, and loss of product superiority.

This Nation needs a strong commitment to exports.

My colleague, Senator HEINZ, has introduced Senate bill 2600. This legislation, I believe, provides an excellent working paper from which we can explore the ills of the Bank and establish our Nation's commitment to exports. And, as a cosponsor, I am hopeful that the Senate Banking Committee will move quickly on this measure.

Second, the resolution calls upon the Senate Appropriations Committee to provide sufficient authority for the Export-Import Bank.

Sharp reductions in the lending authority of the Bank have been recommended. The Bank is currently being funded at a level of $4.4 billion for direct loans and $9.2 billion for loan guarantees. The administration has requested $3.8 billion for direct loans and $8 billion for loan guarantees for fiscal year 1983. These figures reflect a 13-percent reduction in funding.

I am concerned about these reductions in the Bank's authority.

Why reduce a program that increases exports when the national deficit reached almost $40 billion last year?

Why reduce a program that produces jobs when the unemployment rate is 9.8 percent?

And, why reduce a program that provides money for the Treasury when the projected deficit for fiscal year 1983 is over $100 billion?

Third, the resolution asks the Export-Import Bank to provide U.S.

exporters with competitive financial support.

The Export-Import Bank is not fulfilling the mandate laid down by Congress in the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945. The statute explicitly states that "competitive terms" means "terms and conditions which are competitive with the government-sponsored rates and terms and other conditions available for the financing of exports from the principal countries whose exports compete with U.S. exporters."

I want to emphasize competitive financing. Competitive financing means reliable financing. It means financing available to foreign buyers based on a consistent set of guidelines. These guidelines must support the sale of products in world markets. This is necessary for export financing to be competitive, and the U.S. industry does not have it.

So Congress must send a message to our competitor nations and the world marketplace of buyers. Each should know of the resolve of this Congress to support the competitive force of the Export-Import Bank as charterec..

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join today in cosponsoring the resolution offered by the senior Senator from the State of Washington. The resolution affirms the Senate's belief that the Export-Import Bank has a vital role to play in insuring that U.S. exports are competitive with respect to financing with other exports in world markets. It is important for us to recognize that the unreasonable and predatory official export credit practices used by our trade competitors unfairly to compete with American exporters pose a serious threat to our Nation's exporting community. If we do not act to meet this threat, it is not only our exporting community which will suffer, but also any hope we have for economic recovery.

We can no longer allow to continue unchecked the anticompetitive export financing practices of our foreign competitors. Attempts to negotiate an international agreement to end these practices have proven fruitless. The adoption of this resolution, therefore, will serve notice that we will not allow our Nation's exporting sector to be unfairly disadvantaged in its ability to compete in the world marketplace.●

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am pleased to be joining today with Senator JACKSON and more than 20 of my colleagues in introducing a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate in support of the Export-Import Bank. I am not sure that such support was ever more needed than it is today. The Bank is under attack from many sides, while the need for its export support of facilities has never been more acute. Our trade competition are continuing their efforts to export their unemployment to our shores by providing their businesses with highly subsidized export credits. This puts our own producers at a disadvantage, since they are unable to match the predatory credit terms due to a lack of resources at the Eximbank and an unwillingness to use aggressively the resources that are available.

Mr. President, this fiscal year the Export-Import Bank will likely fall hundreds of millions of dollars short of using the program authority that the Congress gave it. This will not happen because there is no need for Eximbank support. That need has only increased over the past months as sale after sale has been lost to foreign exporters using aggressive financing. It will fall short because the Bank has over the past year pursued policies that have made Eximbank terms so unattractive that American producers have despaired of obtaining competitive financing from the institution that is chartered to provide it.

The dangers of an underfunded and unaggressive Eximbank are becoming clear to us, Mr. President, as our trade competitors, sensing a lack of willingness to defend our export markets, are now increasing their efforts to win sales in our domestic market by means of highly subsidized export credits. Mr. President, the time to have stopped this credit war was long ago; now it is coming home. Just last week the Subcommittee on International Finance and Monetary Policy, which I chair, held a hearing on the sale of subway cars to New York City's Metropolitan Transit Authority, a sale which was won by a Canadian producer armed with a 9.7-percent export package provided by the Canadian Government. America's last producer of subway cars was the loser in that deal. But we are all losers when a sale is lost due to uncompetitive financing: Jobs are lost, tax revenues are lost, foreign exchange is lost, and the free market is undermined because the sale is awarded to the less efficient producer. This loss spreads to our national security when it is one of our strategic industries that is victimized. I am referring to our aerospace, machine tool, and electronics industries, which have suffered particularly severely in an export credit war that we did not begin and which we have been unwilling to fight. Our unilateral disarmament is daily translating into clear defeat.

It is true, Mr. President, that there have been some improvments in our negotiations over export credits within the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. That progress, however, has been insufficient, little more than regulating the export credit war, but not ending it. In fact, Mr. President, steps that would lead to an end of this competition have thus far been resolutely resisted by the French and other countries that think they are benefiting from the subsidized export credits. What little progress that has been achieved has come in direct relation to the perception abroad that the United States is beginning to take action to defend its interests. That perception has been promoted in large measure by action in the Congress, such as the Competitive Export Financing Act that I and several of my colleagues introduced last year and which was reported by the Banking Committee early in the fall. Timely adoption of that measure alone would do a great deal to bring an end to this senseless subsidizing.

The Export-Import Bank is our defense against predatory export financing. Now is the time to press hard our determination to make subsidized financing unprofitable for our trade competitors by denying them any advantage from it. Strong support for the Export-Import Bank at this point will bring about the conclusion of negotiations leading to the end of official export credits as a factor in international trade, and that is the goal which I am confident we all share.

I congratulate Senator JACKSON and my fellow cosponsors of this resolution—it is timely. It is important that the sense of the Senate be dramatized on this issue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a recent editorial appearing in U.S. News & World Report, entitled "Give U.S. Business a Break," be included in the RECORD at this point. The article clearly shows that the time for action, such as that which is urged in the resolution being introduced today, has arrived.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From U.S. News & World Report, Aug. 2, 1982]

GIVE U.S. BUSINESS A BREAK

(By Marvin Stone)

It should be instructive to this administration to comprehend fully the vehemence with which our allies are reacting to President Reagan's effort to block the building of a Soviet gas pipleline to Western Europe.

Details of that story are on pages 25 and 26.

The pipleline, after all, is the largest East-West business venture ever undertaken. It means tens of thousands of jobs in Western Europe. Protecting their export industries, thus protecting jobs, is a high priority with those governments. In this case, our allies are saying: Jobs are important—far more important than good relations with Mr. Reagan.

What should be instructive in all this is that in most countries of the world govenment and business are partners. Not here. The U.S. government remains virtually the only major industrial power that hampers, rather than helps, its exporting industries.

Take the Export-Import Bank, a federal agency whose function is to help U.S. companies sell more abroad by easing credit terms to purchasers. For two years the Office of Management and Budget has been reducing the agency's lending power—although, so far, Eximbank has never cost the taxpayers a cent.

Moreover, the Eximbank Board of Directors has set rates so high that competitor countries consistently beat those rates.

When other nations offer cheaper credit, they capture the trade. Last year this country exported 27.3 billion dollars less of merchandise than it imported.

How much does that matter? Senator John Heinz says that "if we had just broken even in the merchandise trade balance last year almost 1 million more Americans would have had jobs . . . and the budget deficit would have been cut by a third." That would have looked pretty good at a time when 10 million Americans are trying to eat without paychecks and the budget deficit hangs above 100 billion.

Now the U.S. and European nations have made a new agreement closing some, but not all, of the gaps between their export credit rates and ours. That helps in competing abroad, but nobody thinks it is going to balance trade anytime soon. The word from Heinz's camp, which is pushing a bill to provide competitive rates along the line, is, "We don't think it's a very significant change."

There has been a widespread impression that most Eximbank help goes to big, rich companies—Boeing, for instance. That is not wholly accurate. Big companies do indeed get a major share of Eximbank assistance. But, as Caterpillar Tractor's chairman, Lee Morgan, has pointed out: "Eximbank was used directly by more than 2,600 U.S. firms" in 1981.

As for Boeing, its U.S. companies employ more than 95,000 persons and use the services of 4,000 subcontractors with uncounted thousands of workers. Boeing officials have predicted that, if Eximbank credit is not revised to match foreign subsidies, the U.S. aircraft industry could be reduced to one manufacturer and 300,000 jobs could be lost.

Boeing's own recent experience offers a dramatic example of what happens when the U.S. does not compete effectively. French offers of cheap credit gobbled up the rich Mideast market for aircraft. The orders went to Europe's Airbus, diminishing the future for Boeing's forthcoming new models. Jobs and the trade balance hang on such an episode.

This year, for the first time, an operating deficit is forecast for Eximbank—but it has built up a reserve of 2 billion dollars. Heinz wants to vote it a kitty of a billion and tell it to go out and meet the foreign competition.

Whether or not the precise terms of Heinz's legislation are the best, there assuredly is an urgent need for action. A coalition of union and industry officials and state governors is calling for steps to bolster the U.S. export effort by some means or other. We cannot survive by what Senator Heinz calls "unilateral economic disarmament."●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE ALL-AMERICAN DRUNK

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, we must engage in war. A war to end the slaughter of 70 Americans a day, 26,000 Americans a year. Americans who are innocent victims, many of them children, who die horrible deaths by fire and force. Victims who leave behind bereft families whose grief is worsened because they have to watch as the killers go free—free to kill and maim again.

Mr. President, I am speaking about the war we must wage against the Nation's drunk drivers. If there were a plane crash every day in the United States, caused by a pilot who was flying under the influence of alcohol, that resulted in the death of 70 people, you better believe that this country would be up in arms clamoring for something to be done about the problem. Well, every day 70 Americans do die in crashes, but they are in automobiles. The deaths are the result of an impaired pilot, the driver who is drunk.

Airline safety is a subject that is not taken lightly in our Nation. Great concern, caution, and care is exercised to prevent deaths and injuries that result from a plane crash. If a crash occurs, the press convenes on the scene, along with the Aeronautics Safety Board, and the country joins in the ensuing moratorium until the cause of the crash is uncovered and we are assured it will not happen again.

This is not the case in our response to auto crashes. Despite the fact that drunk driving is the most common form of violent death in the Nation, no moratorium is convened. In fact, I believe that drunk driving has become an accepted part of American life. We read the horror stories, and they have an all-American ring. We watch as the winner of the first Academy Award for best actress, Janet Gaynor, struggles for life after a taxi she was riding in is struck broadside by the drunken driver of a van and smashed into a tree. The other injured rider in the taxi is none other than Peter Pan; that is, the musical star Mary Martin, whose friend and manager, Ben Washer, was killed in the crash. The drunken driver? Well, like Peter Pan, he must have somehow learned to fly; within a few hours he was released from jail and is free. We barely pause long enough to let the news sink in before we are off in our own cars to possibly face the same fate.

We make excuses—perhaps we recall the time we ourselves were behind the wheel and should not have been. We think how easily it could have happened to us, but we were lucky. So we look the other way, thinking "There but for the Grace of God go I."

We do not want to embarrass our neighbors with the stigma—the label of alcoholic—which is socially unacceptable. I believe there is no stigma associated with being a drunk driver in this country today. Rather, I think it has the blessing and protection of the large majority of our citizens, the very same citizens who would no more stand for 70 plane fatalities a day than they would for an epidemic that killed 26,000 people a year—which is what drunk driving does. We do not tolerate plane crashes or killer epidemics, but we look the other way when it comes to getting the drunken driver off our highways.

Yes, I know it is a complex problem. If three people sit down together to discuss the issue, you have one person talking about highway safety; another addressing the subjects of police and the courts and enforcement; and the third will be talking about addiction and alcoholism and health. But complexity is no excuse for inaction. It does not explain or justify our disinterest and avoidance of the problem.

This is why I was especially pleased to see President Reagan sign the Executive order that created the Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving a few months ago. It is my hope that this act will trigger responses in every level of our society.

In my home State of Indiana, our Governor announced the creation of a drunk driving commission last month. I think that every State needs to look closely at what it is doing to address the problem, just as every American citizen needs to look carefully at the role they play in perpetuating this menace.

Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD an article that recently appeared in Newsweek magazine discussing this issue.

The article follows:

THE WAR AGAINST DRUNK DRIVERS

The horror of those seconds will forever haunt Cindy Ferguson. She was driving her three sons—the identical twins Tommy and Tony and her baby, Lee—to a party, when suddenly her Vega was smashed from behind. A tremendous explosion hurled her, Tony and Lee onto the street. Cindy raced back to the car and pulled Tommy's burning body from the wreck, throwing herself on him to smother the flames. A friend, Steve Willoughby, remained trapped inside, screaming, a halo of fire encircling his face. As Cindy lay there on top of her son, the other driver approached her. But when she pleaded for help, he staggered away. Willoughby, 20 and Lee Ferguson, two, died on that Memphis street. Tommy, five, was in critical condition for six months with burns over 65 percent of his body. He has lost almost all use of his kidneys and most of his hearing. He has had 100 operations already and faces 14 years of reconstructive surgery.

The other driver suffered a broken nose. Despite at least seven drunk-driving arrests in four years, he had never spent a day in jail. His 5- to 10-year sentence for second-degree murder provided little solace for Mrs. Ferguson. But her nightmare was primarily responsible for Tennessee passing one of the toughest drunk-driving laws in the nation—despite concerns that it would overcrowd the courts and prisons. "I was more concerned," said state Sen. Curtis Person, its sponsor, "about the overcrowding of hospitals, morgues and cemeteries."

Drunk driving is a national epidemic, what one reformer calls America's "socially accepted form of murder" (chart, page 37). More Americans have died at the hands of drunk drivers during the past two years than were killed in Vietnam; on average, about three Americans are killed and 80 are injured by drunk drivers every hour of every day. The drunken slaughter over the past decade is a staggering one-quarter of a million Americans—the entire population of Rochester, N.Y. Safety experts say that one out of two Americans will be victimized by a drunk driver in his lifetime is hardly surprising when the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) contends that up to 10 percent of all drivers on weekend nights are legally intoxicated.

But finally, outraged Americans are trying to put an end to the carnage. In a major break with past public policy, which concentrated on highway-safety conditions and protective devices such as air bags, a coast-to-coast crusade aims at getting drunk drivers themselves off the roads. A recent Gallup poll indicated that fully 77 percent of all Americans support mandatory prison sentences even for first-time offenders. President Reagan has declared the campaign a national priority, and Congress is considering bills that would award money to states that crack down.

FAILED EXPERIMENT

Already 27 state legislatures this year have passed their own versions of the toughest drunk-driving bill in the nation, and more legislation is pending in others. Twenty states have boosted the legal drinking age, reversing a Vietnam-era trend toward lower drinking ages that made alcohol-related crashes by far the single biggest killer of Americans between the ages of 16 and 24. In New Jersey the average number of persons killed annually by 18- to 20-year-old drivers climbed by 176 percent after the state lowered its drinking age to 18. "Statistics have shown us that kids can't handle alcohol," says New Jersey state Sen. C. Louis Bassano, sponsor of a bill to raise the drinking age to 21. "It's an experiment that has failed."

Liquor is so integrated into the nation's social and economic fabric that until recently, drinking and driving was an almost untouchable political issue. But the drunk driver who kills isn't usually the social drinker who has had one beer too many (box, page 36). The NHTSA reports that the average blood alcohol concentration of a drinking driver killed in a crash is .20—twice the rate for legal intoxication in most states. Still, judges, juries, prosecutors and legislators, most of whom drink socially, have tended to view the drunk driver with "there but for the grace of God, go I" sympathy (page 38). The result: loopholed laws that have been cumbersome to enforce, wholesale plea bargaining (California charged only 5,000 people with reckless driving in 1978, but permitted 80,000 drivers to plead guilty to it) and judgments of the lecture-and-slap-on-the-wrist variety (Idaho arrested 1,800 persons for drunk driving last year, convicted one-third of them and jailed just two). Explains NHTSA administrator Raymond Peck, "The well-scrubbed father of four standing before the judge doesn't look anything like the falling-down drunk that was pulled out of the wreck."

TIME BOMBS

America's tacit acceptance of drinking and driving has the effect of loosing time bombs on the nation's highways. An example was a Georgia man who, after his 13th conviction for driving while drunk, was sentenced to just one year in prison. Thus, he was drunk and on the road again 20 months later when he crashed and killed himself. Or consider the case of William Rowan. Rowan was once sentenced to 45 days in jail, a mild penance for a California driving record that carried six convictions for drunk or reckless driving, two for hit and run. Last March, after leaving a downtown Santa Ana bar, Rowan drove onto a sidewalk, killing four-year-old David Gunderman, who was waiting for the ice-cream man. After hitting the child, Rowan slumped in his seat and lit a cigar. Police measured his blood alcohol content at .27.

Campaigns against drunk driving have always had sobering truths on their side; what they lacked was a real constituency. All that may have changed one spring afternoon in 1980, when 13-year-old Cari Lightner of Fair Oaks, Calif., was struck from behind and killed by a hit-and-run driver as she walked to a church carnival. Cari's mother was stunned to learn that the driver, a 47-year-old man who had two previous drunk-driving convictions and was out on bail on a third arrest, had spent only two days in jail previously and was unlikely to wind up there for killing Cari. Candy Lightner quit her real-estate job and launched Mothers Against Drunk Drivers (MADD), giving the public outcry against dunk driving the constituency it has always needed—the victims.

In the past, says Edward Kunec, a NASA official who joined MADD in Virginia after his 20-year-old son was killed by a drunk driver last summer, "people who had these tragedies closeted themselves and said it was fate or the will of the Lord. Now people are coming out of the closet—and they are angry." In just two years, MADD has grown to 83 chapters in 29 states. Remove Intoxicated Drivers-USA (RID), founded in New York under similarly tragic circumstances, went national last year and now boasts 55 chapters in 29 states. The anger that is the movement's glue has made these organizations aggressively self-righteous and militant. "You can't be too strident," explains RID national coordinator Doris Aiken. "I don't know how you can tell someone nicely that they are incompetent to drive." Aiken warns those who view this campaign as a fad that will soon fade: "The pendulum will not swing back. There is an endless supply of victims."

The legal system often transforms the victims' grief into outrage. Paul Lawler, 15, died five days after a van barreled off a Massachusetts highway and into a restaurant entrance, pinning him against the restaurant wall. The drunk at the wheel was on probation for his third drunk-driving conviction. He was sentenced to four and a half years in prison—including the then maximum of two and a half years for vehicular homicide—and is eligible for parole next July, just two years after the accident. "I was under the impression anyone arrested for this kind of thing would have the book thrown at him," says Paul's mother, Carol Lawler, who now heads the Greater Boston chapter of MADD. "I didn't know vehicular homicide was a misdemeanor."

Mark and Bonnie Schuett turned the death of their four-year-old daughter, Kelly, who was killed as she walked near her home in quiet Ixonia, Wis., into a statewide cause célèbre. The driver, a 29-year-old man with a prior drunk-driving arrest, pleaded no contest to driving while intoxicated and was given a suspended five-day jail sentence and fined $284. His license was revoked for a year—but was actually restored after 90 days because he took treatment at an alcohol-abuse center. "This man got away with hitting and killing my child," says Mrs. Schuett. "Her life means more than a $284 fine." As a result of the Schuetts' lobbying effort, a new Wisconsin law went into effect last May that permits the state to suspend the license of anyone arrested for an alcohol-related driving offense—even before a trial. "Maybe we've saved somebody else's life," says Mrs. Schuett. "But I'm still angry."

GUILT

If anger fuels the movement, guilt is its motor oil. Thomas and Dorothy Sexton recall going to court to witness the trial of the man whose blood alcohol content was .26 when he killed the Sextons' 15-year-old son, Tom. They saw a car thief sentenced to two years in jail, while their son's killer—who pleaded guilty to homicide by a motor vehicle—was sentenced to two year's probation and fined $200. "We painfully relate our experience and say, 'If you don't want that to happen to you, let's do something'," says Sexton, a U.S. Department of Agriculture scientist who is now active in Maryland's MADD chapter. "I'm convinced if I had been involved in something like this five years ago, Tom would be alive today."

The movement's approach to the drunk-driving problem is essentially punitive. While legislation varies from state to state, it usually makes driving with .10 blood alcohol content (three beers or glasses of wine or shots of whisky consumed by a 150-pound man in two hours) a crime. In addition, many of the new laws make prision mandatory, if not for the first offense, certainly for the second. They often increase penalties for drivers who refuse the blood alcohol test and require that all convictions—regardless of the court disposition—be listed on a driver's record.

Many states are delighted by the preliminary results of the new laws. In Maryland, drunk-driving arrests by state police have gone up 45 percent and highway fatalities down almost 20 percent since its law went into effect. Maine, which last year began mandatory jail sentences for first-time offenders, has experienced a 47 percent reduction in alcohol-related fatalities. Oregon has had the most experience—its crackdown began in 1971—and the most success. During the '70s, highway fatalities dropped 6 percent and Oregon's fatality rate declined 35 percent despite the presence of 46 percent more drivers and 62 percent more vehicles on the road.

Success may be due to more than tough laws. Oregon has coupled its legal effort with a media campaign that urges Oregonians to report drunk drivers to a special telephone hot line. One hot-line spokesman is Donny Durrant, a former logger who had lost his license four times for drunk driving before he drove off the road at 85 mph and broke his neck. Durrant, now a quadriplegic, says in a TV message: "I wish someone had gotten me off the road before I had the accident which drastically changed my life."

Other states are backing their legislation with a variety of programs. South Dakota places highway signs reading, "X marks the spot . . . THINK!" at the almost 600 locations where drivers have lost their lives since 1979. Some states have considered efforts to stigmatize the drunk driver publicly. One Pennsylvania legislator proposed a special red license plate for all drivers convicted of driving while intoxicated—a modern-day scarlet letter. Local police in both Maryland and Massachusetts have gone so far as to use roadblocks, called "sobriety checkpoints," to deter and detect drunk drivers, though the Massachusetts effort has been ruled unconstitutional by a state court. Many states, however, complain that the new laws overtax their increasingly limited resources. Maine was the only state to include in its crackdown legislative package a new tax on liquor, which is expected to produce $2 million to $3 million annually that will be earmarked for treatment and prevention of alcohol problems.

COURT WATCH

The anti-drunk-driving campaigners are pressuring the courts as well as the legislators. One such group keeps constant watch in North Carolina's Forsyth County District Traffic Court. "People walk up to us and tell us things have changed," says Sandra Nicastro, one of the group's court fixtures. "Lawyers have told their clients, 'I don't think I can get you off this time because that lady's sitting there listening'." Some judges need little encouragement to get tough. Maine judges have meted out an average jail sentence of eight days to drunk drivers under the state's new laws—four times the permitted minimum. And a Mecklenburg County, N.C., judge may have set a new standard when he sentenced a drunk driver, who had eight prior arrests but had caused no injuries, to three years in jail.

Many safety experts insist crusaders should be focusing on automobiles and highways, not on drivers. H. Laurence Ross, a sociology professor at State University of New York at Buffalo, who has studied crackdowns on drunk driving, says deterrence only works for the short term when the problem is treated as a moral one rather than a safety question. In a new book, he writes: "A vehicle and highway that are safe for an alcohol-influenced driver are also safe for a driver who has a heart attack, who dozes off, who drops a lighted cigarette on his lap, who fails to see a stop sign. . . ."

Others are convinced that the lock-'em-up approach is meaningless unless it's combined with therapy. "I don't think the tougher laws will stop the hard-core alcoholics," says Col. Tom Anderson, director of the state police in Alaska, which has had a mandatory prison law since 1978. "It's a mess," agrees Arthur Snowden II, director of the state's court system. "We're just putting people in high-priced jails . . . just taking them off the street is not going to solve the problem." But Maryland district court Judge David Bates thinks he knows the solution. Bates gives drunk drivers the maximum permissible sentence, then waives it if they are willing to enter an appropriate education or treatment program. While it is hard to measure the success of Bates's approach because probationary sentences weren't included on drivers' records until last year, Bates says only 149 of the 5,697 drivers referred to the program dropped out or had their probation revoked.

But putting drunks behind bars does take them off the road in a way revoking their licenses never did. Many of those convicted in the past simply drove without a license. Others easily obtained licenses in other states: a Federal Highway Administration study reported that Ohio in 1977 had issued 1.3 million more licenses than there were driving-age Ohioans. Clarence Busch, who inadvertently launched MADD when he killed Cari Lightner, moved to Wisconsin last fall and obtained a license within a few days. The National Driver Register, a computerized roster of drivers whose licenses have been suspended, revoked or denied, was established in 1960 to remedy such problems. But states can communicate with it only by mail, and with 84,000 inquiries coming in daily, the system is cumbersome and slow.

NO QUESTIONS ASKED

Still, there are signs of reform that just a few years ago would have been unimaginable. One is Students Against Drunk Drivers (SADD), which began as a high-school project in suburban Wayland, Mass., and has been replicated already by students in 150 other schools. In Wayland, 900 students signed SADD contracts with their parents, promising to call home at any hour when a sober ride home is not available. In return, parents pledge "to come and get you at any hour, any place, no questions asked and no argument at that time. . ." Montgomery County, Md., had a surprise for students heading to senior year-end festivities. The boys found a note tucked in their rented tuxedos counseling, "Friends don't let friends drive drunk," and providing a hot-line number that provided free rides home. And in rural Truman, Minn., the high school spent $79 for a breath-testing device for its prom after rowdy drunks disrupted last year's festivities. The machine is now kept in the school vault for use during school hours.

Anti-drunk-driving crusaders hope that breath-testing devices will become as much a fixture on the social scene as the shaker and stirrer, and a number of bars and restaurants have installed them. Anthony Ravosa, a defense attorney who has defended many clients against drunk-driving charges, offers a breath test to customers in his South Hadley, Mass., Riverboat Restaurant and provides courtesy rides home to those who flunk it.

Ravosa's gesture may ultimately prove to be more than simply humanitarian. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court says an establishment can be liable for serving too much booze to a customer, and earlier this year it upheld a $50,000 verdict against a Milford tavern that served "six or more" white russians to a customer who was "obviously intoxicated." That customer later drove off the road killing nine year-old John Cimino.

DRIVING WHILE INTOXICATED

(Many social drinkers think their driving remains unimpaired after a couple of cocktails. Newsweek's Ron Givens tested that thesis under the supervision of New York State police. His report:)

There was something absurd about drinking on an abandoned Schenectady airport runway while surrounded by police, but I wanted to find out how alcohol affected my driving skills. So I drank my gin and tonic next to an unmarked trooper car. As my bartender, Sgt. Henry Michelin, put it: "Just like the neighborhood bar—someplace to lean and drink."

An average male guinea pig—5 feet 10, 170 pounds—I had arranged to take on a difficult state-police driving course both sober and drunk. I supplied the gin and tonic, the state police provided a car. The course requires precise maneuvering around hard rubber cones—forward and backward. Scoring combines the time taken to complete the course with a five-second penalty for each mistake—such as flattening a cone. And a passing tally for troopers is 2 minutes 17 seconds. My blood alcohol level was measured by a preliminary-breath-test (PBT) device the size of a cigarette pack.

After eight practice runs through the course, I had whittled my time down from 3 minutes 10 seconds to a passing score, and it was time to begin drinking. My first gin and tonic—containing three ounces of 80-proof booze—placed my blood alcohol level 45 minutes later at .07 (70 milligrams of alcohol per decaliter of blood), high enough in New York to be charged with driving while impaired by alcohol. At this point I was slightly lightheaded, but I didn't feel uncoordinated. My driving score told a different story. Not only did I add 1 minute 12 seconds to my previous, sober record, but my score was 19 seconds over my very first attempt.

WRETCHED

During my first post-drink attempt, I unconsciously tried to compensate for my condition through caution—a tactic that experts say is common among drunk drivers. In my case it didn't work: it took me longer and I made many more mistakes. This drop-off in performance was intensified by two more drinks, each containing one ounce of gin, which put my blood alcohol level at .11, or enough to be charged with driving with a blood alcohol level of .10 or more. Now I could easily tell that I was uncoordinated. I stumbled slightly when I walked and I flunked the touch-your-nose-with-your-finger test. My driving ability plummeted from poor to wretched. My score—4 minutes 26 seconds—was almost double my final sober result. "You have no business being in an automobile out on the road," said Sergeant Michelin.

While impairment due to alcohol varies from person to person and even, depending on circumstances, for the same individual, experts say that driving skills are significantly diminished at a blood alcohol level of .10. That's why many states have adopted .10 as the limit for determining when someone has been driving while intoxicated. However, Robert Pandina, acting director of the Center of Alcohol Studies at New Jersey's Rutgers University, argues that there is impairment at lower levels as well. Pandina explains that the .10 standard is "a kind of compromise that recognizes that this is a drinking society."

WIDE AWAKE

Contrary to old wives and drinking buddies, nothing will temper the effects of alcohol except the passage of time—about two hours for every ounce consumed. Food slows the release of alcohol into the bloodstream without blunting its effect, and exercise and coffee will only produce a "wide-awake drunk"—someone alert enough to spot trouble but unable to do anything about it. That was clear enough to me as I rode with Sergeant Michelin back to town; my slow-motion brain couldn't keep up with the rush-hour traffic on the highway. I couldn't help remembering the times when I had been this drunk and driven, and the thought scared the hell out of me.

HOW DRUNKS GET OFF

Defense attorney Randy Taylor parades around the courtroom, his arms pinned behind him by handcuffs. After several minutes of histrionic discomfort he compels the cop on the witness stand to remove the cuffs and place them on the defendant, a man charged with driving while intoxicated (DWI). Then Taylor seizes his client and bullies him about. Wasn't that how the police acted when they arrested him? he asks the witness. Finally, the Dallas lawyer shoves his client into a chair and barrels up to the cop: "Isn't it true you said, 'Shut up, you s.o.b.!' and kicked him in the leg?" And Taylor wins an acquittal.

"That's the way you get your client off," Taylor says. "The single most important factor in the typical DWI case is trying to make the jury put themselves in the place of the defendant." Taylor knows few restraints. On one occasion, after pleading his woman client guilty of DWI, he implored the jury, "The government wolves are really howling for blood tonight, waiting to put this poor little girl in jail for 30 days, taking her away from her husband." Then he put the cuffs on her, and she broke down and wept, attesting to the humiliation she had suffered. Despite a prior DWI conviction just 30 days before this arrest, she was sentenced to only three days in jail. Another time Taylor concluded his summation by stage-whispering to his client's four children, "Kids, I've done everything I can for your daddy." Pointing to the jury, he said, "Now it's up to these folks here." The defendant, who Taylor admits was probably guilty, was acquitted in 15 minutes.

The concept of "there but for the grace of God go I" has been the cornerstone of DWI legal defense ever since drunks started stepping on the gas. While the appeal is emotional, its foundation is solidly statistical: a recent Gallup poll reveals that four out of 10 Americans admit to having driven after drinking. But the extraordinary public campaign against drunk driving is having its impact even on jurors who may understand—from personal experience—the drunk driver's plight. The Texas Criminal Defense Lawyers Project recently has sponsored two special programs on DWI defense. Its program notes read: "The public has come to view DWI as a pernicious force in their communities and are demanding stiffer penalties . . . this institute is designed to teach you how to effectively represent your client . . ." Among the tactics garnered from the program and talks with top defense attorneys:

CHALLENGE THE EVIDENCE

Breath-analysis tests should not be accepted as gospel. Force the prosecution to prove that the testing machine was in good working order, that its chemicals had been tested and that its operator had proper qualifications. The tests aren't foolproof. Some people such as diabetics, who have certain chemicals in their breath, or denture wearers, who trap alcohol fumes along their gums, trigger false positive readings. If a blood sample was taken, make sure to request it; if it no longer exists, claim that it was purposely destroyed.

TRACK DOWN WITNESSES

Find people who were with the defendant before he got behind the wheel and get them to testify about how sober he was. Attorney F. Lee Bailey's acquittal on DWI charges in California stemmed partly from testimony about his sober behavior on the evening of his arrest by people who were at the restaurant where Bailey dined.

GET THE INSURANCE COMPANY INVOLVED

Insurers tend to see cases as business problems, not moral issues, and are often anxious to settle damage matters expeditiously. Don't assume that the victim's families want vengeance; often they just want the case to go away too.

VISIT THE SCENE OF THE ARREST

Since it can take up to six months between the arrest and the trial, the arresting officers can often be tripped up on details about the location. "If they [make mistakes]," says Taylor, "I can argue, 'Well, if you can't remember this, why can you remember anything else better?'"

TRY TO TALK WITH THE POLICE—AND HOPE YOU FAIL

When the police won't cooperate, argue that the witness is hostile, biased and has an ax to grind.

CAREFULLY CONSIDER THE CHOICE BETWEEN JUDGE AND JURY

Taylor opts for a jury 95 percent of the time. He says, "I can manipulate the jury's minds more than I can a trial judge who's been on the bench 15 years and seen all my tricks." But cases that revolve around complex points of law may best be left to a judge.

The courtrooms are the ultimate battleground in the war on drunk driving. And to win the war, reformers must find ways to force jurors and judges to sympathize with the victims of drunk drivers, instead of the defendants.●

COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS RECOMMENDS WATER PROJECT STARTS

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, the administration has recommended that construction begin in fiscal year 1983 on nine U.S. Army Corps of Engineers water resources projects, with cost-sharing levels that would reflect more realistically on the local benefits of the projects and Federal budget constraints.

While the decision to initiate these authorized projects rests with the Committee on Appropriations, our committee considers that such a decision necessarily will have significant benefit on our responsibility for the corps activities.

Therefore, the new starts, cost-sharing issue was discussed in our Subcommittee on Water Resources, under its able chairman, Senator ABDNOR, and subsequently in full committee.

Following debate, the Committee on Environment and Public Works agreed to recommend to the Committee on Appropriations that the administration's proposal for new starts be approved.

Mr. President, I ask that a copy of the letter Senator RANDOLPH and I have sent to Chairman HATFIELD be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS,
Washington, D.C. August 12, 1982.

Hon. MARK O. HATFIELD,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works met on August 11, 1982, to discuss the Army Corps of Engineers construction starts proposed by the Administration for the fiscal year 1983 budget. By a roll call vote of 7-2, our Committee supports the inclusion of these projects in the Corps' 1983 appropriations, as recommended by the Administration.

The Committee does not view our recommendation as setting a precedent for future action. We remain uncertain whether the precise levels of cost-sharing requested by the Administration are the most appropriate. We are also uncertain as to whether these projects should be considered the highest priority among those in the Corps' backlog of authorized projects.

Nevertheless, we believe the Administration's proposal represents an important step forward in the development of our nation's water resources, and we commend Assistant Secretary of the Army Gianelli for developing a package of projects that has received strong support from local project sponsors.

We, therefore, urge the Committee on Appropriations to include these projects, as recommended by the Administration, in the fiscal year 1983 Energy and Water Development Appropriations bill.

Inasmuch as the local project sponsors of the Ellicott Creek, New York, project have agreed to pay more than 35 percent of the flood control costs as they are now required to do under current law, we also recommend that the appropriations bill include first year construction funding for this project.

Sincerely yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
Ranking Minority Member.
ROBERT T. STAFFORD,
Chairman.●

COAL PORT DEVELOPMENT WOULD AID ECONOMY

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, a recent editorial that appeared in the Rapid City (S. Dak.) Journal has come to my attention. This editorial rightly praises the leadership and work of our colleague, Senator JIM ABDNOR, for developing legislation that would encourage rapid coal-port development. As the editorial states:

By paving the way for expanded coal exports, the bill would help this nation's economic recovery, and furnish other nations with a reliable alternative to Mideast oil.

This legislation, S. 1692, is now on the Senate Calendar. I support that bill enthusiastically. I would urge the Senate to act soon to consider and pass S. 1692.

Mr. President, because of the importance of this issue, I ask that the editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the Rapid City Journal, Aug. 19, 1982]

COAL PORT DEVELOPMENT WOULD AID ECONOMY

Improving the ability of the United States to compete in the worldwide coal market is the objective of legislation sponsored by South Dakota Sen. James Abdnor.

This country has abundant quantities of coal which other nations could use to meet their energy needs. Exporting this coal would be a shot in the arm for the coal and transportation industries and would improve our balance of trade.

However, nations like South Africa and Australia are outdoing us in global coal trade because they have deep-draft "superports" from which to ship coal more efficiently in large ships.

As chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Water Resources, Abdnor has been concerned about finding a remedy for this trade deficiency. Last year, he introduced the National Harbors Improvement and Maintenance Act. It is aimed at the major stumbling blocks hindering port and harbor development in the United States—a lack of federal dollars and Washington red tape.

The bill received a favorable vote in committee, but Senate floor action is being held up until concerns of senators from states which have smaller ports are dealt with.

Enlarging and deepening a port to increase its shipping capacity is not inexpensive. As Abdnor points out, it would be difficult, if not wholly contradictory, to begin to involve the federal government in the dredging of deep-draft harbors at a time when it is essential to cut taxes and trim government spending. The federal budget cannot, and will not afford that luxury.

For that reason, the legislation Abdnor proposed will continue the federal government's role in maintaining existing harbors, but shift the responsibility for new projects to local port authorities and the shipping companies.

Local authorities would be responsible for new developments and would pass the cost on to shippers through vessel user fees.

Placing port development under the free market system would bypass the traditional political spoils system in which states with more political clout in Congress reap the lion's share of benefits. Shippers would direct their user fee dollars to the most usable and viable projects.

The government would still maintain a role in the maintenance of existing ports through the authorization of $250 million a year for continued dredging. Local authorities would pick up a portion of the costs with a cap on costs to protect smaller ports.

Because it substitutes private sector initiative for government subsidies, the Abdnor-sponsored legislation is in line with the administration's goal of reducing the federal government's annual expenditure of $500 million for ports and harbors.

By paving the way for expanded coal exports, the bill would help this nation's economic recovery, and furnish other nations with a reliable alternative to Mideast oil.●

LOS ANGELES COUNTY EPILEPSY SOCIETY'S 25TH ANNIVERSARY

● Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, 25 years ago in southern California, the Los Angeles County Epilepsy Society, Inc., was founded. Over the past 25 years of countywide service, this organization has been dedicated to helping those persons afflicted by the neurological disorder of epilepsy.

Epilepsy affects 1 in 100 children and 1 in 50 adults, or over 100,000 persons in Los Angeles County alone. This disorder affects people of all races, nationalities, and creeds, regardless of age or sex. Epileptic seizures can be controlled for the majority of epileptic children and adults with proper diagnostic, medical, and social treatment so they can lead normal, productive lives.

The Los Angeles County Epilepsy Society is the only countywide organization in Los Angeles specifically dedicated to serving epileptic children and adults. It supports research and offers counseling, educational, advocacy, referral, group, community, and employment services, and has effectively provided such services in the Los Angeles County area for the past 25 years.

I highly commend the Los Angeles County Epilepsy Society for its outstanding achievement on the occasion of the society's 25th anniversary. I am sure Los Angeles County can expect 25 more years of selflessness and dedication from the people of this organization who work with the community to combat epilepsy.●

CLEAN AIR ACT

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, the Committee on Environment and Public Works recently voted 15 to 1 to report to the Senate legislation that would amend and reauthorize the Clean Air Act.

The bill reported by the committee would continue to protect the public health and the environment and would strengthen the current law in several respects.

When our proposed amendments come to the floor of the Senate, I and others will present arguments to our colleagues on the need to retain a strong Clean Air Act and to strengthen it in some regards.

Until then, I commend to my colleagues an article that appeared in today's edition of the Christian Science Monitor.

The article, authored by ecologist George Woodwell, makes the case that air pollution is a major threat to our Nation's farms and forests, as well as to people, and he argues that the Clean Air Act should be strengthened.

Mr. President, I ask that the article by Mr. Woodwell be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

NEEDED: A CLEAN AIR ACT STRONG ENOUGH TO PROTECT PLANTS

(By George M. Woodwell)

How clean must we keep the air?

The answer has been made complicated; it need not be. It is determined by the requirements for life—by the physical, chemical, and biotic conditions that are required to support living systems. These include not only man himself but those other organisms upon which man depends. It is not determined by partial cost-benefit analyses, or by compromise among competing polluters.

Standards for air quality are derived from two sources: (1) effects on man and (2) effects on other living systems. Criteria based on effects on man are less stringent than those based on effects on plants. This is because plants are more sensitive than people to low-level air pollution. This relationship is true in virtually every circumstance except for ionizing radiation, where standards for protection of man are adequate to protect all other organisms.

It is not surprising that those who may profit from pollution call for relaxed standards on the grounds that hazards to human health are small. Such arguments are largely irrelevant. The most important and demanding criteria are those derived from populations of plants and the factors that affect them. If plants are protected, people will be free of both direct and indirect effects of air pollution.

The costs to industry may be high, but the costs of failure to protect people and plants are far higher. The most immediate issue is the strengthening of the Clean Air Act, now up for renewal in the US Congress, and the governmental apparatus required to carry it.

Consider the Northeastern United States. There has been an increase over the last three decades in both the acidity of rain over North America and the area affected by the acidification. Effects are concentrated in the Northeast. All the acidity is not deposited in rain. A substantial fraction—one-third to one-half—apparently arrives as sulfur dioxide on small particles. It is removed from the air on to surfaces, including leaves, where it is converted to acid.

Other changes include increases in exposure of plants to a variety of contaminants such as ozone and heavy metals. All are produced as a result of the heavy use of fossil fuels in industrialized areas to the west and south. New England bears the brunt of the effects because the storm tracks commonly pass through it.

Effects of this atmospheric chemistry are sufficiently complicated and difficult to measure to provide ample basis for discussion among scientists and equivocation by others. The most clearly defined effect of acid rain is the acidification of lakes and streams in areas where the bedrock contains little limestone. Such areas have granitic rocks, their metamorphic equivalents, or sedimentary rocks that have a low alkalinity and therefore little capacity for neutralizing acids.

Most of New England falls in this category. Its lakes, streams, and ground water are turning acid. The effect is the loss of freshwater fisheries in lakes and streams, the virtual sterilization of the water bodies. High acidity in wells mobilizes aluminum and other metals containing lead from minerals in the ground and in pipes. Aluminum is toxic to plants and certain animals, including fish. Lead and other heavy metals are toxic to people as well.

In certain instances, the additions of the nitrogen and sulfur associated with the acidification have caused increases in growth of trees. There is, however, substantially no basis for assuming that the acid-leaching of forests or agricultural crops by the more acid rains will produce any effect in the longer term apart from impoverishment in essential nutrients, reduction in rates of growth, reductions in agricultural yields, and the loss of species and yields from forests. These effects are in part directly due to the acidification and in part due to increased incidence of diseases favored by any generalized stress.

The effects of ozone and other components of photochemical smog compound the problem. The national standard for ozone was set in 1971 as 0.08 p.p.m. The EPA reported that, in 1977, all but one of the 34 monitoring stations in New England reported violations of the standard. The standard was increased in 1979 to 0.12 p.p.m. The probability was 95 percent or more that ozone concentrations exceeded the new standards in 1977 and 1980 over extensive areas in the United States, including the Eastern US from south of Washington to Portland, Maine. Many plant species are sensitive to photooxidant damage at concentrations below the current standard.

Evidence for the effects of air pollution on forests is accumulating rapidly. Damage has been shown in stands of white pine along the Blue Ridge Parkway in western Virginia. An average reduction in growth of 40 percent was measured for the period 1955-1977. A similar reduction in the growth of pitch pine has been reported in New Jersey over approximately the same period. Other trees showing severe declines in vigor, even widespread mortality, over extensive areas in New England include the beech, the red spruce, the white ash, and the white and yellow birches. Insect and disease organisms are known to increase under air pollution, and it would be surprising to discover that the problems observed in forests in the Northeast are not caused by the combination of air pollutants now present.

The pattern of change to be expected in the terrestrial vegetation under this series of stresses is well known. These transitions are under way: losses of forest productivity, shifts in species, losses of tree species, all accompanied by losses of freshwater fisheries and the acidification of ground water, with toxic consequences for man.

The evidence is that agricultural yields in the Ohio River Basin are being reduced significantly and that photosynthesis by forests over large areas is also being reduced. A measure of this is seen in the magnitude of reductions in solar energy captured by plants and made available by both agriculture and forests. These range upward to as much as 40 percent in certain circumstances. A general 20 percent reduction in the magnitude of these resources would not be surprising.

If the reduction applies to all of New England's forests, it would, in energy terms, amount to the output of between fifteen and thirty 1,000-megawatt power plants, or 135 to 270 billion kilowatts a year. Valued as electricity, it would be worth $7 billion to $14 billion. This is a substantial subsidy for the New England states to be paying from their forests and pastures and cultivated fields in the interests of industrialization elsewhere.

These statements may appear as mere assertions by an overly sensitive scientist. Each statement, however, can be documented in detail from the extensive literature now available on air pollution and on biotic effects. While none of these statements are beyond argument, the weight of evidence is that our regulatory system, as it stood before it was cut by the present administration, was inadequate to protect the public's vital interests. The proposals to weaken the Clean Air Act further promise still greater erosion of the capacity of the nation to support people.

How clean must we keep the air? Clean enough for green plants.●

TAIWAN

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, I am not the only Member of this body to be alarmed at recent policy decisions by the Reagan administration concerning our relations with Taiwan. The State Department is apparently convinced that if we do not shove our Taiwanese friends toward unification with the mainland, the Chinese Communists in Peking will patch up their 20-year-old quarrel with their Soviet neighbors and the West will once more be confronted with a Red monolith.

I am extremely skeptical of this proposition. In this connection, I would like to quote Anthony Harrigan, president of the United States Industrial Council. Speaking at John Carroll College in Cleveland, Mr. Harrigan, who is one of the most forthright and farseeing champions of American national interests presently in print or on the lecture platform, declared as follows:

It is ironical that Peking has threatened to downgrade relations with the United States if it doesn't halt arms shipments to the free Chinese in Taiwan. How much in the way of arms for Taiwan is in our national interest depends on very precise calculations. But we should not be taken in by Peking's arrogant posturing. Peking needs us, not the other way around.

Mr. Harrigan is absolutely on target here. The Red Chinese do need us more than we need them. The notion that the Chinese, who have bitterly contested Russian encroachments on their borders for centuries, could come to a genuine long-term understanding with Moscow is difficult to believe. It is far more likely that they will continue to seek their security in maintaining relations with the United States or, as Mr. Harrigan suggests, turning to Japan.

I ask that the whole of Mr. Harrigan's address be printed in the RECORD.

The address follows:

THE CRISES OF THE FUTURE: PEACE WITH FREEDOM, INDEPENDENCE AND SECURITY

(By Anthony Harrigan)

We should look beyond current issues to the final years of this century. We can be very sure that the world of the 1990s will be markedly different from the world of the early 1980s. Economies will undergo profound change. Power balances will alter. National and ideological concerns will shift. Only man, with his age-old capacity for good and evil, will remain unchanged in nature.

For all our contemporary interest in futurology, we seem to have a dim awareness of how much change will take place and how it will affect us in this country. The changes that inevitably will take place as we move towards the 21st century will result from the growth of populations, technological transformation, new organizational methods, religious and ideological movements, increases or losses in the capacity to produce food and valuable goods and services, access to energy and natural resources, and the very human factors of will and imagination.

It is unreasonable to suppose that any part of the world will remain an island in time, unaffected by change. The Soviet empire will be changed. Western Europe will be profoundly affected. The Islamic world will either come to terms with modern civilization or revert to a fiery fundamentalism. The Third World—Africa, and parts of Asia and Latin America—will undergo some of the most striking change (and one possibility is that some of the so-called underdeveloped countries will simply sink under the weight of poverty and associated problems). Finally, the United States and its great neighbor, Canada, will move to a new stage of historical development.

The set of changes likely to take place in the free world and the unfree world, in the developed, underdeveloped and quasideveloped nations, will produce a wholly new global pattern, as different as the global pattern of the 1980s is from the global pattern of the 1940s.

A special concern is the future of the Soviet empire. The changes that take place in the policies and structures of the USSR undoubtedly will be the most significant global changes for us, apart from the changes within our own country, for the Soviet Union, for all its internal weakness, possesses the armed might that has the potential of inflicting the most colossal damage on our country and civilization.

Even the layman can discern the potential for enormous change inside the Soviet Union. As we know, the Soviet world is unlike the United States, France or Japan because it is an empire, not a country. It isn't a great unit of power that has arisen out of natural national unity but out of military conquest, ideological warfare, and internal repression. Chief among the captive peoples are the peoples of the Soviet Union, who are controlled and dominated by an alien ideology and by the Russian elite. While one can make too much of historical analogies, one cannot help but find a significant analogy in the Roman Empire and its problems and breakdown on the periphery and the emergence of controlling elements outside of the old ruling elite. Indeed, the Soviets have been far less successful than the Romans in integrating the peoples on the periphery. Rome successfully suppressed many of the peripheral nationalisms, whereas the Soviet Union has not persuaded the peoples of Poland and other captive nations to accept the identity of the new Soviet man.

Moreover, the Soviet ideology is in decline everywhere. The traditional communist parties don't command true allegiance at home or abroad. At home, the regime is increasingly viewed as a privileged class of bureaucrats who have a good thing going for them. Fear of the Soviet regime and its organs continues to operate inside and outside the borders of the USSR, and the active dissident elements are brutally controlled as in Stalin's time. Abroad, the Soviet Union depends on militarized client states, such as Cuba, which also fail their peoples in every respect, and on radicalized, disaffected elements in the West who hate their own countries and civilization—the result of nihilistic feelings deeply embedded in the anti-Christian atmosphere of the modern Western world.

I don't think we should expect that major change in the Soviet empire will come from dissidents or even from popular unrest such as we witness in Poland today. The real change—and I suspect it will be a breakdown—is likely to result from economic failure, which, in turn, results from organizational failure.

As Wolfgang Leonhard has said (Encounter), "the bureaucraticised, centralized economic system in the Soviet empire makes rapid economic development quite impossible." The Soviet empire is frustrated by its own ideology; it is in an economic straitjacket of central state planning which fetters the productive process. Dr. Leonhard, who teaches at Yale University, has noted that "there are some 55 economic ministerial empires for each industrial branch, with every factory director receiving 11 detailed plans for the year, accompanied by some 3,000 detailed directives from above."

This system blocks the introduction of new technology. True, the Soviets have been able to import new technology from the West—the very rope that Lenin said the capitalists would supply—but the long range incorporation of such technology in the Soviet economic system seems unlikely. It's true that the Soviets have been able to score very impressive military-industrial achievements, by concentrating brainpower and resources on a few military objectives, but the rest of the system has suffered cruelly as a result. The future of developed socialism that the Soviets profess to aim for is incompatible with the nature of modern technological systems. The Soviets like the idea of automation, for, as Richard Vidmer has written, it "rekindles the hope that the Soviet economy can, in fact, be managed from a single administrative center." There is no real hope for the Soviets, however, because the new computer revolution, which we see at work in our own country, is a system based on de-centralization. The party control system in the Soviet Union is incompatible with the enormous technological changes afforded by the computer revolution. Richard Vidmer adds that most Soviet management theorists "simply ignore questions that point to fundamental reform and, instead, concentrate on practical issues that have no bearing on the party's ascendancy in the Soviet establishment."

It is risky to say that constructive change is impossible in any country or any system. Nevertheless, one can't ignore the fact that modern decentralized management and enterprise, whether industrial or agricultrual, seems unlikely in the Soviet Union so long as it subscribes to its archaic ideology. Vast new productivity within the terms of the collectivization in place in the Soviet Union really seems out of the question. The socialist experiment in the USSR is a failure. As Leonhard has said, the opposition to modernization of the economic system is formidable, "for, if they were to go on, then something like 100,000 apparatchiks, all proud of their promotions and titles and colored ribbons and emblems, would suddenly become completely superfluous." No doubt there are what has been called "half-reformers" in the Soviet Union, but they aren't likely to get their way. Efficiency and functionalism run head on into party centralized control.

I suspect, therefore, that the post-Brezhnev leadership will be no more successful than Brezhnev in increasing productivity or solving the country's horrendous food problem. The Soviet Union is locked into its past—even though few believe in communism the way they did decades ago.

As a result, the Soviet Union seems likely to try more of the same—more regulation, more coercion, more total control—and with the same hurtful results.

For all that there is change in the world, countries, like individuals, find it difficult to escape their past. The gap separating Russia from the West is not a 20th century phenomenon. Pytor Chaadaev, writing in 1829, said of his country: "We are one of those nations which do not appear to be an integral part of the human race, but exist only in order to teach some great lesson to the world. Who knows when we shall rejoin the rest of mankind, and how much misery we must suffer before accomplishing our destiny?"

I suspect that the Soviet world won't rejoin the human race in the remaining years of this century. While it will remain very strongly militarily—the fruit of autocracy—and it will continue to cause much mischief around the globe, its people will continue to suffer and its standard of living will be substantially below that of other industrial and technologically oriented countries. This means we must not make the mistake of helping the Soviet regime overcome its technological and managerial handicaps.

The problems facing the Peoples Republic of China are of the same nature, only much, much worse. The Chinese experience, especially with respect to the Cultural Revolution of 1966-76, has been devastating beyond anything the Soviets have suffered in six decades of brutal and misdirected internal policies. The Cultural Revolution went very far to extinguish the very roots of Chinese life and tradition. The revolutionaries all but extinguished an ancient civilization. I commend to you an article by James Kenneson in the April issue of Harper's Magazine, a grim account of his year in the capital of Henan Province in North China. Mr. Kenneson is no conservative or cold warrior, as the liberals like to say, and he wanted to be sympathetic to the new Chinese world. But he was appalled by the realities, appalled even after living in poverty-stricken Egypt, a land much poorer than China in natural resources and arable land.

The system now in place in China ensures that the tremendous abilities and energy of the Chinese people, such as are manifested in Hong Kong and elsewhere in overseas Chinese communities, won't be harnessed on the mainland, no matter how much equipment is purchased abroad. As Mr. Kenneson notes, the work unit is the basic organizational building block of Chinese society today. Assignment to a work unit is for life. Getting a transfer is almost impossible, no matter what an individual wants to do or is equipped to do. The work unit makes the choices that Westerners make for themselves. In his essay, Mr. Kenneson describes the maze of bureaucracy at every level in China. Leaders of hospitals, factories, and bureaucratic divisions, he says, "are appointed on the basis of service to the party, not expertise." There is a vast hierarchy of officials, each afraid to take problems to a higher level for being criticized for not solving them themselves. With this unwieldy and grossly inefficient structure at every level of Chinese communist society, there seems little chance that China, unaided, will reach even the current Soviet level by the end of this century.

To be sure, this is not the picture of China to which we have been treated in the press since President Nixon's first visit to Peking. Indeed for some years after that visit, when the first American journalists were admitted, we read endless articles about the spotless communes and the spirit of cooperation. Will we never learn that in communist countries travelers are only allowed to visit Potemkin villages? Foreigners travel on conducted tours and visit only a few cities which are open to foreigners. Resident journalists and diplomats are required to reside in foreigners-only compounds. Only the occasional foreigner sees the real face of the static, backward China that is engulfed in 1984 type controls over every phase of normal activity. We should always be aware that vast areas of China are totally closed to foreign visitors, as is the case with the Soviet Union.

No one should underestimate the resourcefulness of the great Chinese people. In time, they may break out of the iron ring devised by Mao Tse-tung, his associates, and followers. I believe that the evidence strongly suggests that Communist China will be bogged down in domestic difficulties for more years than there are remaining in this century. I also believe that it won't be feasible for the Chinese to turn to the Soviet Union because the Soviets have no desire to rescue them from their difficulties and produce an even greater menace on their border. The United States, for its part—if it is concerned about possible threats in the 21st century, won't rush to help the Chinese modernize, as so many American businessmen have so foolishly desired to do. Happily, Peking has discovered that it can't begin to absorb or pay for the modern items that have been offered by the West.

It is ironical that Peking has threatened to downgrade relations with the United States if it doesn't halt arms shipments to the free Chinese on Taiwan. How much in the way of arms for Taiwan is in our national interest depends on very precise calculations. But we should not be taken in by Peking's arrogant posturing. Peking needs us, not the other way around.

We need to bear in mind the history of foreign intercourse with China. There are valuable lessons to be found in that history. Before the end of the last century, Dr. Arthur H. Smith wrote in his book "Chinese Characteristics" that foreign intercourse with China for the century preceding 1860 was "one long illustration of the Chinese talent for misunderstanding. The history of foreign diplomacy with China is largely a history of attempted explanations of matters which have been deliberately misunderstood." This is an observation we should bear in mind in connection with the Taiwan relationship affair.

The danger with China, in my view, is the possibility of a Japanese connection. To many observers that may seem a farfetched notion. Yet Japan offers the only real opportunity for China to modernize very rapidly. China, in turn, provides an opportunity for a tremendous market for Japanese goods.

Consider the realities of the Chinese economic situation. David M. Lampton, writing in Foreign Policy points out that the rate of increase in the gross value of industrial and agricultural output in China has been declining steadily: from 12.3 percent in 1978 to 8.5 percent in 1979 to 7.2 percent in 1980. If it wanted to do so, however, Japan could transform China.

Japan, in my view, is the great question mark in the history of the world at this time. Its course of action in the years ahead is uncertain.

Though devoid of material resources, Japan has arisen from the ashes of military defeat in World War II to become an enormous economic power. Its high quality goods have displaced a wide range of products which were the foundation of American prosperity, notably in the automobile industry. Japan aims high, seeking not only to widen its market share in the United States and Western Europe in both heavy and light manufacturing products but also in high technology where the United States has been the world leader. The United States has contributed to its own decline as against Japanese competition by subsidizing Japan's defense to the tune of scores of billions—protecting its sea lanes from the Middle East, for example, by allowing the Japanese to dump their goods in the U.S. market while permitting them to maintain non-tariff barriers to American goods on their home market. In short, the United States has been the victim of virtual economic warfare directed by Japan, albeit this warfare is accomplished with a smile, polite expressions, and bland talk about opening domestic markets, which simply isn't done. We are fools to let the Japanese get away with these economic offensives—the product of a unique, homogeneous and strongly guided and directed society. We have only to blame ourselves. Nevertheless, I am convinced that much of the current recession in the United States is "made in Japan."

One can't blame the Japanese for being aggressive in the economic sphere. And, certainly, this is preferable to the military aggression of the 1930s, which led Japan into China and which, ultimately, produced war in the Pacific. I suspect, however, that we don't pay enough attention to Japan's future. We speak of the Japanese as allies and partners. This alliance is a one-way street, however. The U.S. is committed to the defense of Japan; the Japanese have no such obligation to render aid to the United States, and don't do so except in the most passive way. As former Undersecretary of State U. Alexis Johnson has said, Japan has an insurance policy with unusually low premiums. For example, they don't pay a cent for the Rapid Deployment Force which was designed to protect the Indian Ocean Oil route, which is essential to keeping the lights burning in Japan. Again, we don't insist on Japanese contributions. We think of the Japanese as they were in 1950, not as they are today.

I am not at all persuaded that Japan will remain in a passive role in the future, especially if the power of the United States diminishes in the 1980s and 1990s. Power abhors a vacuum, and Japan has enormous latent power. It can be argued that, in the long run, Japan will want to do more in the world than sell Toyotas and Mazdas, and that this ambition may be a central fact in the world situation by the end of this century, if not sooner. The Japanese, certainly, must be giving much thought to the future of their relationship with China and how to control that relationship to their own end—a very understandable and proper objective if one is Japanese. China, in a sense, is as much a hinterland for Japan as Africa was for Europe in years past. Japan's already heavy investments in Australia's raw material development also will make that country a continuing object of Japanese interest and ambition, as it was 40 years ago. Whither Australia?—is a good question.

Time does not permit extensive consideration of the place of Africa in the global constellation at the end of the century. Again, I suspect that it will remain a largely passive region, with growing rather than diminishing economic difficulties. The record of the new African countries since the early 1950s is not one as to suggest that the nations of the continent will be able to produce the food, let alone the goods and services, that are needed for a comfortable, progressive future. In short, I believe that Africa will remain a largely dependent and troubled region, in which the outside world is interested because of its mineral resources.

The future of the nations of Europe is of vital concern to us because of our ancestral ties to that region. Half of Christendom is under thrall in the Soviet Empire in Eastern Europe. And real danger exists that the Iron Curtain may be extended to the Atlantic. Ironically, the flame of independence, of national courage, seems much brighter in Poland than it is in Germany, the heart of the NATO alliance. The politics of fear in the 1980s could lead to a gradual transformation of Western Europe into a version of Eastern Europe. the deteriorating world economy, which has many roots—chiefly the hemorrhage of Western funds to the Middle East oil producers since 1974—may accelerate this process. While Eastern Europe, at least Poland, awakes to the hope of regaining lost freedom, much of the Western alliance reflects a willingness to accept the role of passive subjects of the Soviets. "Better red than dead" to use the familiar capsule expression. At least, many West Europeans are reluctant to stand up to the Soviet empire that seeks to extingish freedom. Obviously, the Soviets would like to attach the productive capacity of Western Europe to their empire. The Finlandization of Western Europe, sought by the socialist internationale, would give the USSR a valuable extension of its frontiers. The gas pipeline linking Siberia and Western Europe has tremendous significance, for it is an important step in advancing the energy dependence of France, Germany and Italy on the Soviet Union. Whether this dependence will come to pass one cannot predict at this time. Western Europe doesn't lack for wealth or technological capability. Its real lack is will. A failure of will is the great Western danger in the late 20th century, and this failure is most acute in Western Europe. We can only hope that West Europeans will be strengthened inwardly in the years ahead. In short, Western Europe's crisis is a moral or spiritual crisis, a derivative of shocks received in World Wars I and II and the nihilistic aftermath.

The Soviets, for all that their ideology has broken down and isn't intellectually convincing even to their own people, are likely to retain the capacity to disinform Westerners so that they fail to grasp the real survival issues. The parallel political structures of the Left, such as the Institute For Policy Studies in the United States, are likely to continue to do better work for the Soviets than any formal communist organizations could do. These parallel structures will assist Moscow by promoting the military, economic and moral disarmament of the West, by promoting whatever is weakening, by inculcating guilt in the West, and by endeavoring to weaken the will of the nations.

I am reminded of the statement by Dr. Brzezinski (in Encounter) that "That real Soviet preference is for men who lie down and accept every Soviet action. An ideal American foreign policy from the Soviet view, would be one in which we recognized Vietnamese predominance in Southeast Asia, rushed headlong into an embrace of Angola while abandoning Unita, lifted the embargo against Castro, and acquiesced in Soviet expansionism in the Indian Ocean—a foreign policy which some people (you may recognize them) have favored over the last few years."

Now I come to the United States. What the world will be like at the end of this century depends very much on what we will be like as a nation at that time. Critics of a stronger U.S. foreign policy—the Tom Wickers and Anthony Lewises of the media establishment—keep telling us that we cannot shape the world. True, we cannot control all the varied events of history or the destiny of nations. But ours is still an enormous influence by virtue of our size, wealth, technological power, precept and example. We have the most advanced and complex society in our modern world, the greatest potential for good and for wise action. Undoubtedly, much of the world will continue to look to us for leadership throughout this century. We can shape world events to some considerable degree, albeit not completely. We may not want to do this. Certainly, we are not the new Romans, as Vietnam demonstrated conclusively. But even if we do nothing, especially if we do nothing, we will have a powerful impact on life on this planet—one way or the other.

I begin any consideration of the future of our country in the remaining years of this century with an immense confidence in its potential. I begin with confidence in the capacity of the American people. For all our problems in this country, including crime, moral disorder, deficient education of the right type, and vulnerability to hurtful notions of various kinds, we have a population which, with its varied strains, has deep roots in the civilization and faith of the West. Our people have a tremendous love of country and its institutions, as evidenced in the great emotional outpouring at the time of the return of the hostages from Iran. Our people also will support bold measures for freedom, providing they understand what is at stake and have sound, articulate leadership. We have a level of skill and knowledge in this country which should assure us technological leadership into the 21st century—again, if our people understand what's at stake. One of our greatest national strengths is our ability to produce food in abundance, not only for our own people but for many peoples. This is a resource or capability that our adversaries do not possess and will not possess in this century.

We all have reason to be profoundly concerned, however, about our weaknesses in several areas, weaknesses brought on by our own folly. I have already spoken about our failure to protect our national economic interests against the Japanese. We must do something about that if we are not to become hewers of wood and drawers of water for Japan—a resource base for a more ambitious and better organized country.

At the same time, we must address the problem of declining productivity. We must work much harder and compensation must be on the basis of competition. One reason our auto industry is in trouble is that pay in American auto plants is twice that in Japanese plants. This is the situation in other industries as well. We pay ourselves too well. We have many absurd situations. Some senior executives receive too much compensation from companies that aren't performing well. At the same time, many plant employees also receive too much for the work they do. I know of a major industrial plant where the people who sweep the metal fragments off the floor receive $21,000 a year. In that same plant and numerous other plants, robots, automated machines, are bitterly resisted. Ironically, American companies developed robots, but the Japanese are installing them in the greatest number. We cannot afford make-work or no-work for high pay. Yet, in plant after plant, there are cases where people receive eight hours pay for 2 or 3 hours actual work. If these things aren't changed, our industrial civilization will decline as Britain's has declined, with appalling consequences for the living standards of our people and our nation's strength. Japan will become the No. 1 industrial power in the world, a cruel irony as Japan has less than half our population and none of our natural resources. Industrial revitalization is, therefore, essential for our renewal.

The emphasis in our country for many years has been on the political redistribution of wealth. In my judgment, however, the future well-being of the American people, their national security and prosperity, depends on new wealth creation. It has been alleged that the United States and its Western friends and allies are materialist democracies, and there is a measure of truth in that. Wealth can be misused; it can become an end in itself. I don't believe, however, that that is the record of the American republic. We have combined a development of our natural wealth with a concern for idealistic factors in life. It is fashionable in some quarters to dismiss wealth creation, but the lack of it produces suffering and denial of opportunities for the development of talents. Americans are the children or grandchildren or great-grandchildren of people who had generations of bitter experience with poverty, and our people don't want to go back to that condition.

Unfortunately, the world in the past 20 years has allowed expectations to exceed wealth creation. And the current global recession is evidence of a difficult but unavoidable retrenchment. Beginning in the 1960s, many people around the world, certainly in our own country, thought that they had an automatic right to a very comfortable life. They took out of society more than they put in. They imagined that government had simply to transfer wealth, for everyone to live on a very high standard. Government-decreed benefits were increased, but investment in productive facilities decreased. Now we are adjusting to reality, returning to a somewhat lower standard of living—a lower standard of expectations—and it is a rough experience—for individuals, families, institutions such as universities, and for the nation. We will have to start anew on a new and less elevated base. This is our central task in the years ahead. Without internal renewals, economic as well as in other ways, we will not be positioned by the end of the century to constrain the ambitions of the Soviet Union and other countries which are eager for us to have a diminished role in the world, countries which want our civilization and its values to recede and give way to other systems and other values.

We need to get through the period ahead and into the 21st century, with our liberties intact and the material base of our civilization strong enough to survive a variety of assaults, military, economic, and ideological. We want peace with freedom and preservation of our independence and security. To be sure, we won't be able to wrap up our problems by the end of the century; our aim is simply to deal with them effectively. Short of Armageddon, history doesn't come to a halt. History is an on-going process, with winners and losers, with values in flux and always under challenge. Every nation, every system of government, has its own dynamic. I have touched on a few, a very few, of the elements of national dynamics in the free world and the unfree world. We need to be very aware of the dynamics in the systems and countries that oppose our country and system. This awareness should help protect our values, our heritage, and our independence. If we aren't aware, if we aren't alert, if we fail to use our human and material resources intelligently, we will die as a country and a civilization. Looking ahead, beyond the headlines of the day, is imperative, therefore. Without vision we will perish, certainly in the turbulent 20th century where the clash of ideas, systems and countries is so furious.●

A RAY OF HOPE FOR THE DISABLED

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the social security disability program has come under intense scrutiny recently and for good reason. Since the administration decided to accelereate the number of disability reviews some 18 months ago, the level of desperation and despair experienced by individuals who have had their disability benefits erroneously terminated has increased dramatically and in some cases reached intolerable limits.

In June, I introduced legislation which was aimed at redressing the gross inequities which have arisen through the administration of continuing disability investigations. A number of my colleagues have also introduced legislation dealing with this problem, and while the proposals differed somewhat in their approach to the problem the fact that the problem does exist remains.

I do not rise today to argue the merits of the various proposals. I do rise, however, to bring the seriousness of the problem to the attention of my colleagues and to ask that some form of relief be enacted before the situation deteriorates further.

A major provision of my bill (S. 2659) would allow for much needed human interaction early in the appeal process. By introducing this human touch into the appeals process at an earlier date it is hoped that blatantly erroneous terminations will be avoided. I have recently learned that the administration has made a procedural adjustment to allow for a face-to-face interview in the initial phase of the review process beginning October 1. While I am pleased to see the administration finally taking some action on this matter, I sincerely hope that efforts to correct other inequities in the administration of these reviews continue.

While it is certainly a move in the right direction, it by no means should be considered a cure-all for the ills confronting the disability review system. The severe trauma experienced by individuals erroneously terminated from the disability rolls makes it imperative that we move in an expeditious manner to effectuate needed changes in the review system. Indeed, the administration's acknowledgement of the problem is an important development, it does provide a ray of hope for over 4.6 million disabled beneficiaries across the Nation. However, it is our responsibility to illuminate this ray of light so that hope for fairness and equity in our social security disability system prevails. I ask my colleagues to join me in this request.

At this time I submit for the RECORD a copy of my written testimony before the Finance Committee hearings on disability on August 18 as well as a copy of an article in the September 1982 edition of Sergeants magazine dealing with this problem.

The material follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JIM SASSER BEFORE THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE HEARING ON SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY REFORM

Mr. Chairman, I would first of all like to thank you and Members of the Senate Finance Committee for allowing me to present this written testimony today.

As you sit here today, the social security disability program is itself severely disabled and in need of major repair. Both the variety and number of legislative approaches which have been offered to deal with the problem attest to its seriousness and the urgency with which it must be dealt. It is my sincere hope that Members of this committee will act quickly to remedy the current injustices in the disability program.

I became acutely aware of this problem in January of this year. In addition to letters from constituents recounting numerous incidents of erroneous terminations from the disability rolls, I received allegations of the existence of a quota system that was being used to systematically reduce the disability rolls. In March I brought this problem to the attention of the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, Mr. Schweiker. In April I instructed the General Accounting Office to conduct an investigation of the Memphis Social Security Administration District office to determine whether quotas were being used to terminate the benefits of Disability Insurance recipients.

The final GAO report was released in June and proved inconclusive with respect to these allegations. However, it did reveal criticisms of the disability determination system which paralleled those heard in other states. The report concluded that the problems in Tennessee are not unlike those found in Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, and California, suggesting that deficiencies in the Continuing Disability Investigations (CDI's) process are widespread and not the result of isolated instances or unique to any geographical region of the country.

The criticisms included: complaints directed at the quality of consultative examinations being performed at the request of the State disability determination system; complaints that the consultative examinations were too short, were not comprehensive, and did not adequately cover the claimants' impairments, and complaints that some consultative physicians are rude, prejudiced, and unprofessional. The employees also believed the Tennessee disability determination system (DDS) is experiencing organizational and workload problems because of the current continuing disability investigation (CDI) program. They also revealed there was a high case backlog and some pressure to reduce it.

It is little wonder that the social security disability program is currently experiencing such a deluge of complaints which has prompted the close scrutiny of several Members of Congress.

In 1980, the Congress adopted the Disability Amendments in response to the dramatic growth of the program during the early and mid 70's. A major provision of these amendments required the Social Security Administration, beginning in January 1982, to review the cases of disabled workers on the disability rolls at least once every three years, except where the disability was considered to be permanent.

However, in March 1981, the Reagan Administration, in an attempt to realize savings, decided to accelerate these reviews some nine months ahead of the January 1982 implementation date. This was done despite the lack of appropriate resources with which to handle the large increases in State agency caseloads. To a great extent this has contributed to the inequitable treatment and erroneous termination of a substantial percentage of the disabled population.

In Tennessee alone, the disability determination system in Nashville is scheduled to review approximately 11,179 cases. Next year this caseload will increase to 19,747, and in 1984 there are 30,896 cases scheduled for review.

Now, the original purpose of the 1980 disability amendments was to weed out those individuals who were no longer eligible for disability benefits. I strongly support any and all efforts to rid Government programs of waste, fraud, and abuse. In many cases there may be sufficient justification and cause for removing individuals from the disability rolls. If they do not belong on the rolls, then they should be removed.

However, it is apparent that the rights of disability beneficiaries are being callously disregarded and abused through the hasty and inefficient administration of unfair and unjust policies. In far too many cases, what we are seeing is that truly deserving beneficiaries are being systematically knocked off the rolls in an effort to reduce costs. Substantial evidence indicates that gross inequities are occurring not only in Tennessee, but across the Nation. Many beneficiaries are being indiscriminately terminated without so much as the benefit of a medical examination.

The legislation I have introduced would provide for a face-to-face evidentiary hearing at the reconsideration level of appeal in the hope that personal contact will reduce the high percentage of erroneous terminations at this level. Under my bill the disabled beneficiary would continue to receive benefits until this time and should be necessary to carry the appeal to the Administrative Law Judge level, the individual would continue to be eligible for medicare benefits.

The importance of protecting disability beneficiaries from erroneous terminations cannot be understated. Examples where desperation and despair follow termination of these benefits are plentiful. A recent article in the Memphis Commercial Appeal detailed several cases where adverse impacts upon disability recipients were felt. In one case, an East Tennessee lawyer told of one of his clients—a man who suffered from paranoid schizophrenia—who committed suicide because his benefits were terminated. The lawyer said the man left a note saying that was the reason he took his life.

Another woman, 51 years of age, suffers from multiple sclerosis, lupus, two ulcers, cystitis, a tumor, and a deteriorating spine, yet her benefits were terminated last October.

Two weeks ago I received a letter from an Attorney's office in Oak Ridge, Tennessee. In the letter the attorney, Ms. Dorothy Stulberg, outlined ten specific cases in which disability benefits were terminated. These cases are merely illustrative of what is happening across the country. Ms. Stulberg writes that "there is almost no way to express in words the hardship and the pain needlessly caused by the actions of the Social Security Administration" with respect to disability terminations.

Case No. 1—Male, 48 years of age, this man is on nine kinds of medicine. He has had two heart attacks while on social security disability. He has urinary problems, bleeding bowel, stomach problems, headaches, ankles swell, bad nerves, chest pains, and back pains. He became so desperate because of no income that he tried to work and broke his arm.

Case No. 2—Female, 34 years of age, this woman suffers from arthritis, headaches, seizures, psychological problems, frequent kidney infections, constant pain from a serious automobile accident. This lady is so upset about being terminated that she has overdosed. All doctors statements indicate that she is unable to work. She has absolutely no funds.

Case No. 3—Female, age 57, this woman worked for thirty years and was forced to take a medical discharge because of her physical condition. She voluntarily tried to return to work but was unable to do so. She also suffers from lupus, one leg is shorter than the other, must use a walker for support, has stiff fingers, suffers from hallucinations, sleep paralysis, on many medications and has organic brain disease. After contributing to social security for thirty years and being unable to work, she is now being denied social security disability benefits.

Case No. 4—Male, age 46, this man looks 65. He was terminated from disability and for one solid year he and his family had no income at all. Benefits were resumed in March 1982 without even a hearing. The medicals were so extreme that the Administrative Law Judge determined that it was necessary to have a hearing. It was so obvious that this man had psychological and physical problems. During the entire year he was not able to get the medication that was necessary to treat his illnesses. Our office borrowed and begged money from local churches in order that his family could survive.

Case No. 5—Male, 44 years old, this man suffers from bronchial emphysema, a bad back, and eye trouble. He has been without any funds at all for about seven months. He needs medication in order to ease his breathing problems. He has no funds to purchase medication. He has called our office begging for us to help him find some money so he can at least breathe. He has children. He has gone to the local health department and they have told him that they have money only for his high blood pressure which was extremely high. He weighs only 138 pounds and is 6 feet 3 inches tall.

Mr. Chairman, I could go on and on with examples of needless hardship. I think that these five examples, however, more than make the point. The issue is crystal clear and we must implement corrective legislation quickly to stem these gross injustices which are occurring every day.

On June 22, I introduced S. 2659 to address these inequities. The major provisions of my bill are as follows:

The bill provides for an adjustment period not to exceed six months wherein disability benefits will be continued until the reconsideration hearing.

The bill provides that a face-to-face evidentiary hearing be conducted at the reconsideration hearing.

The bill allows for the extension of medicare eligibility until such time as a decision is reached by an Administrative Law Judge.

The bill requires the Secretary of Health and Human Services to report to the Congress on a quarterly basis information which will better facilitate an accurate evaluation of the actual continuing disability investigations process.

The difference between this bill and other proposals primarily lies in the length of time where payment of benefits are paid. The legislation I have offered provides that benefits be paid until the reconsideration hearing as opposed to paying the benefits until the Administrative Law Judge hearing.

I believe that this approach is preferable from the standpoint of cost-effectiveness. According to the Congressional Budget Office, payment of benefits through the Administrative Law Judge level will cost approximately $120 million in 1983, $80 million in 1984, and $85 million in 1985. These figures include repayment of overpayments. In comparison, payment of benefits through reconsideration including a face-to-face hearing at the reconsideration level will cost $40 million in 1983, $45 million in 1984, and $30 million in 1985. Thus my bill would save approximately $170 million over the next three years. Furthermore, according to Social Security Administration actuaries, only about 50 percent of these overpayments are recoverable.

In order to compensate for those individuals who are erroneously terminated, my bill provides for the extension of medicare eligibility until the ALJ hearing. In most cases, eligibility for medicare is just as if not more important than the disability benefits themselves. According to the Congressional Budget Office, this provision would cost approximately $45 million in 1983, $50 million in 1984, and $55 million in 1985. This provision is important because it is extremely difficult for individuals who have been on the disability rolls to procure hospitalization insurance once they have been terminated from the disability rolls. Insurance carriers are reluctant to carry these individuals and even if they do the insurance premiums are very high.

As I have already mentioned, providing for a face-to-face hearing at the reconsideration hearing will hopefully reduce the inexcusably high percentage of erroneous terminations at this level. The individual facing termination of disability benefits should be afforded an opportunity to face those deciding the appeal as well as produce evidence which might have a bearing on the outcome of the appeal at the earliest possible time.

Finally, it is currently very difficult to accurately gage the exact depth and scope of the problem simply because no individual or agency is charged with collecting data relevant to the number of continuing disability reviews, the number of initial benefit termination decisions resulting from these reviews, the number of such termination decisions with respect to which reconsideration is requested or a hearing is requested or both, and the number of such termination decisions which are overturned at the reconsideration or hearing level.

Under my bill, the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services would be responsible for reporting this specific information to Congress on a quarterly basis. These reports will enable both Congress and the Secretary to better measure the disability review process and make changes as they are necessary.

It is my sincere hope that this committee will carefully consider the legislation I have offered here today and will move quickly to adopt what is intended to be a temporary solution to a most crucial problem. While a comprehensive disability package is needed, I do not believe such a comprehensive package could be adopted before the end of this year. It is therefore incumbent upon us to address this problem in an effective and expeditious manner.

Once again, I would like to express my thanks and appreciation to the Chairman and the Members of this committee for allowing me to offer this testimony today.

Pay Picture for 1983

Unless unforeseen circumstances should change the pay picture for fiscal year 1983, which begins on Oct. 1, 1982, the cost-of-living pay adjustments for the active duty and the military retirees will be as follows:

For the active duty, a 4 percent pay increase effective Oct. 1, 1982. Targeting the raise to career personnel may also be applied again this year.

For the military and civil service retirees, a 4 percent pay adjustment, to be effective March 1, 1983, regardless of what the consumer price index may be. The increase will show up in the April 1, 1983 paycheck.

While these adjustments are far from what tney should be for the active duty as well as the retiree, it essentially places a cap on such adjustments. It took considerable lobbying to even obtain the 4 percent adjustments.

If the Senate proposal had prevailed in the conference committee between the House and Senate, all retired pay and even the active duty pay would have been frozen at the 1982 level.

SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY PAYMENTS

A program, conducted by the Social Security Administration, to review all those people with nonpermanent disabilities, is financially penalizing many of our disabled members.

The review program, directed by Congress in 1980, instructed the SSA to start the review process in February 1982. However, without taking time to develop sound procedures, or to hire and train qualified people to conduct the reviews competently, SSA began the review process in March 1981.

Unfortunately, many of those being targeted for reviews are the mentally ill, the severely handicapped and the very young who have not understood the communication received from the Social Security representative. The notice simply says their files are being reviewed to determine if they should be continued on disability rolls. Many of those who were placed on disability based on information already in their files did not realize this was a change, so they paid little heed to the notice.

What they did not realize is that the SSA redefined, or made the definition of disability more stringent under its regulations. Individuals have to requalify under the new rules, and old medical evidence is not being considered.

This is unfair because the contract doctor for the SSA ignores statements from two, or even three, doctors who have treated the individual for several years. If the contract doctor sees the individual at all, and in some cases he doesn't, a cursory examination is made, and the disability pay stopped based on the revised regulations. This comes as a severe shock to those disabled and has created a nightmare for many.

There are appeal procedures which, unfortunately like all such appeals, take considerable time. During this time disability payments are stopped.

AFSA is appalled at such a heartless program being conducted by the SSA. It is not enough that the individuals must cope daily with their disability, but to suddenly lose their disability payments only increases their anguish.

AFSA asks the oversight committee of Congress to place the burden of proof on the SSA. A complete review of an individual's medical history should be done before determining that the individual's condition has improved or that a disability no longer exists. Furthermore, there should be no cut-off of disability payments during the review process.

It is interesting to note that over 60 percent of the cases that have been appealed have resulted in restoring disability pay. That should say something about the poor administration of this congressionally directed review program.

VA HEALTH CARE

To meet the stiff competition with the private sector for nurses, Congress has passed legislation to improve the Veterans Administration health care system. They authorized the VA to pay their nurses a full week's salary for 24 hours of work on weekends. Even though the administration opposed the legislation, there was overwhelming support for the measure in Congress.●

AMNESTY LURES ALIENS

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, the Dallas Morning News, on August 29, 1982, carried a story headlined, "Amnesty plan luring aliens, U.S. agents say." I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The story follows:

[From the Dallas Morning News, Aug. 29, 1982]

AMNESTY PLAN LURING ALIENS, U.S. AGENTS SAY

(By John Gonzalez)

EL PASO.—U.S. Border Patrol officials say the allure of potential amnesty is partly to blame for the latest influx of illegal aliens.

The officials challenge the assumption that the U.S. harvest season and the recent peso devaluation are mostly responsible for the record numbers of Mexicans who crossed the swift, muddy Rio Grande last week in search of work.

The patrol officials said that after a slow first half of 1982, traffic along the Texas and New Mexico portions of the border picked up in early July, a month before the Mexican currency was devalued for the second time this year.

While no one questions that the Mexican economic crisis is the underlying cause of the alien traffic, several border agents said the Senate-approved immigration law, awaiting House action that will begin in mid-September, is exacerbating the situation.

"We've got to remember that not only was there a peso devaluation, but there was also that immigration bill passed by the Senate, which received widespread publicity in Mexico," Laredo sector chief William Selser said.

"A lot of the aliens being encountered now are induced to come here by the thought that if they can get into the U.S. now, they won't have to leave," he said.

McAllen sector chief Larry Richardson agreed.

"I don't like the alarmist thing where this increase is blamed on the peso alone," he said. "We started our increase a couple of weeks in front of the devaluation (Aug. 5.) The immigration bill may be involved, too."

His brother, Del Rio sector chief Jack Richardson, said informants report counterfeiters are prepared to produce documents that illegal aliens could try to use to prove residency prior to Jan. 1, 1980.

The immigration bill, which would make the first changes in the law in 17 years, includes an amnesty provision that would allow aliens who have lived in the United States since before Jan. 1, 1980, to stay.

Rent receipts and U.S. W-2 forms would be considered proof of residency, and border patrol intelligence officers have been told the receipts and W-2s are among items that will be counterfeited.

"I don't have a built-in dislike for amnesty," Jack Richardson said. "I do have some concern about rewarding persons who have violated the law at the expense of those who have waited to try to lawfully immigrate."

"There are indications that vendors on both sides of the border are gearing up to supply counterfeit documents, but we haven't intercepted any yet."

El Paso sector chief Alan Eliason was more cautious.

"I am hearing speculation that the amnesty proposal is going tyo bring people in and that through acquisition of various documents, they would be able to sustain a claim that they've already been here two years. It could be, but I'm really not seeing it yet," he said.

Eliason said he has noticed an increase in aliens from big cities in southern Mexico where unemployment and inflation rates are staggering.

While border agents wait for the House to take action on the immigration law, they will rely more than ever on high-technology tools for detecting aliens as they illegally enter the United States.

Alien traffic is heaviest in El Paso, where 1-day apprehension records were set twice last week. Eliason said the record of 989 apprehensions in El Paso and southern New Mexico, set Tuesday, was eclipsed the following day, when 1,205 illegal aliens were caught. Most of them were found in downtown El Paso. The pace slowed as the weekend approached—down to 847 arrests Thursday.

At Laredo, the next-busiest area for crossing the river, the border agents were catching less than 150 aliens a day, but Selser said the rate is higher rate than a year ago.

Selser and other patrolmen said that the U.S. harvest season accounts partially for increasing influx of aliens. But the aliens often enter without realizing that there are few farm jobs available this season in the storm-damaged High Plains, they said. The job market for farm workers is considered saturated in several regions of the U.S.—from the pecan groves of southern New Mexico to the sugarbeet fields of Michigan. Mexicans questioned about their attempts to cross illegally into the United States invariably cite the need for work as their motivation for crossing.

The Rio Grande this time of year poses a danger to aliens attempting to cross, and drownings are a frequent occurence in El Paso where the river has been channeled into a flat but slippery concrete trough. At Del Rio, the river widens and forms a natural barrier. Horses, inner tubes or small boats are necessary to make the crossing. Further downstream at McAllen, aliens prefer to use inner tubes or bridges to ford the swift river.

Those whom elude detection at the riverbanks often are picked up by sensors, upon which the patrol relies heavily. Aliens who evade the sensors face detection at the many road checkpoints coordinated by border agents. Illegal aliens who clear those checks then need to worry about inland patrols by agents, who visited worksites from Odessa, to Oklahoma last week.●

U.S. GOVERNMENT STATEMENT AT OECD STEEL COMMITTEE

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, our Government recently delivered an excellent analysis of the world steel situation at the OECD Steel Committee meeting on July 21.

This statement is not only a defense and explanation of Commerce Department actions, it is a thorough refutation of the various self-serving arguments raised by the European Community in an effort to avoid the assumption of their legal responsibilities. It makes clear that our law is not only fair and deliberate, it is GATT-consistent, tests which the EC itself has not always met. It also points out the irony of EC complaints that the quantity of their shipments to the United States is too low to be injurious in view of the Community's more drastic action in the face of proportionally less import penetration.

Mr. President, it is plain that when it comes to sell, the EC does not want to accept its obligations under the GATT and instead seeks to place the entire burden of adjustment on the American industry. This statement makes that clear and therefore is worthy of close attention by Senators. I ask that it appear at this point in the RECORD.

The statement referred to follows:

STATEMENT OF UNITED STATES AT OECD STEEL COMMITTEE—JULY 21, 1982

As you know, the Commerce Department made an historic decision last month. It found, to the surprise of few, that some European Community steel producers appear to be heavily subsidized, that others seem to be less heavily subsidized, and that some apparently receive no significant subsidies. We have spent much time, effort, and money to document with precision what we have known in general terms for a long time. The process itself is important, however. We did not presume the existence of subsidies; we did not accept uncritically the allegations of the U.S. industry to the individual steel makers under investigation; we did not rush to judgment. Instead, we conducted an exhaustive—and exhausting—and eminently transparent investigation. That search for the facts will continue right up to the time of the final determination, due August 24. Yet we published the preliminary results, in voluminous detail, for the entire world to examine critically. We spelled out the reasons why certain programs appear to be countervailable subsidies and why others do not. We have quite obviously managed to please no one entirely, which is perhaps the surest sign of our fairness.

Lest we forget—these are not the only cases under investigation. In addition to the complaints filed January 11 against seven members of the European Community, another 50 or so antidumping and countervailing duty investigations of steel imports into the U.S. are underway involving Spain, Japan, Canada, Korea, Argentina, Romania, Brazil, and South Africa. While these cases are still under investigation, it would be inappropriate to comment on specific issues involved in individual cases.

Nevertheless, we must respond to several charges that have been made against our conduct of these cases in order to clarify the objectives of United States policy and our support, which has been clear and consistent since the establishment of this committee, for effective adjustment to changing competitive conditions in the world steel industry.

First, we are accused of having unilaterally interpreted the GATT subsidies code. Part 1 of the code, which many of us have implemented through a national countervailing duty law, does not contain very explicit guidance on how to define and calculate subsidies. Therefore, when confronting novel situations, we, like any signatory of the code, will of course have to make choices on methodology which some consider a "unilateral" interpretation of the code. Our procedures are designed to ensure that these decisions are made on the basis of the best information available and on a careful analysis of what the code requires. We have—and we will up to the moment of the final determination—encourage all parties to express their views on all issues. Thereafter, we are subject to review by United States courts and in the GATT. We do not shrink from this scrutiny; we welcome it. For our aim is to build up a set of international rules that will provide a framework for free and undistorted international trade flows in steel—and all products. Like a muscle, this system can be strengthened only by regular use. If we are afraid to exercise the system, it will atrophy.

A second argument we have encountered is that restructuring subsidies are not prohibited by the subsidies code. That is absolutely correct—except where they cause material injury or otherwise prejudice the rights of a code signatory. The code does not prohibit domestic subsidies, but recognizes that they have legitimate policy uses. However, each code signatory is under the obligation to seek to avoid causing injury through the use of domestic subsidies. He is also obliged to weigh the world market context of his decision, including overcapacity and depressed prices, two factors that are quite familiar to us in this committee. In other words, a code signatory agrees not to shift the burden of adjustment, through the use of domestic subsidies, on to other producers. Before any subsidy can be authorized, its impact on others must be weighed. In a world of excess capacity, domestic subsidies that have the effect of maintaining inefficient production facilities are not only economic folly, but can be contrary to the GATT as well.

Another argument we sometimes hear is that European imports are too insignificant to be causing injury since they account for "only" 6.2 percent of the U.S. market. It is true that the EC's 6.4 million net tons of shipments to our market accounted for 6.2 percent of our apparent supply last year. As we have already noted in this committee, that was the highest market share for the EC since 1978. Moreover, thus far in 1982 (through May), EC shipments account for 7.0 percent of apparent supply, a 12 percent jump over 1981.

Then, too, we must all recognize that this sort of number is not terribly relevant to the question of injury to producers of any particular product. That is a judgment that can only be made after a careful assessment of the impact of the volume and price of imports on the sales, profits, and employment of individual industries.

We do not have detailed, product-by-product injury information with us. On the basis of its preliminary investigation, the United States International Trade Commission (ITC) published two volumes of data on a product-by-product basis. However, the committee should not forget that: (a) about one-third of the U.S. steel work force is on layoff and another 6 percent is working short weeks; (b) U.S. capacity utilization during the first 5 months of 1982 was 57.4 percent and in recent weeks has fallen close to 40 percent; (c) order books are empty, indicating no significant increase in demand is imminent; and (d) imports have been at record or near-record levels for months, creating a sizable inventory overhang that further depresses prices and will further delay the recovery, but for a moment, assume the 6.2 to 7.0 percent figure were relevant. How would we apply it to the situation of the community itself? What foreign supplier can claim anything like 6 or 7 percent of EC consumption? In fact, all suppliers taken together last year accounted for only 7.0 percent of the EC market. Yet the import threat was perceived to be so severe that the community felt compelled to maintain and to extend for another year a system of price and quantity restraints on imports. At the same time, we seem to be hearing the argument that import penetration in the U.S., which has been 2-3 times as high as in the community, is not sufficient reason for our producers to exercise their rights under U.S. law and the GATT to nullify the injurious effects of dumping and subsidization. That is curious logic, indeed.

A related charge is that our actions threaten to disrupt "traditional patterns of trade." This an old controversy and we are surprised by its staying power. We never agreed in this committee or anywhere else that traditional patterns of trade should be maintained. Let us review the history of our agreements since 1977:

At the third meeting of the ad hoc group, we concluded that: "No nation can be expected to absorb for sustained periods large quantities of imports at unjustifiably low prices"—that is, dumped or subsidized—"to the detriment of domestic production and employment"—that is, injury—"But any measure designed to deal with such imports"—read the trigger price mechanism—"Should take into account customary patterns of trade."

In view of the controversy that arose, we agreed to a clearer statement in the mandate of this committee to "take into account the concerns of trading partners that traditional trade flows established under normal conditions of competition"—that is, without dumping or subsidization—"Not be severely disrupted"—hardly the same as "maintained."

Let me repeat part of our statement at the last meeting. Not only did we not agree to maintain traditional trade flows, but we could not have done so within the legal framework of our fair trade laws. Nor would we want to do so. The constant purpose of our policy has been to neutralize the injurious effects of dumping and subsidization, which distort normal conditions of competition, not to arrange the shares of our market at any level, "traditional" or "nontraditional." Ours is a rapidly changing market; how are we supposed, and why would we wish to try, to maintain imports from individual foreign suppliers at any "traditional" level?

While we made no such commitment to maintain traditional levels of imports, it is worth noting that U.S. imports in every year since 1977 have been above 1976, a total of 93 million tons, while EC imports since 1977 have been consistently below 1976, and amount to less than half of U.S. total.

We also must reject the claim that these cases will shift the burden of adjustment to EC producers. This is not a variation of the theme of beggar thy neighbor. We all share the responsibility for promoting prompt, adequate, regular adjustment within our own borders.

Not to do so is to shift the burden of adjustment on to others, and that is something we have all pledged to avoid. Indeed, it is hard to imagine any happy end to our steel crisis that does not rest on continuous, effective adjustment not just in one or two OECD countries, but throughout the entire OECD area.

This brings me to a final argument—that the U.S. industry is failing to modernize and that the U.S. Government has no industry policy for steel. Well, the industry has been modernizing for almost two decades:

Production capacity has been reduced by about 6 million metric tons since 1977. In fact, since there has been some new effective capacity installed, the reduction in obsolescent capacity has been even greater.

Employment peaked in 1965 and has been steadily trending downward as labor saving investments are made.

The industry in 1980-1981 elaborated on an ambitious set of modernization plans. But to implement them will cost money, lots of it, and it all must be generated through private funds.

The U.S. industry also pays for its mistakes. A failure to keep competitive, to improve quality and service, to control costs—any of these can be devastating to a free market producer.

Those who cannot generate such funds will have to retrench, eliminating marginal facilities, including entire plants. These decisions have been made literally hundreds of times in the 1970s. They will continue to be made, without fanfare, in most cases. This is a constant, and hardly painless, but very real adjustment process.

That brings us to our supposed lack of an industry policy. We do have one. It is simpler than the policies some of you have adopted. It requires no major public expenditure, no planning, and no direction by government. The key decisions are left to those closest to the market—the firms themselves. But our policy, which relies on the free play of market forces to ensure that structural change and adaptation take place regularly, is a true industry policy. And it is just as legitimate an industry policy as the more interventionist approaches others have adopted.

Now part and parcel of that policy is a reliance on GATT rules of fair international trade. If we are going to force our producers to face foreign competition without government financial assistance and to succeed or fail on their own resources, we owe it to them to ensure that imports compete for our market on an equal footing. Our aim is to eliminate, in so far as we are able to, distortive effects of government interference in the market. If we concerned ourselves only with the effects of U.S. Government policies on our market, we would be naive indeed. Such a course could undermine the objectives of economic efficiency that we seek and in effect would let others who are more interventionist dictate industry policy to us, merely because we seek to keep our markets open to the beneficial effects of international competition.

Compliance with antidumping and subsidy countervail laws are the price of admission to an open market. We did not invent this idea. It is the concept of equity which underlies the GATT itself. We will not prescribe adjustment measures for anyone else, but by the same token we cannot accept that others shift the burden of adjustment onto our producers and our workers.

In conclusion, let me recall how it was that we came to establish this committee. We sensed in 1977 that we were facing more than just another cyclical downturn in steel and that something fundamental had changed in world supply and demand. We concluded that our collective policy response therefore had to give "sustained priority attention . . . to the long-term need of restructuring and modernization, where necessary, to promote a rational allocation of productive resources with an aim of achieving fully competitive enterprises." In 1978, after a much more thorough debate, we agreed that this committee would have as one of its objectives to "facilitate needed structural adaptations that will diminish pressures for trade actions and promote rational allocation of productive resources with the aim of achieving fully competitive enterprises."

In October 1980, on the heels of another episode of trade confrontation, we agreed that the restructuring process needed to be accelerated if we were to meet these objectives. Throughout the history of this committee and it predecessor we have stressed the goal of cooperation, the need to recognize the interrelatedness of our problems and the value of regular consultations on incipient problems.

We tried our best from the spring of 1981 on to warn, in this committee and bilaterally, that the actions of some exporters were placing us on a collision course. We take no pleasure in having been proved correct in that forecast. We now see only one way to avoid repeated episodes of sharp conflict over this issue. We have got to start confronting, not each other, but the problem itself, in all its aspects. It is for that reason that we established this committee and, from all appearances, we need it today more than ever.●

A REPLY TO FRANK DONNER

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, in the August 7-14, 1982, issue of The Nation, a left-leaning periodical, there appeared an attack on the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, on its chairman and myself, and on one of my staff aides, Dr. Samuel T. Francis. The article in which these attacks appeared was entitled "Rounding Up the Usual Suspects" and was written by Frank Donner, himself a long standing member of the anti-intelligence lobby that has so crippled our intelligence and internal security agencies in recent years.

Dr. Francis drafted a lengthy response to the Donner article and sent it to the editor of The Nation, in the hope that that magazine would have the fairness to publish both sides of the question. After 3 weeks of waiting for a reply from the editor, he has asked that I place his response in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am happy to do so, in order that the errors and fallacious reasoning of Frank Donner be exposed publicly, and I request that Dr. Francis' response be printed.

The response follows:

A REPLY TO FRANK DONNER

(By Samuel T. Francis)

It would appear that in the last two years I have become something of an obsession to the contributors of The Nation. In January, 1981, this magazine published an attack on the Heritage Foundation's Mandate for Leadership and specifically on the section dealing with internal security, which I authored, in the chapter on the intelligence community. Earlier this summer, The Nation published a hostile review of a recent collection, The New Right Papers, to which I was a contributor. The review dwelled on my essay in that collection and made an absurd attempt to link it with Nazi and Fascist ideology. Now The Nation has published an even more absurd article by Frank Donner ("Rounding Up the Usual Suspects") in its issue of August 7-14, 1982. It is curious that an obscure staff aide on Capitol Hill should attract this much attention, and even curiouser that the attention should be as hostile as it has been.

I have deliberately refrained from responding to these attacks, partly because my work has not permitted me time to reply and partly because I simply do not have the inclination to chase the contributors to The Nation around the political cabbage patch. Although friends and colleagues urged me to reply—indeed, in one case to consider legal action—not until the most recent barrage did I decide that a response was in order.

Unlike the earlier attacks, Frank Donner's article is directed not only at me personally but also at a serious issue of national policy, the projected revision of the Attorney General's guidelines for domestic security investigations (the Levi guidelines) by the FBI. For good or ill, my name has been publicly associated with the controversy over the guidelines, and it is important that Donner not be allowed to boast, as is his habit, that he has "refuted" or "discredited" my position in this controversy by an article that is replete with logical fallacies, factual errors, debaters' artifices, and the most vituperative insults.

Although Donner is ostensibly writing about the hearings held by the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism on the Levi guidelines on June 24 and 25, 1982, the bulk of his article does not deal with the hearings, and none of it deals with the actual testimony of the witnesses. Nearly three-fourths of Donner's article focuses on a lecture I delivered in Boston at Emerson College in April of this year on the subject of the guidelines, my criticism of them, and my suggestions for revising them. Prior to his effort to refute my presentation in Boston point-by-point, however, Donner devotes a paragraph to my own academic background and to the Mandate for Leadership report of the Heritage Foundation.

It is not clear to me why Donner chooses to dwell on the subject of my doctoral dissertation, unless it is to suggest that I have no academic expertise in a subject on which I have repeatedly been asked to write and speak. If this is his suggestion, one can only marvel at his pedantry, since it is commonplace for academics to develop expertise in a second field. In any case, Donner follows his references to my dissertation topic with a gratuitous and unexplained insult to my monograph, The Soviet Strategy of Terror, "an unintentional parody of the genre." What "genre" he is talking about and why it is a "parody" he does not bother to explain. Incidentally, Donner's first factual error occurs at this point: I did not begin work at Heritage after earning my doctorate, as he states. I received my doctorate in 1979, two years after coming to Heritage. The point is of little importance, but it reveals the sloppiness of Donner's research and the cavalier manner in which he treats factual precision.

More importantly, I did not advocate in the Mandate for Leadership that the Levi guidelines be "scrapped." Nor did I advocate this in my speech at Boston, as Donner states. In everything that I have ever written or said on the subject, I have urged the revision of the existing guidelines and the need for some guidelines for domestic security investigations. This vitally important distinction between reform and revision, on the one hand, and outright abolition on the other is ignored by Donner.

He then reiterates the stale, hysterical, and inaccurate criticism of the Mandate for Leadership section on internal security that has been floating around on the American Left for two years. This criticism was effectively refuted, the out-of-context quotations and inaccurately compressed paraphrases corrected, in a letter from Phil N. Truluck, Executive Vice-President of the Heritage Foundation, to Congressman Thomas J. Downey, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 16, 1980, p. E5447; Congressman Downey's criticism of this section was published in the RECORD on November 19, 1980, p. E5005. I refer the reader to these citations, but to repeat the substance of Mr. Truluck's corrections once more:

(1) I did not advocate that the FBI "monitor [whatever that means] a broad selection of targets ranging from 'radical and New Left groups' to 'anti-defense' and 'anti-nuclear lobbies,'" I did mention a range of extremist or foreign connected groups (including right-wing extremists) as actual or potential internal security threats. I do believe that the FBI should be allowed to investigate at least some of the groups I mentioned, but it is impossible to specify which techniques or levels of investigation would be appropriate. Among the groups I mentioned that I considered then (and consider now) to be internal security threats are the foreign-linked Communist Parties and the active terrorist groups (e.g., FALN) and their supporters. There is no doubt in my mind that these groups should be under investigation at an intense level.

(2) It is not true that I stated, and I do not believe, that, in Donner's words, "the nation's security requires the surveillance of 'clergymen, businessmen,'" etc. The quotation from the Mandate concerning clergymen et al. is torn out of context. That context is a discussion of the nature of subversion and of how innocent parties can be unwittingly deceived, exploited, and manipulated for ulterior ends. The passage has nothing to do with "surveillance."

(3) Donner is also wrong when he states that the Mandate for Leadership section says "the K.G.B. has penetrated all levels of government and operates a vast network of proxies and spies." The KGB, as well as other foreign intelligence services, are indeed active in the United States—probably more so now than at any time in the past—as a number of recent espionage cases, Congressional testimony, the statements of defectors, and responsible investigative reporting have shown. The Mandate did comment on this fact, but this is quite different from claiming that the KGB has penetrated "all levels" of government, a claim I have never made and have no reason to believe. Once again, Donner's exaggerations deceive the reader.

It is doubtful to me that Donner has ever bothered to read the actual text of the Mandate for Leadership section on internal security. It is more probable that he has simply relied on the news accounts and editorials that were written about it. This is indicated by the fact that he has produced no quotations from the Mandate that did not appear earlier in these secondary sources and by his inaccurate reference to "the Heritage Foundation's report 'The Intelligence Community.'" There is no such report; there is a chapter of that title in the Mandate for Leadership. I was the editor of that chapter and the author of a section within it on internal security. If Donner had ever actually seen the Mandate for Leadership volume, he would not have made this elementary error.

I might suggest that Donner submit himself to the pursuit of an academic discipline for a few years, even to so esoteric a subject as the foreign policy of the Earl of Clarendon. There, in the "cloistered contemplation" of his subject, he will find that one cannot easily complete an acceptable dissertation in any field unless he carefully corroborates his facts, actually reads the texts on which he is commenting, is precise in his logic, makes some effort to substantiate his assertions, and avoids importing his own ideology and prejudices into his analysis. Judging from his article, I suspect that Donner would not last long in any acceptable graduate school.

The incoherence of Donner's mind is evident in his main assault on my remarks in Boston. He begins this part of his article with several vague and unexplained hit-and-run assertions: my "systematic rejection of constitutional objections to intrusive surveillance practices," my "unsupported argument that the executive branch has elastic, inherent powers in the domestic security realm," my "unjustified complaint about the impact of the Levi guidelines on the F.B.I.'s intelligence caseload," etc. It is difficult to guess what Donner is talking about, since he does not bother to quote my exact statements in these matters. As far as I can tell, the first assertion refers to my citation of several recent court cases that uphold the propriety of domestic security investigations. The second perhaps refers to my statement that one authority for domestic security investigations by the FBI that has been cited in the past, and with which I agree, is the requirement of the U.S. Constitution (Article II, section 3) that the President take care that the laws be faithfully executed and (Article IV, section 4) that the federal government protect the states from domestic violence. These are not "elastic" powers and my claim was not "unsupported." My "unjustified complaint" about the effect of the Levi guidelines refers, I suppose, to the statistics I cited in my remarks that in 1974 (before the guidelines) the FBI had 157 organizations under investigation, and in 1978 there were only 15 organizations and 42 individuals under investigation. Donner, in other words, is wrong on all three charges, although the reader has no way of knowing what I actually said. If Donner's charges refer to other statements that I made, he should have specified them.

Donner's purpose, of course, was not to refute what I said but simply to get the reader in the mood for the main assault, a painstaking but entirely erroneous criticism of my remarks in Boston. Essentially, Donner's criticism boils down to three charges:

(1) Terrorism is not now a serious threat in the United States; therefore, we do not need to take precautionary or preventive measures against it. I will say no more about this argument than to point out that it makes as much sense, and is as illogical, as the argument that I should not carry health insurance because I have never been seriously ill. I will not try to prove that terrorism is a serious problem in the United States today. I will rest content with what I hope is the incontestable statement that since the mid 1960s terrorism has been a worldwide problem, that the United States (and its citizens and institutions abroad) have been attacked and threatened by terrorists outside the country as well as inside, and that the terrorist threat continues to concern all civilized nations. Global terrorism has important and long term sociological and ideological causes as well as a significant conspiratorial dimension, and it is only common sense to believe that the United States is a logical target of some terrorist groups. Terrorism in the United States is not a particularly important problem right now, but our vulnerability to terrorism is a very important problem today. We all hope that the global wave of violence is on the decline, but as long as it exists, the leaders and the citizens of the United States have cause to take adequate security measures against it.

(2) Investigation (or "monitoring," "surveillance," "penetration," or "infiltration"—Donner uses these undefined terms interchangeably, although they generally have different meanings) of terrorist or terrorist support groups is unconstitutional and a threat to democratic freedoms. Donner repeats this point several times, yet at no time does he cite a single provision of the Constitution, a single court decision, or a single statute to support his insinuation that domestic security investigations are beyond the pale of the Constitution. There are indeed legal restrictions on the methods of intelligence collection in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, the Keith decision of 1972, and other laws and decisions. The Freedom of Information and Privacy Acts have also had indirect restrictive effects on the conduct of domestic security investigations, but there is no constitutional or legal bar to domestic security investigations or to the authority of the FBI or other law enforcement agencies to conduct them. In my remarks in Boston, as I stated above, I cited several court cases to support this statement; Donner either missed this part of the speech or deliberately chose to ignore it.

Moreover, there is no reason to believe that duly authorized and properly conducted domestic security investigations threaten a free society. The FBI was most active in this area between the administrations of Presidents Franklin Roosevelt and Lyndon Johnson—perhaps the most liberal stretch of American history and the era in which domocracy and civil liberties were most widely extended. Intensive domestic security investigations did not, in other word, retard political freedom but rather accompanied its expansion and were often authorized by those in government most responsible for the expansion of freedom.

It is important to understand that mere investigation, no matter at what level, of a group or individual for domestic security purposes does not mean that the subject of investigation is being prosecuted, punished, disrupted, intimidated, threatened, or interfered with. A group or individual may advocate the most extreme violence, all sorts of nonsensical and dangerous ideas, and the most oppressive or anarchic forms of government. Authorizing investigation of such advocacy merely means that the government (specifically, the FBI) is allowed to know about the groups or individuals, their associates, or those influenced by them and how seriously they intend their rhetoric. The justification for such investigations (which may mean merely collecting and reading the literature of such groups) is simply that some extremists are serious when they call for violence and do have the capability to carry out their threats. By knowing about such groups in advance, the authorities are aided in preventing violence. The negative is also useful: if a group is not serious in its advocacy of violence or does not have the ability to carry it out, the authorities need to know this too in order to redirect their resources more effectively. There has been substantial testimony in the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism to this effect as well as in other committees in previous Congresses, but Donner either is ignorant of this evidence or choses to disregard it.

This brings us to Donner's third charge, namely, (3) Investigation of terrorists and their support apparatuses is not useful for the prevention of terrorist violence. In arguing for the contrary of this proposition, I cited several instances from recent history in which the absence or withdrawal of proactive investigation was followed by the perpetration of violence by the group from which investigation had been withdrawn or was lacking.

It is impossible to prove a negative, so no one can say with absolute certainty that investigation would have prevented the violence. Yet, given the circumstances, it is only common sense that at least some of it would have been prevented. This is not merely my subjective guess. It is based on discussions with professional intelligence and law enforcement officers, some of whom were directly concerned with some of the incidents I described or with similar incidents. Every intelligence officer or investigator with whom I have talked and who was involved in counter-terrorist work prior to the guidelines has described to me cases in which proactive investigation has prevented violence and has saved lives—the kind of investigation that is not allowed or is minimized under the guidelines in their present form.

Donner is at great pains to demonstrate that every one of the instances I discussed is invalid. It is in this section of his article that the profundity of his ignorance, his inability to think clearly, and indeed his artful and deceptive style become most evident. I will not try to reply to every one of his embarrassing bloopers here, since it would require almost a line-by-line analysis. Instead I will dwell on the most absurd of his errors in order to display his incompetence to write on this subject.

(1) The Brinks Robbery: One of the suspects arrested fleeing from the scene of the armed robbery and triple murders in Nyack, New York last October was a member of a group known as the "May 19th Communist Organization" (MCO), and a vehicle used in the escape attempt was traced to another member of the same group. Judge Webster has confirmed in public testimony that the FBI did not have the MCO under investigation prior to the Brinks robbery, although the group is clearly linked to the Weather Underground Organization support group, the Prairie Fire Organizing Committee, and has published manifestoes advocating terrorism and armed robbery ("expropriations"). My point was that police or FBI informants in the May 19th Communist Organization could have learned of the impending robbery, previous robberies allegedly committed by the same parties, or the whereabouts of wanted Weather Underground fugitives, since the MCO has been supportive of and apparently has had contacts with these fugitives and their activities. Perhaps informants could not have learned these things, but without them, the authorities are reduced to luck and the weaknesses of the terrorist groups themselves to counter them.

Judge Webster has stated that the Levi guidelines did not prevent the MCO from being investigated. I must disagree with him. If he is correct, then why was it not being investigated? Since the Levi guidelines do not permit the use of informants, mail covers, or electronic surveillance unless there is reason to believe a group or individual is or soon will be engaged in violence and the violation of federal law for certain purposes, and since there was no reason to believe this of the MCO prior to the Brinks robbery (other than its rhetoric), I do not see how the guidelines could have permitted the investigation of the May 19th Communist Organization.

Donner's response to this example is the following:

The fact is that two of the May 19 Organization's [sic] units, the Weather Underground and the Black Liberation Army, and several individual members as well were under intensive surveillance. Indeed, a number of the participants in the crime were fugitives and therefore targets of serious tracking efforts.

First, it is not true that the Weather Underground and the BLA were under active investigation (nor is it true that they are "units" of the MCO). The FBI closed its investigations of both groups in the late 1970's, and in December, 1981, Judge Webster stated in a press conference that the Weather Underground was no longer a functioning organization.

Secondly, Donner, in his whole discussion of the nature and purpose of investigations, reveals a woeful ignorance of both the nature of modern terrorism and of counter-terrorist intelligence. In his discussion of FALN Donner states, correctly: The experience of law-enforcement agencies is that most terrorist groups are virtually impenetrable by informants or by wiretaps and other techniques because security precautions are second nature to them.

Precisely so. The "hit teams" or "action cadres" of a terrorist group—those that actually perpetrate the violence—are generally underground or completely anonymous. In order to function, however, they must have contacts with or support from an above-ground apparatus (the "support group"), which also generally tries to publicize and legitimize the terrorists' "propaganda of the deed." The most accessible target of counter-terrorist intelligence therefore is the above-ground support structure, not the underground hit team, and through investigation of the support structure and surveillance of the contacts between it and the underground, the authorities may be led to the apprehension of the actual terrorists.

Moreover, because the support groups themselves seldom commit violence or illegal acts, they are generally not subject to investigation (at least intensive or long-term investigation) under the Levi guidelines. But because they advocate violence through their propaganda, revision of the Levi guidelines to allow for investigation of advocacy of violence would enable the FBI to investigate the support groups. In my remarks in Boston, I explained this problem and its solution very carefully, and I quoted General Schlomo Gazit, the former Director of Israeli Military Intelligence, and several other authorities to support my case. Donner was physically present during the whole of my remarks, but apparently was nodding off. He completely missed the point I was making: Investigation of the underground component of a terrorist group is often not very useful, since its whereabouts are unknown and its structure is difficult to penetrate; the proper and more accessible target of surveillance is the more public but less violent support structure. This is one reason why FBI surveillance and investigation of FALN, the Weather Underground, the BLA, and other underground terrorists have often not been very productive. The guidelines prevent the FBI from focusing on the proper target. (Even if the underground apparatus can be located, the proper response at that point is not to investigate it but simply to arrest its members).

(2) The Hanafi Muslims and FALN: Donner claims that surveillance of FALN and the Hanafis prior to the Levi guidelines did not prevent violence; therefore, he concludes, the guidelines and other restrictions on intelligence gathering are not responsible for failing to prevent violence since they went into effect. All this proves, however, is that successful surveillance and investigation are not easy. In the case of FALN (on the investigation of which I did not dwell in Boston) a Puerto Rican terrorist group active since 1974, the only breaks in the case have occurred through unsolicited tips. The FALN underground structure is highly secretive, and even surveillance of the above-ground support structure did not prove effective. This is no reason to give it up, however, since even low levels of investigation can reveal targeting, adherents, financing, ideology, and other important facts about a group (and did reveal such information in the FALN case).

With respect to the Hanafis, the point is that the withdrawal of informants from this group by the Washington Metropolitan Police during the near elimination of local police intelligence in the early 1970's obviated and made impossible any preventive action. "But if there is one thing about which we can be 'almost certain'," writes Donner, "it is that the smaller the group, the tighter the security and the more difficult the access." This remark is simply meaningless. Security is a function of the procedures and discipline of a group and has nothing to do with size. Some large organized crime families, for example, have far tighter security than all but the most sophisticated terrorist groups. Moreover, Donner's point is irrelevant, since there had been an informant in the Hanafis who had been withdrawn or dropped. I have spoken with officers actually involved in this case, and without exception they feel that retention of the informant would have prevented the Hanafi seizure in Washington in 1977, in which one person was killed. An informant in the group would almost certainly have known of the storage of arms, training and planning meetings, Hanafi surveillance of the targeted buildings, etc., and could have warned local police. Although the Hanafi case is not directly relevant to the Levi guidelines, its point is to show that the absence of surveillance enables the perpetrators of ideological violence to carry out their plans.

Similarly, the restrictions of the San Francisco police, while not federal regulations, did impede investigation and apprehension of the "Zebra" murderers. The suspect Black Muslim temple was eventually placed under mild photographic surveillance by state (not local) authorities in order to identify suspect members (some of them former convicts with records of violence), but this was only two months before a defector from the group told police what he knew of the planned murders and the case was wrapped up. Had even this amount of surveillance been permitted earlier, photographs of suspects might well have been identified by witnesses and surviving victims, and lives could have been saved.

(3) Jonestown: A Department of Justice spokesman admitted shortly after the massacre that Congressman Ryan had asked DOJ to investigate the People's Temple, but the Department "ruled out investigation into alleged brainwashing and physical abuse in religious cults because of fears such inquiries would violate constitutional guarantees of freedom of religion." (Washington Post, November 25, 1978, page A5). Apparently, then, we have come to a state where brainwashing and torture are guaranteed by the Constitution! Donner, either ignorant of or reluctant to acknowledge this admission by the Department, fantasizes that Jones's paranoia was "fed by his delusion of being spied on by the FBI and CIA." Perhaps, for that matter, it was the kind of paranoid drivel trumpeted by Donner and Jones's cohort Mark Lane about the intelligence community that instructed Jones.

(4) The Maryland KKK: More directly relevant to the guidelines themselves is the instance of the Maryland KKK, in which the FBI withdrew its informant (i.e., ceased to receive reports from him) while the Maryland State Police kept theirs in the Klan and were able to prevent serious violence shortly afterwards. The Bureau dropped its informant because of the Levi guidelines' time limits on the use of informants. Donner's attempt to refute this example is a foolish non sequitur. He points out that the FBI and State Police informant were the same individual. This fact, of course, has nothing to do with FBI loss of contact with him. The point is that because of the guidelines the FBI could not prevent an act of terrorist violence. Fortunately, the Maryland authorities, not bound by the federal guidelines, did do so. If, as many "civil libertarians" advocate, the provisions of the guidelines were extended to state and local agencies (and this has actually happened in some cases), this act of prevention could not have occurred.

(5) Finally, there is the Hinckley case. It may or may not be probable that Hinckley's violent proclivities and trip to Washington to shoot the President would have been detected. In my mind there remains a large degree of probability that he would have been detected if the Nazis had been under investigation and if Hinckley had been tracked as a potentially violent individual. However, the main point is that the Nazis themselves—a group with violent proclivities, attractive to extremists and eccentrics, and advocating totalitarian dictatorship—are not under investigation because of the guidelines. This was admitted by FBI spokesman Ed Gooderman to the editor of the conservative newsweekly, Human Events, shortly after the assassination attempt. If our religious life is to be elevated by brainwashing and torture, therefore, our political culture is to be enriched by vicious harangues in favor of genocide and totalitarianism with no chance for federal authorities to keep track of these nuts or prevent or warn of their provocative or violent activities.

Donner's general ignorance of the nature of contemporary terrorism and political violence reveals itself again, and in a major way, in his remark that Francis wants us to believe that a continuum running from dissent to violence exists in American political life and that penetration of dissenting groups is necessary to prevent the violence. He ignores what students of political violence have long known—that violence-prone or terrorist groups have for almost a century and a half conflicted ideologically with non-violent groups, even when they share the same goals.

Although I quoted or cited several authorities on terrorism, conflict and political violence in my remarks—none of whom Donner mentions—he does not mention any to support this assertion, and we cannot know what his authorities are. Obviously there is a disagreement over tactics between violent and non-violent groups. But in the history of terrorism, the latter often develop or fragment into violent groups. Such was the case with the SDS, for example, which moved from generally peaceful demonstrations through violent confrontations before fracturing into the Weathermen. The Black Liberation Army, an explicitly terrorist group, also developed from a faction within the militant but less violent Black Panther Party. There is also very often a fringe element that, while it does not fully endorse violence, exhibits some sympathy or fascination with it and has some association with a terrorist or violent group. This is not to say that all those who sympathize with the stated goals of a terrorist or violent group are involved with, have endorsed, or sympathize with violent methods, but the connections or "continuum" are sufficiently real for law enforcement authorities to be aware of them and make use of them for investigative and preventive ends.

Earlier in his article Donner makes another meaningless distinction between "isolated" terrorist acts, such as he claims predominate in the United States, and the "ideologically motivated terrorism prevalent in Europe today." I see no necessary difference between "isolated" terrorism and "ideological" terrorism. Indeed, in most definitions of terrorism, ideological or political motivation is a key element. The 42 terrorist incidents in the United States listed by the FBI for 1981 (not all of them "bombing incidents" as Donner inaccurately claims the FBI calls them) were all, as far as we know from available evidence, committed in the name of some aberrant ideology. It is true that some of the groups said to be involved are small, unsophisticated, and only occasionally a serious threat. Others—such as the Puerto Rican and Armenian terrorists—have presented fairly serious problems for some time and promise to cause more trouble. Others still—such as the Communist Workers Party and some Iranian groups—may become serious threats. Donner appears to have no knowledge of these groups or their tendencies, and in his determination to refute everything I say, he minimizes the terrorist problem to an unrealistic degree.

In short, Donner has no understanding or knowledge of what he is talking about, and there is nothing in his article that effectively refutes or challenges anything I or other critics of the Levi guidelines have said. (Other critics include the chief of the U.S. Park Police, the past and present Directors of the Secret Service, the General Counsel of the Treasury Department, a host of local and state law enforcement intelligence authorities, and another host of former FBI agents). Even when, as is not always the case, Donner is factually correct in his challenges, his facts are usually irrelevant to the point or argument. Donner was physically present at the session in Boston, but he remained silent during the discussion that followed. I wondered then why he did not participate, but it is now clear to me that he prudently did not choose to make a fool of himself when I was present to respond to him. Instead, he wrote an article about my presentation that would be read by an audience that was not present and could not know what I had said. Unable to refute my case, he resorts to insults to me, to Senator Denton ("a bumbling primitive") and Senator East (the "master of the paranoid style," a "tiger," a "fervent ideologue eager for the limelight").

Apart from the polemical weakness and intellectual poverty that Donner's tactic displays, this kind of vituperation is really a bit too thick coming from him. In the 1950s Donner was identified as having been a Communist in the 1940s. When afforded an opportunity to refute the sworn allegations, he declined and refused to answer the question (though he later denied that he was a Communist at the time he was questioned). It is not for me to say whether Donner is, was, or ever has been a supporter of Joseph Stalin, but until he has at least clarified these allegations, the rest of us—particularly Senator Denton, who has served his country heroically—should not have to suffer his foul mouth.

I would have thought that Donner's colleagues in the ACLU, so zealous themselves for the protection of civil liberties, even for Nazis to march through Jewish neighborhoods, would have sought some public clarification from him. Was he a Communist or not, and if he was, how did he make the transition from Stalinist to a stout defender of civil liberties? In his lifelong quest to ridicule and insult anti-communists, when has he ever turned his bile on the internal terror and foreign crimes and aggression of the KGB and its grim sister services?

Indeed, it matters little to me whether Frank Donner ever was a Stalinist or not. On the evening before my remarks in Boston, Donner insisted on making a speech himself, though, I was told, he had not been invited to do so. He treated us to an incoherent, rambling, and delusive diatribe on the alleged conspiracies of the CIA, the FBI, the "McCarthy period," the "New Right," and all the other bugaboos of the Old Left. Refusing to sit down and allow the scheduled program to proceed, he was finally led away by the chairman of the conference, to the snickers of the audience, revealed for what he is, an aging phony, a relic of irrelevance, an incomparable bore.●

JOHN KENNETH GALBRAITH ON THE NUCLEAR FREEZE

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I call the attention of my colleagues to an extremely thoughtful article by John Kenneth Galbraith in support of the nuclear weapons freeze.

Professor Galbraith demonstrates lucidly and convincingly how the Reagan administration's loose rhetoric about fighting and winning a nuclear war has galvanized the American people behind the movement for a nuclear weapons freeze. He describes how the American people have become removed from decisionmaking in the realm of military strategy, a matter which concerns the very survival of our Republic. In the finest tradition of American democracy, the nuclear freeze movement represents a grassroot initiative by Americans determined to take their future into their own hands.

I commend Professor Galbraith's article to the Senate and request that it be printed in full at this point in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 5, 1982]

FRIEND OF THE FREEZE

(By John Kenneth Galbraith)

Like others in these last years, I've been deeply concerned over the dynamics of the nuclear arms race and the somber promise that it holds for mankind. Feeling so, I have tried to do whatever might be possible as a private citizen to arouse interest in arms control and concern for the exceedingly probable disaster if it does not succeed. I was a member of Americans for SALT; I have had a role in the Council for a Livable World and been a cochairman of the American Committee on East-West Accord; I persuaded the BBC, in the course of a television series on the issues of our time, to do a sequence in Death Valley to show how the landscape between Hartford and Philadelphia would look after a modest nuclear exchange; I have made speeches for Physicians for Social Responsibility, our most effective organization in advising people as to the consequences of nuclear war.

At the Democratic National Convention in 1980, I joined Adm. Gene La Rocque of the Center for Defense Information and Frank Askin, a lawyer from New Jersey, to speak in favor of a resolution calling for a bilateral nuclear weapons freeze. The freeze, a straightforward and wholly practical first step, seemed by far the best way of getting the issue away from the nuclear theologians who have made weapons policy, including arms control, their exceptionally private preserve.

The convention experience was especially instructive. Harold Brown, then in his residual days as secretary of defense—no men descend so rapidly into such well-earned obscurity as former secretaries of defense—reproached me with extreme solemnity for appearing on so frivolous a mission. He was there to lobby for the MX missile.

Charles Robb, now governor of Virginia, was designated by the Pentagon to refute the freeze heresy; he read his speech very well, despite not previously having encountered it. My own words, like those of my colleagues, were greeted with great waves of apathy. We were resoundingly defeated.

I cite these efforts not to suggest any seniority in the present discussion but to establish my credentials for affirming that, despite much efforts, we weren't getting anywhere at all until Ronald Reagan and his people came along to bail us out.

Concern for the danger of nuclear confrontation and war was, I am persuaded, just below the surface. But like the prospect of death, with which it is so largely identical, it was subject to psychological denial. Better and certainly happier not to think about it.

Needed was a major shock or series of shocks to bring the alarm into the open. This we could not provide. And this the Reagan administration, in a superbly orchestrated effort, has provided. That it was not intended does not subtract at all from the achievement.

The stage was set by the big increase in military spending, which was linked, in turn, to the assault on social expenditures. The first made the second necessary. Many in the past had sought to show military expenditures are at the expense of other public needs. The administration made the choice clear, vivid and unmistakable, a major exercise in popular education.

Then came the renewed commitment to the MX missile and the extended debate over its basing. This was admirably designed to arouse important and articulate people, and particularly western Republicans and the Mormon church. There is wholly nonpartisan aversion to having the MX as a neighbor and target.

Next came the well-publicized decision to proceed with the neutron bomb with its thought-provoking emphasis on the destruction of people as opposed to property.

This highly substantive action was combined with more theoretical talk of a limited nuclear war, which emerged as a quite probable prospect, tolerable except to the Europeans immediately involved. The latter promptly raised their voices, which, not surprisingly, had resonance across the Atlantic, including with those who wondered in their inconvenient way if a limited war could ever be limited.

Next came the renewed emphasis on civil defense. The educational value of this is simply immense. Nothing so aroused my Cambridge, Mass., neighbors as a civil defense advisory saying that, in the event of a nuclear attack, we should all go in an orderly manner to Greenfield out near the Berkshires—those of us who had cars. As an especially telling note, we were cautioned to take our credit cards with us.

In quick response, the Cambridge City Council took time off from its normal preoccupation with potholes, garbage collection and general fiscal astringency to publish a pamphlet condemning the whole insane business and urging preventions as the only hope.

The effort to arouse the public and keep it aroused continued. Early this summer, we had word of the plans for a five-year nuclear war from which we would emerge victorious if not quite happy and glorious. Following some criticism, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger reiterated his commitment, adding only the thought that while we might not win, we wouldn't lose.

Meanwhile, from the National Security Council came the news that it was national policy "to prevail" over the Soviets, this being one of those inspired ambiguities that is especially designed to give scope to the imagination. A NSC staff member, Prof. Richard Pipes, had earlier been quoted as saying that there could be no peace with the Soviets until, in a generous way, they abandoned their economic and social system. In other words, a state of permanent war with the Soviets.

In July came word that the administration would no longer have negotiations on the comprehensive test ban; there were doubts about verification. Better the risk from the weapons. In August, Energy Secretary James Edwards went out to Yucca Flats to celebrate the anniversary of the bombing of Hiroshima by being present at a nuclear test. He proclaimed it "exciting" and promised more. Prof. Eugene Rostow, in charge of arms control negotiations, had earlier recurred to Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Asked if he did not fear a nuclear war, he responded that Japan had survived a nuclear attack and flourished. How better could one have guided thoughts to the unfortunates who were in the two cities on those summer days and who neither survived nor flourished?

Thus the contribution of the administration. Can anyone doubt its effectiveness compared with the feeble voices previously raised? In consequence, the freeze has become a national crusade; there has been nothing comparable since the Vietnam War, as all know, it came within two votes of success in the House of Representatives. Considering the risks we had been accepting, including that of the blind delegation of power to those who make nuclear game theory and the resulting mega-deaths their monopoly, can anyone be sorry? One must marvel, in a certain way, at the political courage (or insouciance) that was involved. Not previously had anyone imagined that massive and enduring death was a salable proposition for the average American voter.●

MR. HELMS PLAYS DODGEM

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, I have been disturbed, but not surprised, by the confusion which has attended the press coverage of our recent proceedings concerning abortion and prayer in schools. Granted, Senate procedure is no easy subject to master. Nevertheless, I believe, some of the coverage to have been inaccurate beyond the bounds of simple ignorance.

In the interests of assisting my colleagues in appreciating this fact, I draw their attention to an editorial which appeared in the August 20 New York Times and a response from Senator HELMS which appeared in that same newspaper on August 25.

Mr. President, I ask that the editorial and Senator HELM'S reply be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The material follows:

MR. HELMS PLAYS DODGEM

"People want to know where we stand on the issues," said Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania during this week's Congressional battle on abortion. People should address their complaints to Senator Jesse Helms. Thanks to him, Americans who'd been promised an orderly discussion of his Human Life Statute and Senator Hatch's constitutional amendment permitting the states and Congress to prohibit abortion were treated to the spectacle of a Senator turning debate into dodgem.

First Senator Helms reneged on his previous agreement to a schedule of time limits for debate on the abortion issue. He announced that he wanted to withdraw his statute and Senator Hatch's amendment in favor of a new measure. But he waited until Wednesday to disclose just what it was.

It turned out to proclaim that "scientific evidence demonstrates" that life begins at conception and that the Supreme Court had "erred" in 1973 when it permitted abortion. His proposal also severely restricted women's access to the procedure. It was coupled with a ban on court review of state laws sanctioning prayer in public schools. The whole business was linked to the debt-ceiling bill.

Senator Helms seriously overestimated his ability to steer. To introduce his measure, he managed to break a filibuster by Senator Packwood, the Senate's foremost supporter of abortion rights. But he was promptly bumped back by Senators Weicker and Baucus, who offered amendments designed to move the debate off the substance of abortion and school prayer and onto the constitutionality of what Senator Helms was trying to do.

Senator Helms tried to table Senator Weicker's amendment but was outvoted by colleagues who were by now thoroughly miffed at the way he was flouting accepting procedure; the Baucus amendment has yet to be acted on.

So for now, gridlock reigns. Senators Packwood and Helms cannot even agree on how to limit debate. The Senate needs to get on to other matters; senators who might support the new Helms abortion proposal do not necessarily endorse his school prayer proposal; and besides, everybody wants to go home for the Labor Day recess.

It is probably just as well that no action seems likely until September, when another long filibuster looms. But Senator Helms' effort to turn the Senate into bumper cars can hardly reassure voters on any side of the issue.

HELMS ON PRAYER AND ABORTION: "I AM READY TO TAKE MY CHANCES"

To the Editor: You spelled my name correctly in your Aug. 20 editorial "Mr. Helms Plays Dodgem." But I found scarcely anything else in it to be accurate. The Times was playing dodgem with the truth.

Contrary to your statement, the record will show that I have been ready to vote on both the voluntary school prayer amendment and the abortion amendment (they are separate amendments), now before the Senate, in the orderly fashion prescribed by parliamentary procedure. If you doubt it, inquire of Senate Majority Leader Baker.

Senators Packwood, Weicker, et al., have resisted letting the Senate vote. That's why Senator Baker filed a cloture petition against their filibuster. They appear to be afraid to put their views to the test of a Senate vote.

You are dead wrong in your assertion that I have "reneged" on any previous agreement to schedule a time limitation on debate. Majority Leader Baker has refuted your assertion on the Senate floor.

You are incorrect in saying that I "wanted to withdraw" my statute. I have had several proposals available, but no specific statute was ever put forward for Senate debate until I sent my amendment to the desk. Senators Packwood and Weicker were livid because they were unsuccessful in their efforts to restrict me to an antiabortion proposal, which they thought least likely to be approved by the Senate.

I cannot imagine what prompted you to concoct the fantasy that I have ever "announced"—or even suggested—that I wanted to withdraw Senator Hatch's amendment in favor of mine. I respect Senator Hatch's right to include his proposal in any unanimous consent request.

You state that my right-to-life measure is "coupled with a ban on court review of state laws sanctioning prayer in public schools." The proposals are in fact separate proposals, which in the normal course of Senate procedure would be voted on separately; they are coupled only by the Senate rules which state the order of voting. Incidentally, the voluntary school prayer measure is the identical measure that has already passed the Senate twice.

As to the findings, which you treat with such incredulity, they are based upon the most extensive hearings on the subject ever conducted by a legislative body, in which all points of view were thoroughly aired by legal and scientific experts and which are now available in 1,038 printed pages of testimony. Thus there need be no surprise at what the findings are.

You do me too much credit when you say I managed to break a filibuster by Senator Packwood. In fact Senator Packwood lost the floor under the rules when he sought to make a motion to restrict my rights, after telling me informally that he would make no such motion.

You say that my tabling motion was voted down by colleagues thoroughly miffed by my flouting accepted procedure. The Times evidently is more skilled at mental telepathy than I, but I have not flouted any accepted procedure to my knowledge—and, indeed, Senator Baker has stated so on the Senate floor.

If there is gridlock, it is someone else who is jamming the system. I am ready to vote at any time, I have been ready to vote on the basis of any time agreement, and I have repeatedly stated so on the record. I admit that the voting may be close, but I am ready to take my chances. Why isn't the other side?

Better luck next time.

JESSE HELMS,
U.S. Senator from North Carolina.

SUPPORT GROWS FOR SENATE EXPORT TRADING COMPANY LEGISLATION

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I recently received a letter from Michael Monroney, vice president for Government relations of TRW, Inc., detailing his company's support for the export trading company legislation (S. 734) and particularly the Senate language on the antitrust provisions.

Mr. Monroney's letter is a cogent defense of the Senate approach to the antitrust certification process. He points out that the House version fails to provide an adequate immunity and places the certification process in an agency unaccustomed to the administrative burden and disinclined to use the process to promote exports.

It is clear from Mr. Monroney's letter that the Senate version of the bill is the one best able to make ETC's viable entities. I hope the conferees will share that view.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the letter appear at this point in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

TRW,
Arlington, Va., August 9, 1982.

Hon. JOHN HEINZ,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HEINZ: I am writing to express TRW's support for the export trading company legislation, S. 734, which, I understand, you will soon be considering in conference. This legislation will encourage more aggressive and effective export activity by a broad range of U.S. companies and strengthen the competitiveness of U.S. firms.

There are two areas in the antitrust provisions of the legislation where, I think, the Senate version is better suited to promote the purposes of the bill, and I would urge you to support them in the conference. These are as follows:

1. The Senate version would protect firms which join together to form export trading companies or associations from uncertainty regarding the legality of their actions under the antitrust laws by giving the Commerce Department the principal role in certifying them as exempt from antitrust action. The House version, on the other hand, would give this role to the Justice Department. Since the principal purpose of this legislation is to promote export activity of U.S. firms, we think the Commerce Department should have the lead role as provided in the Senate version. Justice Department responsibility for enforcing the antitrust laws appears to be adequately protected under this version by the provisions for prior consultation with the Justice Department and for court action wherein the Justice Department can contest the certification.

2. In the Senate bill, the certification protects against all civil and criminal antitrust liability so long as the companies involved abide by the terms of the certificate, while the House bill protects against only criminal and civil treble-damage liability; civil single-damage and injunctive liability remain. Since the purpose of the whole certification process is to provide protection from antitrust action for specified export activities, it would not be desirable to take back some of this protection, as the House bill would do.

We would be grateful for your support during conference on these two antitrust provisions in the Senate bill, and we hope that you will support prompt conference action on this legislation.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL MONRONEY.●

AMERICAN EAGLE GOLD COIN ACT OF 1982

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, I wish to commend my colleague, Senator SCHMITT, for his introduction of S. 2330, the American Eagle Gold Coin Act of 1982. I am proud to be a cosponsor of this legislation.

S. 2330 implements the recommendations made last February by the U.S. Gold Commission, which included such distinguished members as Treasury Secretary Regan and Murray Weidenbaum, then Chairman of the President's Council of Econmic Advisers. The bill provides for the minting of a series of American gold coins, to be known as American Eagles, which would be comparable to the gold coins currently minted by other nations. These coins would not be legal tender, but could be used for the payment of private debts.

Whatever one's position may be on the gold standard—and I realize that there is a great deal to be said on both sides of that issue—it is difficult to see how anyone could oppose something as sensible as the measure offered by my good friend from New Mexico. We presently import 3 million Krugerrands a year from South Africa, to the detriment of our international balance of payments. Since the purchase or sale of American Eagles would not be taxable, there would be no reason for Americans to buy gold coins from foreign sources.

Earlier this year, the Treasury Department estimated that Americans would buy 20 million ounces worth of these coins during the first year of issue, simultaneously reducing the 1983 budget deficit by $7.5 billion and improving America's balance of payments by as much as $5 billion. This estimate was made when the price of gold was $375 an ounce. As we know, the yellow metal has since hit the $500 mark, so these figures would likely be even higher if S. 2330 soon becomes law.

Mr. President, the right to purchase gold allows a people to cast a daily vote of confidence for or against the fiscal integrity of their government. As such, it is a moral check on inflationary spending policies even where there is no official gold standard.

The American people recovered their right to own gold in 1973 after a suspension of 39 years. This right will not be easily wrested from them again. The Federal Government, which has vast gold reserves, can use them to reduce the deficit and improve our balance of payments, or it can perversely sit back while our people send billions of dollars abroad to buy the gold coins of other lands. I sincerely hope that we will choose the wise and obvious course. I urge prompt passage of S. 2330.●

QUORUM CALL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 1:50 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I observe that the clock has reached the hour of 12 noon, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will stand in recess until 1:50 p.m. today.

Thereupon, at 12 noon, the Senate recessed until 1:50 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. ANDREWS).

TEMPORARY INCREASE IN THE PUBLIC DEBT LIMIT

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 520).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Oregon may yield to me without losing his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is now 1:50 p.m., and under the order previously entered, as the Chair correctly pointed out, the Senator from Oregon is recognized.

At 2 p.m. we will have a cloture vote pursuant to the provisions of rule XXII on the limitation of further debate on the Helms second degree amendment.

It is expected that the Senate will be in session on that matter through the remainder of the afternoon looking to an adjournment time or recess time of 5 or 6 p.m.

Mr. President, If this cloture vote does not prevail, and I make no prediction one way or another in that respect, Members should be on notice that another cloture motion will be filed and there will be another vote as soon as it is eligible under the provisions of the rule.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, is it the intention of the leader to file a motion today or tomorrow?

Mr. BAKER. Yes. It will be filed today. It is my intention to do that.

Mr. PACKWOOD. And vote on it then on Monday?

Mr. BAKER. On Monday.

I may also say, since I see the Senator from North Carolina is in the Chamber, that if we can arrange it after this cloture vote, whether cloture succeeds or fails, I wish to take a brief moment to consult with the Senator from Oregon, the Senator from North Carolina, the Senator from Connecticut and perhaps others who are principally involved in this debate so we can try to make an orderly arrangement for the procedure to follow.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

AMENDMENT NO. 2040

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, as the Senate is aware, we are at the moment discussing the Baucus amendment relating to court jurisdiction, although at 2 p.m., we will vote on the motion of cloture to terminate debate on the so-called Helms second-degree amendment which relates to abortion and that amendment is, of course, an effort to reverse by statute rather than by constitutional amendment the Supreme Court decision in the case of Roe against Wade which was the decision that allowed a woman to make a decision for herself as to whether or not she wanted an abortion.

Roe against Wade is a decision of the Supreme Court which says that women have a constitutional right to make a decision for themselves whether or not they want to have an abortion. They do not have to have one. But the Court says that the Government may not take away from them the right to make a decision as to whether or not they want to choose to have one. And that is an important distinction.

We are trying to leave the choice to the woman, not to the Government, as to whether or not she wants to have an abortion.

The ramifications, however, of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, my distinguished friend, Senator HELMS, go much beyond the subject of abortion, per se, because what this amendment endeavors to do and the amendment to which it is attached, the school prayer amendment, is to take away from the Supreme Court the right to make constitutional decisions by simply reversing them by statute.

Heaven knows, the Supreme Court has, in its history, made decisions at one time or another that probably every Member of this Senate disagrees with—not all of us disagreeing with the same decisions—but there are many decisions we do not agree with. And in our history, the Supreme Court has made on occasion decisions that so aggrieved the public, Congress, and the States that constitutional amendments were passed to overturn the Supreme Court decisions.

We did it with the 11th amendment, which resulted out of the case of Chisolm against Georgia. Chisolm was a citizen of another State. Chisolm sued the State of Georgia alleging that Georgia owed him some money. This so offended the Congress of that day and the States of that day that they offered the 11th amendment which would prohibit a citizen of one State from suing another State, and that amendment was adopted.

Then we adopted the Civil War amendments—the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments—all of which in one way or another were designed to overturn the Dred Scott decision which said that blacks were not citizens of the United States with all of the concomitant rights thereto.

It is interesting to note that even in the passion of the Civil War and the sentiment of the Civil War, which was probably the most divisive moment in this Nation's history, even at that time, we did not try to overturn the Supreme Court's decisions on the Constitution with a statute. We went the route of a constitutional amendment.

We did it again with the 16th amendment. Congress had passed a law levying an income tax. The Supreme Court held that that law was unconstitutional, that under the Constitution, as then written, Congress did not have the power to levy an income tax, and, consequently, the 16th amendment was passed, which allowed Congress to levy an income tax. And it is interesting to note that while there were several statements and thoughts after the Supreme Court decision about trying to reverse the Supreme Court by statute, the effort was not made, and we did it with a constitutional amendment.

We did it most recently with the 18-year-old vote. Congress passed a law saying that 18-year-olds could vote in Federal and State elections. The Supreme Court held that, while Congress had the power to direct 18-year-olds to vote in Federal elections, we did not have that power as far as State elections were concerned. So the 26th amendment was offered and passed, extending the 18-year-old vote in all elections.

In each of those four cases, a constitutional amendment, which is the proper route, was used to overturn a constitutional decision of the Supreme Court.

At a future time in this Congress, the majority leader has assured us that we will have a chance to consider the Hatch amendment to the Constitution. The Hatch amendment is a constitutional amendment to reverse the Supreme Court decision allowing women to have the right to choose.

I do not agree with his amendment, and indeed I will fight it and argue against it, but at least he is pursuing the proper method, and when we get to that debate, we will be debating the substance and the issue of whether or not a woman should have a right to choose, or whether we should take that away by a constitutional amendment and send it out to the States.

But none of that are we debating today. Today, we are debating whether or not we are going to overturn almost 200 years of American history, and certainly overturn all of the history since Marbury against Madison, in 1803, that said that the final arbiter of what the Constitution says is the U.S. Supreme Court.

We do not have to like it. We do not have to agree with it. But short of revolution in the present form of Government we have, someone has to be the final arbiter of what the Constitution means, and that final arbiter is the U.S. Supreme Court, unless it is reversed by a constitutional amendment in accordance with the Constitution.

To undertake the avenue the Senator from North Carolina suggests is to say that henceforth, Congress, not the Supreme Court, will be the final arbiter of what the Constitution says, and if we, in Congress, do not like what the Court says about the Constitution, by a majority vote in each House, 51 votes here in the Senate and 218 votes in the House of Representatives, we can overturn that.

I do not have to warn Members of this body what that portends for our form of Government.

Robert Bork, now on the court of appeals but before appointment to the court a well-known constitutional scholar, a conservative constitutional scholar, one who is opposed to the Supreme Court decision in Roe against Wade, testified before the Judiciary Committee that even though he thought Roe against Wade was not only wrong but he thought it was unconstitutional——

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 p.m. having arrived under the previous order the clerk will state the motion to invoke cloture.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on amendment number 2038 to amendment number 2031, as modified, to the committee substitute to House Joint Resolution 520, a joint resolution to provide for a temporary increase in the public debt limit.

Howard Baker, Jesse Helms, Rogers Jepsen, Jeremiah Denton, Paul Laxalt, Paula Hawkins, Orrin G. Hatch, Bob Kasten, Don Nickles, Nancy Landon Kassebaum, John P. East, Steven Symms, Strom Thurmond, Charles E. Grassley, Edward Zorinsky, Jake Garn, James Abdnor, Robert Dole.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I am now taking this occasion to rise and announce that I will vote to invoke cloture on the Helms amendment, but that I cannot support the substance of the amendment itself and, when the Senate moves to final passage, will cast my vote against the amendment.

I have chosen to follow this course for a number of reasons:

As I said during Judiciary Committee consideration of the proposed Hatch amendment, I believe we should have a debate on this issue on the Senate floor and we should vote on it—up or down.

None of us enjoys being put in this position. As the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has said on a number of occasions, we need a modern day King Solomon to resolve the issue for us. Unfortunately, no such person exists and popular dissatisfaction with the Supreme Court decision has forced this issue upon us. It will not go away if we choose to ignore it.

So I will vote to invoke cloture, giving the Senate the opportunity to work its will on this issue so that we can then get back to the many urgent legislative matters at hand which require our prompt attention.

I will, however, vote against the Helms amendment on final passage. While I still oppose the use of Federal funds to pay for abortions and will continue to vote for the so-called Hyde amendment in the future, I believe the measure before us goes well beyond the scope of Hyde.

First of all, I am troubled by the section prohibiting the use of Federal funds for research and training in abortion techniques. While I have no formal medical training, I am aware that a number of techniques, such as curretage, used in abortions are also essential to the treatment of other problems not directly related to abortions. My worry is further extended because, while the measure allows federally funded abortions to save the life of the mother, these provisions would severely limit the availability of trained and skilled surgeons in such life threatening instances.

This is to say nothing of the effect these provisions could possibly have on various forms of research that have given us greater insight into the miracle of fetal development.

I am further concerned about the prohibition on the use of Federal funds for abortion referrals. Senator HATFIELD recognized this problem in his own abortion funding measure after discovering that recent Federal court decisions in Arizona and North Dakota call into question the constitutionality of restrictions on such referrals. According to these decisions, if the prohibition of "referral" is interpreted as interfering with the counseling relationship of doctor and patient, the statute may be an infringement of first amendment rights.

Although I have not studied the effect of Senator HATFIELD's solution of changing the word "refer" to "promote," I cannot support a prohibition on referrals as embodied in the pending amendment.

I am also concerned about the section prohibiting health plans serving Federal employees from offering abortion coverage. I am not certain we should be in the business of making that kind of decision.

Most important, however, is the finding declaring that "scientific evidence demonstrates the life of each human being begins at conception." Regardless of my personal views on the matter, I cannot agree that the evidence is quite that clear and that we should make such a declaration.

The hearings on the so-called human life bill" demonstrated that no such consensus exists. I do not believe the Congress should sit back and pick a particular theory and declare it transformed automatically into reality. We are not competent to make that determination.

Now I do realize that this language appears in the "findings" section, not in the actual body of the measure, and therefore does not have legal weight. Findings do, however, form part of the legislative history through which a particular bill is enacted and could quite possibly be used in a court of law as clear evidence of congressional intent. This language, therefore, could have greater legal consequence than might be apparent at the present time.

I do not take these positions lightly. I realize that people on both sides of this issue will be disappointed in my stand. But I have given the matter a great deal of thought. Let us move to a final vote, let each Senator cast his or her ballot, and let us move on to the other important issues facing us on our legislative agenda.

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am voting to invoke cloture.

This issue has been debated at length, both on this bill and in other forms. Senators clearly know the arguments, pro and con. We have 3 weeks left in this congressional session, and it is simply irresponsible to tie up the Senate on this matter any further.

I do, however, have serious problems with the Helms amendment. I have, and remain, opposed to Federal funding of abortions. But I cannot support some of the restrictions in this amendment. For instance, when the life of a mother is in jeopardy, I believe medical personnel must have the ability to perform a life-saving operation. The Helms amendment would not allow this.

Mr. President, I also must add that I remain committed to school prayer legislation. I have been a long-term supporter of these measures, and I hope the Congress can enact legislation to permit voluntary, nondenominational school prayer as soon as possible.●

VOTE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the quorum call has been waived.

The question is, Is it the sense of the Senate that debate on the Helms amendment numbered 2038 shall be brought to a close? The yeas and nays are mandatory under the rule.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Kansas (Mrs. KASSEBAUM), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE), the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. SCHMITT), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) and the Senator from Kansas (Mrs. KASSEBAUM) would each vote "yea."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA), and the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA) would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRADY). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 41, nays 47, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 41, the nays are 47. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn not having voted in the affirmative, the motion is not agreed to.

Mr. BAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if I could have the attention of the Senate for a moment. I have cleared this request with the principals involved in this debate. It is agreeable. I hope there will not be an objection to it.

In a moment, I intend to suggest the absence of a quorum to gain a little time so that the principals on each side of this controversy can gather together and we can see where we are and where we are going next.

But, in the meantime, I ask unanimous consent that, when I yield the floor, the Senator from Oregon may be recognized after the calling off or completion of the quorum, which I am about to suggest, for the purpose of continuing the debate on this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, let me say that it is my intention today to file another cloture motion. I will consult with the minority leader on that before I make any further requests as to the time for a vote. I would expect that we will continue to debate this measure today.

I may say, for the benefit of the Senate, I do not now know what the prospects are for the Senate dealing with the veto message. The House of Representatives will vote on the President's veto message, I am told, between 3 and 4 o'clock this afternoon. If it is sustained, then, presumably, there will be a new supplemental appropriations bill that we must deal with. If it is not sustained, then, of course, we must deal with the veto message.

So Senators should not assume that tomorrow will be a voteless day. It very well may be a busy day, either on debate on this matter or perhaps on the supplemental appropriations veto message or another supplemental appropriations bill.

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield, without losing my right to the floor, to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Is it the majority leader's intention to have another cloture vote at sometime Monday?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, that is my present intention.

Mr. BUMPERS. Could the majority leader give us any idea as to between what hours?

Mr. BAKER. No. I have talked in a preliminary way to the minority leader about that. I am trying to adjust that time so it meets the convenience of most Senators on both sides, but I will have an announcement to make about that at a little later time.

Mr. BUMPERS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BAKER. If no other Senator seeks recognition, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair, in his capacity as a Senator from New Jersey, objects to rescinding the quorum call. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Illinois without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROPOSAL TO AMEND ADMINISTRATION'S ENERGY REORGANIZATION LEGISLATION

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I wish to introduce today an amendment to be offered by Senator COHEN and myself during the Governmental Affairs Committee consideration of the Federal Energy Reorganization Act of 1982 (S. 2562). We believe this amendment will provide greater balance in the proposed reorganization between nuclear and all other energy resources, including conservation, while underlining the continued importance of energy to national affairs.

There are some clear advantages to the merger of energy functions with business and trade functions as proposed by the administration. However, this merger must not abandon the national consensus for a balanced energy policy and a strong commitment to energy R. & D. As currently proposed, the organization places too much emphasis on developing nuclear power at the expense of other energy sources such as coal, oil, gas, solar, biomass, and conservation.

Although my own State of Illinois has been in the forefront of nuclear development, it would be foolish to tie our future to just one energy source, whether it be nuclear energy or anything else. Illinois vast coal resources must be developed in an environmentally sound manner. Our State's rising alcohol fuel industry has increasing potential to contribute to our fuel transportation needs. Conservation is also very important to our State. A shift to more efficient facilities and equipment can help Illinois energy intensive industries compete on world markets, while weatherization can help Illinois homeowners cope with rising fuel costs. Similar opportunities exist to take advantage of indigenous resources and conservation across the country. For example, in Senator COHEN's State of Maine, there has been a dramatic shift to the use of wood over the last few years, as well as a strong emphasis on weatherizing homes.

Yet, under the current bill, there would be four Assistant Secretaries with primarily nuclear-related functions, but only one catch-all Assistant Secretary for all other resources, including conservation. In essence, almost all nuclear functions have been enhanced from their organizational status, while conservation, solar, coal, oil, and gas have been reduced in status.

Our amendment would correct this imbalance by establishing a separate Assistant Secretary for Conservation and Renewable Energy and a separate Assistant Secretary for Fossil Energy, as there is currently at the Department of Energy. In addition, instead of raising the present Office of Basic Research to an Assistant Secretary level, we would merge this position with the proposed Assistant Secretary for Nuclear Energy, keeping the total number of Assistant Secretaries the same.

This structure will more accurately reflect the budget priorities for energy spelled out in the budget resolutions adopted by Congress in the past 2 years, and I am hopeful that Congress will once again reaffirm its commitment to a balanced energy future during this year's appropriations process.

The need for a diversified energy future becomes even more essential in light of growing concern about the spread of nuclear weapons to countries that do not already have them. The epidemic spread of nuclear technology, equipment, and fuel to unfriendly countries or terrorists who may use them against us is one of the greatest security threats facing our Nation. The security aspects of nonproliferation must therefore be reflected in any new energy organization. Our amendment would clearly assign this responsibility to an Assistant Secretary for Non-Proliferation and Security Affairs, labeled the Assistant Secretary for Security Affairs in the current administration proposal under the Deputy Secretary for Defense. This would upgrade the status of nuclear nonproliferation. It would also avoid the possible conflict of interest inherent in having the Deputy Secretary for Energy take on this responsibility while simultaneously being responsible for the entire domestic nuclear energy budget.

Our amendment would also change the title of the reorganized agency to the Department of Energy and Commerce. This would underline that the transfer of energy functions, as the administration has repeatedly stated, is not a "dismantlement" but a "merger" and would demonstrate the increased stature of the merged Department. This change in title would guarantee that energy issues are still given the Cabinet-level attention they deserve, while assuring our friends abroad that we would not be abandoning our international energy responsibilities. In addition, this title more accurately reflects funding levels for energy functions which remain significantly higher than commerce-related function.

Finally the amendment would provide for a more smooth transition of specific energy functions. One of the primary problems which has plagued the Department of Energy since its creation has been repeated internal reorganizations. This has been particularly striking in the conservation and renewable area. A recent GAO report has shown the severe damage inflicted on the conservation and renewable programs from an internal reorganization last fall. Our amendment would tighten the proposed legislative language to minimize program disruptions during the transition period.

On September 15, I shall chair a hearing of the Governmental Affairs Committee on the energy reorganization bill, during which the committee will take a more indepth look at how we can amend the current bill to make it a better balanced and more acceptable proposal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of the proposed amendment.

There being no objection, the text of the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague from Illinois, Senator PERCY, in offering an amendment to S. 2562, the Federal Energy Reorganization Act of 1982, which was introduced at the request of the President.

When the President announced his plans to reorganize Federal energy functions, I had some skepticism. Still, I was careful to keep an open mind until the legislative proposal had been submitted to Congress and I had an opportunity to fully review it.

Now that I have studied S. 2562, and participated in the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee's first two hearings on the bill, I must say that many of my original concerns remain. The amendment Senator PERCY and I are introducing today addresses many of these concerns.

At the outset, I would like to point out that despite the current oil glut, our Nation's energy crisis has not come to an end. The glut we are experiencing has been caused by a prolonged international recession, increased conservation efforts, depletion of larger than normal reserves, and OPEC production levels exceeding the organization's approach targets. This oil surplus could end at any time because of supply disruptions, inventory buildup, or an expanding world economy.

One year ago, President Reagan announced in a national address on economic policy that he would soon propose the dismantling of the Department of Energy. He would do so, he said, because "we do not need an Energy Department to solve our basic energy problem. As long as we let the forces of the marketplace work without undue interference, the ingenuity of consumers, business, producers, and inventors will do that for us."

I agree with the administration that the private sector will prove much more efficient in distributing energy supplies throughout the country and in determining which energy technologies are worthy of investment. However, I have two major objections to the way in which the administration's free market energy policy is being carried out.

First, the administration is proposing that we abandon many federally supported technologies which are unable to compete in today's market, but which could prove to be valuable contributors to our Nation's energy mix in the years ahead. Second, the administration has drawn an exception for the nuclear industry by arguing that "the marketplace will encourage people to use solar energy on their own, but the nuclear industry is weak and requires a Government presence to put it on a stronger footing."

These policies are reflected in the administration budget request for fiscal year 1983, which proposes major spending reductions in all nonnuclear energy resources. It is also made clear in the reorganization proposal, which establishes one Assistant Secretary for all nonnuclear energy resources, while creating three Assistant Secretary positions and one Director for all nuclear-related functions.

This stands in sharp contrast to the present structure of the Department of Energy. The Department today has a separate Assistant Secretary for each of the following resources: nuclear, fossil fuels, and conservation and renewables. Without a balanced energy policy encourages the development of a variety of energy technologies, we will be seriously limiting the number of alternatives available to us in the future.

The amendment Senator PERCY and I are introducing today would correct this imbalance by establishing a separate Assistant Secretary for Conservation and Renewable Energy and a separate Assistant Secretary for Fossil Fuels. In addition, rather than raising the present Office of Basic Research to an Assistant Secretary level, as proposed in the legislation, our amendment would merge this position with the Assistant Secretary for Nuclear Energy. Restoring balance to the organizational structure of Federal energy programs will more accurately reflect the will of Congress, which has consistently supported alternative energy resources, including conservation.

Our amendment would also change the name of the reorganized agency to the Department of Energy and Commerce. This would alleviate the concerns of those who fear that abolition of the Department of Energy means the abandoning of a national energy policy.

By including "Energy" in the title of the newly organized Department, we are sending a signal both home and abroad that we remain committed to resolving our Nation's energy problems and that we will continue to meet our International Energy Agency obligations. Since the proposed reorganization calls for transferring the majority of Federal energy programs to Commerce, rather than eliminating them, the title change more accurately reflects the activities of the new Department.

The reorganization proposal places all Federal nuclear programs—civilian and military research and development, as well as promotion of nuclear exports—in the Department of Commerce. There is a potential conflict of interest in the Department between its responsibility for promoting nuclear sales abroad and its responsibility for controlling the spread of nuclear weapons. Yet, the reorganization proposal fails to assign a top-level person within the Department to be in charge of nuclear nonproliferation policy.

Our amendment would assign this responsibility to the proposed Assistant Secretary of Security Affairs. It would also change the title of this position to the Assistant Secretary for Nuclear Nonproliferation and Security Affairs. Upgrading this to an Assistant Secretary position will make clear to our partners in the International Atomic Energy Agency that we attach great importance to the problem of nuclear proliferation.

Since its establishment in 1977, the Department of Energy has undergone several internal reorganizations. These culminated in several reductions in force (RIF's) when the new administration took office in 1981. The General Accounting Office (GAO) has just completed a study of the reductions in force for the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Conservation and Renewable Energy, and its findings are quite disturbing.

In particular, the GAO has concluded that the Office will face great difficulty in carrying out mandated programs. Another GAO report on the reorganization proposal said that the administration has not performed the necessary planning to provide for a smooth transition of energy programs. Our amendment includes provisions that, we believe, are necessary for that orderly transition.

The Senate Governmental Affairs Committee will be holding its third hearing on S. 2565, the Energy Reorganization Act of 1982, on Wednesday, September 15. The focus of the hearing will be on the need for a balanced Federal energy policy.

I firmly believe that a strong Federal role is needed to assert long-term leadership and direction toward development of a variety of energy resources since that effort is not forthcoming from the private sector. I look forward to discussing this further in Wednesday's hearing, and I urge my colleagues to consider these amendments and other possible changes to S. 2562 that will make it more acceptable.●

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when we again ask for a quorum call, when the quorum call is terminated, I again be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, pursuant to Public Law 84-689, appoints the following Senators as delegates to the North Atlantic Assembly meeting to be held in London, United Kingdom, November 14-19, 1982: the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), chairman; the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER); the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY); the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS); the Senator from Delaware (Mr. ROTH); the Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE); the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. ANDREWS); the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY); the Senator from Alaska (Mr. MURKOWSKI); the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER); the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), vice chairman; the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON); the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS); the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON); the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN); and the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN).

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may yield to me without losing his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the interruption in his presentation not be counted as an additional speech for the purposes of rule XXII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator means rule XIX?

Mr. BAKER. Rule XIX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INCREASE IN THE PUBLIC DEBT LIMIT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I report to my colleagues that we have just concluded a meeting between the principals involved in this debate looking to the possibility of an arrangement to dispose of the issues before the Senate. I regret to report that we have not reached an agreement on how that could be done, although I also report that the parties at that meeting, which included the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. NICKLES), the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS), the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) discussed the matter freely and fully and I believe in good faith.

Notwithstanding, Mr. President, I think certainly some progress was made. For instance, the principals involved will agree, and shortly I will propound a unanimous-consent request to this effect, that for the remainder of today and tomorrow and Monday no tabling motion would be in order against this measure or any amendment to this measure, this measure being the debt limit bill, or any amendments to it. The pending amendment is the Baucus amendment.

The reason for that, Mr. President—I do not now propound the request—is so that we may facilitate real and meaningful debate on these issues and not simply the utilization of time available to Senators and a feeling on the part of some of the parties that they must maintain control of the floor in order to avoid such a tabling motion.

I believe it would be wise to enter into that agreement, and I hope Senators will not object to it. It may be that everybody said everything they wanted to say on this subject, but Mr. President, I am on record for more than a year and a half saying at a time mutually agreeable to the parties and on a suitable vehicle we will have a full and fair and freestanding debate on abortion, on busing, and on other matters of a similar and sensitive nature. I believe that the quality of that debate will be substantially improved if we remove the danger of a tabling motion and parties could yield and interact more freely and more in the nature of worthwhile debate.

I will shortly file a cloture motion against the Helms second degree amendment identical in form to the cloture motion filed previously which would produce a vote on Monday under the provisions of rule XXII.

Shortly I will ask unanimous consent that the mandatory quorum under rule XXII be dispensed with, that the vote under rule XXII be dispensed with, and that the vote under the provisions of that rule occur at 5 p.m. on Monday.

Mr. President, I do not now make that request, but I will do so shortly.

Now, it is my hope that in the course of the debate on the floor during the remainder of this day and tomorrow and prior to the cloture vote on Monday we can arrive at a satisfactory arrangement for the final disposition of the amendment now pending, other amendments, and hopefully of the bill itself.

However, as I indicated to the principals in conference in my office, at some point we have to conclude this matter. I am not going to rush it. I want every Senator to have a full opportunity to discuss it.

But the debt limit bill is an essential piece of legislation and it must be passed. If we are to adjourn sine die or to even recess on October 2 or thereabouts, then we only have a few days left in which to do that, and there are other important matters, not the least of which is the entire appropriation sequence, that must be dealt with in that period of time.

So, Mr. President, having outlined that proposal and now to reiterate as briefly as I can, in a moment I am going to suggest the absence of a quorum so that our cloakroom can initiate a hotline notification to Republican Members to see if there is any objection to that request, and I hope that the minority leader might be willing to consider it during that period.

To summarize, Mr. President, when the quorum is called off, I will ask unanimous consent that no tabling motion shall be in order to this bill or any amendment thereto during the remainder of this day or during the session today, on Friday or Monday. I will further ask unanimous consent that the vote on the cloture motion, which I will file shortly, occur at 5 p.m. on Monday next without the requirement for a mandatory quorum under the provisions of rule XXII.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, if there is an objection to this request, that after the entering of that objection the Chair then recognize once more the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDNG OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the request I made prior to the suggestion of the previous call for the quorum apply with full effect after the transaction of the business to be proposed by the Senator from Florida—that is to say, if there is an objection to the unanimous-consent request I will present shortly, the Senator from Oregon be recognized at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF THE RED SHIELD OF DAVID OF THE MAGEN DAVID ADOM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is a measure that I believe has been cleared on both sides of the aisle for action by unanimous consent. It is Calendar No. 768, Senate Resolution 367, to be offered by Senator HAWKINS.

I inquire of the minority leader if he is prepared now to consider that matter.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, that matter has been cleared on this side.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 768, Senate Resolution 367, for not to exceed 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 367) expressing the sense of the Senate with respect to recognition of the Red Shield of David of the Magen David Adom by the International Committee of the Red Cross.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert the following:

That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) the International Committee of the Red Cross, together with the League of Red Cross Societies, should take steps to support the recognition of the Red Shield of David of the Magen David Adom Society of Israel; and

(2) the League of Red Cross Societies should formally recognize the Red Shield of David of the Magen David Adom Society of Israel so that Magen David Adom may become a member in good standing of the League.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the International Committee of the Red Cross and to the Secretary General of the League of Red Cross Societies.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I rise to speak in support of a resolution I submitted on April 20, 1982, concerning international recognition of the Magen David Adom Society of Israel, which is the Israel equivalent of the American Red Cross.

Mr. President, the Magen David Adom Society of Israel has honored Senator DODD and me by conferring on both of us the position of cochairman of the U.S. Committee To Secure Recognition of the Red Shield of David by the League of Red Cross Societies. The problem of international recognition of Magen David Adom has existed since its foundation in 1948. The issue is the inclusion of the Red Shield of David among those emblems currently in use and sactioned by governments under the Geneva Convention. This is an extremely important issue. This would extend the same protection to Israeli doctors, corps people, and nurses who are attending battle casualties as is currently afforded to people working under the sign of the red cross or the red crescent. Magen David Adom, however, has been denied recognition because it does not fulfill one of the 10 requirements for recognition. This single requirement is that the society use the "title and emblem of the Red Cross (Red Crescent, Red Lion and Sun) in conformity with the Geneva Conventions."

The official emblem of the Magen David Adom Society of Israel is the Red Shield of David. The League of Red Cross Societies and the International Committee of the Red Cross, however, do not sanction this emblem—and action that has prevented Magen David Adom from obtaining the international recognition that it clearly deserves. There is no universal emblem for recognition under the rules governing emblems. Moslem countries are allowed to use the Red Crescent emblem, and Iran previously used the emblem of the Red Lion and Sun, although the Iranian national society has since dropped the use of this emblem.

The Magen David Adom Society of Israel does not desire recognition because of political considerations but out of a wish for the means to continue its humanitarian work in times of international conflict. Currently, all signatories to the Geneva Convention have agreed, in times of conflict, to recognize as protective symbols those emblems mentioned under the applicable rule. Since the Red Shield of David is not recognized, it is not afforded proper protection as are recognized societies.

The American Red Cross has been extremely vocal and visible in its support of Magen David Adom's efforts to secure recognition by the League of Red Cross Societies. On November 17, 1981, at a meeting of the General Assembly of the League of Red Cross Societies held in Manila, the American Red Cross expressed deep disappointment about a decision to discontinue the work of a group investigating the problems surrounding recognized emblems. The following is an excerpt from the statement on the American Red Cross delegation present at the Manila conference:

The American Red Cross is deeply disappointed at this decision. It reiterates its conviction that the Magen David Adom is an exceptionally strong society fully qualified in every way for full recognition and equal status with Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies. It deplores the fact that the technical matter of the emblem denies Magen David Adom such recognition and status and that studies on possibilities of resolving emblem issues are not to be continued.

This statement by the American Red Cross delegation at the conference in Manila is a tribute to the humanitarian work performed by Magen David Adom. The society's dedication to humanitarian care is exemplary. During the recent conflict in Lebanon, Magen David Adom has been in southern Lebanon providing medical care, clothing, blankets, and other assistance to Lebanese civilians caught up in this conflict. I believe it is a tragedy that the Magen David Adom Society of Israel does not receive the recognition it deserves for its humanitarian efforts.

My resolution, as modified by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, calls on the International Committee of the Red Cross to take steps to support the recognition of the Red Shield of David. It calls on the League of Red Cross Societies to recognize formally the Red Shield of David. I believe expressing that it is the sense of the Senate that the Magen David Adom Society of Israel deserves full recognition will encourage these institutions to resolve this problem favorably. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this measure so that steps may be taken to afford the Magen David Adom Society of Israel the recognition it deserves for its contribution to the cause of humanitarianism.

Finally, Mr. President, I should like to express my gratitude to the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Senator PERCY, and the fine staff of the committee for the contributions they have made to this effort. The committee amended some of the language in the original resolution to strengthen and clarify its intent without changing the spirit of the appeal. The resolution before us today is a better resolution thanks to the diligence and ability of Senator

PERCY and his committee, and I thank him.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join Senators HAWKINS and DODD, the chief sponsors of Senate Resolution 367, in supporting this sense-of-the-Senate resolution. It is far past time that the League of Red Cross Societies recognize the Red Shield of David of the Israeli Magen David Adom and grant it full recognition as a member in good standing of the league.

The Israeli Magen David Adom has been excluded because its symbol—the Red Shield of David—is not included among the three symbols formally recognized by the XVIIth International Red Cross Conference of 1948. This exclusion is arbitrary and unwarranted. Therefore, this resolution, as amended, urges the League of Red Cross Societies to formally recognize the Israeli society and urges the International Committee of the Red Cross to use its considerable respect and influence to correct this unfortunate situation.

The Magen David Adom is Israel's major emergency medical service, providing assistance regardless of race, religion or ethnic background. It also provides disaster service, blood services, ambulance services, and other hunamitarian assistance. It is greatly respected by its counterpart medical service in the United States, the American Red Cross. The American Red Cross has given its strong support to the drive for formal recognition of the Magen David Adom.

The point of the resolution is this: In times of conflict, those national societies which are formally recognized by the League of Red Cross Societies gain additional legal protection. Parties to the Geneva Conventions are obliged not to interfere in the work of these emergency medical service organizations. Therefore, formal recognition of the Magen David Adom by the League of Red Cross Societies would provide added protection to the brave and dedicated people who work for Magen David Adom. They deserve that protection.

I am proud to be a cosponsor of this resolution, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, with several major armed conflicts being fought on the globe at any given time, and savage terrorist acts shocking us every other day, one wonders what is left of what we so proudly call our civilized age. What is still beyond the reach of savagery?

One institution that we would hope can transcend nationalistic, ethnic, religious hatred is the International Red Cross system. It is recognized in the East and the West, the North and the South, in the global sense, as being a genuine humanitarian institution with no stain of political, religious or any other bias.

This noble and pure character of the International Red Cross system, which is its very essence and moral capital would be endangered by the refusal to recognize the Magen David Adom with its symbol, the Red Shield of David as part of the International Red Cross system.

Since its foundation, Magen David Adom functions in the noblest tradition of the Red Cross system, providing energency medical, ambulance and disaster services regardless of the nationality or race of the victims.

However one assesses the origins and outcome of the recent Lebanon conflict, there can be no doubt that Magen David Adom's performance measured up to the highest standards of the Red Cross movement.

The Red Cross is a religious symbol of Christianity in its origin. When the first Moslem countries joined the Red Cross system, it justifiably allowed them to use an alternate symbol, the red crescent, in accordance with their own religious tradition.

There can be no other reason but political or religious bias to deny the same recognition from another alternate symbol, that of the Jewish faith. Denial of recognition would seriously erode the International Red Cross' moral foundation which is its most precious asset.

I strongly urge my colleagues to approve this resolution.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I rise in support of Senate Resolution 367. Senate Resolution 367 calls upon the League of Red Cross Societies to accord international recognition to the Red Shield of David which is the emblem of the Magen David Adom. Recognition of the Red Shield of David would allow the Magen David Adom to qualify for membership in the League of Red Cross Societies.

The Magen David Adom is the major emergency medical, disaster and humanitarian service organization in Israel. It is exceptionally strong and meets all but one requirement for membership in the League of Red Cross Societies. The one requirement the Magen David Adom does not meet is that it use either the red cross, the red crescent, or the now discontinued imperial Iranian red lion and sun as its emblem. This resolution urges the League of Red Cross Societies to include the Red Shield of David among the approved emblems.

Recognition of the Red Shield of David is a matter of considerable importance as recognized emblems are accorded protection in time of conflict under the Geneva Conventions. Given the tragic cycle of conflict in the Middle East it is vitally important that the emblem of the Magen David Adom have such international protection.

Passage of this resolution will put the Senate on record on a vital humanitarian issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The amendment to the preamble was agreed to.

The preamble, as amended, was agreed to.

The title was amended so as to read:

A resolution expressing the sense of the Senate with respect to the recognition of the Red Shield of David of the Magen David Adom Society of Israel by the League of Red Cross Societies.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

Whereas Magen David Adom is the major emergency, medical, blood, ambulance, disaster, and humanitarian service in Israel;

Whereas Magen David Adom performs services equivalent to those performed by other national Red Cross societies currently recognized as members in good standing of the League of Red Cross Societies;

Whereas Magen David Adom has been formally recognized by the American Red Cross as an exceptionally strong humanitarian organization fully qualified for formal recognition and equal status with other members of the League of Red Cross Societies;

Whereas Magen David Adom fulfills nine out of ten formal requirements for recognition under the terms of the XVII Internation Red Cross Conference held in Stockholm, Sweden, in 1948;

Whereas the one requirement that Magen David Adom does not fulfill is the rule that only Red Cross societies using the "title and emblem of the Red Cross (Red Crescent, Red Lion and Sun) in conformity with the Geneva Conventions," may be afforded full recognition;

Whereas Magen David Adom uses the Red Shield of David as its emblem and distinctive sign of the medical services of Israel's armed forces;

Whereas the Red Crescent is the recognized emblem of Red Cross societies in Moslem countries;

Whereas Magen David Adom wishes to claim the same formal recognition for its emblem as is afforded other Red Cross societies not using the Red Cross emblem as long as there is no uniform emblem agreed upon by the League of Red Cross Societies;

Whereas recognition of the Red Shield of David is vital so that parties to the Geneva Convention will recognize the Red Shield of David as a protective symbol in times of conflict;

Whereas the International Committee of the Red Cross enjoys considerable respect as a humanitarian organization of long standing and, from October 1977 until November 1981, constituted a working group with the League of Red Cross Societies to study all questions relating to emblems;

Whereas the International Committee of the Red Cross could have considerable influence on the granting of formal recognition to the Magen David Adom by the League of Red Cross Societies; and

portant step toward recognition of Magen David Adom by granting Magen David Adom observer status at the meeting of the Assembly held in Manila, the Philippines, in November 1981 and on other occasions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) the International Committee of the Red Cross, together with the League of Red Cross Societies, should take steps to support the recognition of the Red Shield of David of the Magen David Adom Society of Israel; and

(2) the League of Red Cross Societies should formally recognize the Red Shield of David of the Magen David Adom Society of Israel so that Magen David Adom may become a member in good standing of the League.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the International Committee of the Red Cross and to the Secretary General of the League of Red Cross Societies.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mrs. HAWKINS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). Is there objection? Hearing no objection, it is so ordered.

The majority leader may proceed.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the request I am about to put has been discussed extensively on both sides and I believe has been the subject of hot lines perhaps on both sides. I know it has on this side. It embraces a provision for dealing with the veto message as well as a cloture vote if the request is granted in response to the petition I am about to file.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that pursuant to a cloture motion I am about to file, which would mature under the provisions of rule XXII for a vote on Monday next, that that vote occur at 4 p.m. without the requirement for a mandatory quorum under the provisions of the rule and that the rollcall vote thereon be 30 minutes in length.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I shall not object. I merely wish to point out for the record that if an objection is interposed the cloture vote would occur in accordance with rule XXII, which would mean that it would occur 1 hour after the Senate convenes following a mandatory live quorum, so we have our choice. We can either vote in 1 hour following a mandatory live quorum on Monday or we can set the hour, which the majority leader is trying to do, and therefore there is no objection.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

We the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on amendment number 2038 to amendment number 2031, as modified, to the committee substitue to House Joint Resolution 520, a joint resolution to provide for a temporary increase in the public debt limit.

Jesse Helms, Roger W. Jepsen, Jeremiah Denton, Paul Laxalt, Paula Hawkins, Orrin G. Hatch, Bob Kasten, Don Nickles, Howard Baker, John P. East, Steve Symms, Strom Thurmond, Charles E. Grassley, Edward Zorinsky, Jake Garn, James Abdnor, and Bob Dole.

SENATE SCHEDULE

CONSIDERATION OF SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL ON FRIDAY

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, as Members are no doubt aware, the House of Representatives by the requisite constitutional majority has just passed the supplemental appropriations bill, objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. It is anticipated that the messenger from the House of Representatives will be seeking admission to this Chamber sometime in the morning. Senators should be on notice then that sometime tomorrow morning we will proceed to the consideration of the veto message.

Mr. President, I had hoped earlier to be able to make a unanimous-consent request that we limit the time for debate on this measure to 1 hour equally divided and provide that that debate will begin at 11 o'clock and conclude at 12 o'clock. For a variety of reasons, that does not appear to be a wise course of action at this time.

Let me say for the benefit of Senators, however, that I anticipate that the messenger will arrive in the Chamber about 11 o'clock barring unforeseen circumstances, and it is my hope that tomorrow, sometime shortly after or even prior to the time the messenger arrives from the House, we can negotiate a time limitation for debate on that measure. As I indicated earlier, it does not appear desirable to make that request at this time. Therefore, I will not, and say instead, that I anticipate the messenger from the House will arrive in the Senate Chamber tomorrow at approximately 11 a.m.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. When the majority leader propounds the unanimous-consent request for a time limitation, will he arrange for 20 minutes for the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I will be glad to consult with the minority leader on that point. I personally have no objection to that. Tomorrow when we address that issue I will certainly keep that in mind.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. If the Senator wants an hour's limitation, if he will make it an hour and 20 minutes, that will take care of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I am sure some arrangement can be worked out. As I say, it does not appear desirable to make that unanimous-consent request at this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes; I yield to the minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the majority leader has the floor. I merely ask the majority leader if in his judgment the vote will occur at around 12 to 12:30 p.m. tomorrow?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, indeed it will. I had hoped we could put down an order to vote on the veto message at 12 o'clock. It is still my anticipation that we will have that vote at 12 noon. There are certain circumstances that might intervene, but I think that is unlikely. In answer to the minority leader, the odds are heavily in favor of a vote at or very close to 12 noon tomorrow.

PROSPECTIVE CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. May I ask a further request of the majority leader? Does the majority leader foresee another cloture vote on the amendment by Mr. HELMS if the vote on the cloture motion fails on Monday?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President, I do. Whether or not that motion is filed tomorrow or is filed on Monday is a matter I have not yet addressed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I hope the majority leader will indulge me one further question, and I do not mean to be attempting to press him, but at some point in time, in view of the fact that we hope to go out October 2, I believe, the Senate is going to have to complete action on this debt limit bill, and the appropriation bills or a continuing resolution. What other measures are must measures before the Senate goes out on October 2?

MUST LEGISLATION PRIOR TO ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. In addition to the debt limit, which is a must item that we have to deal with one way or the other, I anticipate that the entire appropriations series must be dealt with in some way. As the minority leader has pointed out and as I have pointed out from time to time, we are now in the middle of September and we do not yet have a single regular appropriation bill. I must assume the House will send us something, and I therefore would include first on that list, after the debt limit, disposition of any appropriation bills that are available and a continuing resolution or resolutions as they may be necessary to cover the operations of the Government that are not covered by regular appropriation bills.

In addition to that, Mr. President, I anticipate that S. 995, the antitrust bill, will be called up by the leadership on this side as will the so-called crime package.

There are a number of other items, Mr. President, but those are the major items that occur to me at this moment.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The distinguished majority leader hopes to have some action on the constitutional amendment?

Mr. BAKER. Yes. I thank the Senator for reminding me of that.

Not only must we finish the debt limit bill, which carries the Helms abortion debate, among other things, but also, I am committed to reiterate my determination to have a debate on the Hatch constitutional amendment relating to abortion.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Does the distinguished majority leader agree with me in saying that at some point, if cloture motions on the amendment by Mr. HELMS fail to get the required number of votes, a cloture motion will in all likelihood be entered on the bill itself, so as to expedite action on the bill?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, that is a real possibility, among other possibilities. It might be possible, of course, to proceed in other ways to exit from this debate if it proves futile—that is, if it cannot be concluded by a vote on an amendment or on amendments. But it is my hope we can do that. It is my hope that we can dispose of the Helms amendment on its merits, as well as the Weicker and Baucus amendments and others.

To specifically answer the minority leader as to whether I would consider at some point filing a cloture motion on the bill itself, I think I would. I have not yet concluded that I will do that. I have discussed it with Mr. HELMS and Mr. PACKWOOD and others, so they are aware that that is a real possibility.

At some point, the Senate must discharge its responsibility by passing the debt limit bill. I am on record and firmly committed to a full and thorough debate on this measure—that is, on the measures involved in the abortion debate—and I do not intend to foreshorten that unduly and I do not intend to deprive other Senators from offering amendments to the debt limit bill which may be germane, within limits. At some point, we have to finish the measure.

Mr. President, I believe there is one other unanimous-consent request that has been cleared on this side which I hope might be agreeable to the minority leader and other Senators.

TABLING MOTION RESTRICTIONS

In order to expedite the debate on the Helms amendment and other issues—that is, abortion, prayer, and other sensitive matters—I ask unanimous consent that no tabling motion to the debt limit bill or any amendment thereto be in order for the remainder of this day, Friday, or Monday, prior to the conclusion of the cloture vote on Monday next.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, the request of the majority leader is that no tabling motion be in order with respect to the measure itself or to any amendments thereto on today or tomorrow or Monday, prior to the cloture vote. Am I correct?

Mr. BAKER. That is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is 5 o'clock, and this is a little earlier than I had planned to recess the Senate. But in view of the action of the House of Representatives in passing the supplemental appropriations bill over the President's veto, to be absolutely honest with my colleagues, I need a little time to figure out where we go next.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if there is no further matter to be dealt with urgently on this debate at this moment, I am going to ask unanimous consent for a time for the transaction of routine morning business.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend past 5:15 p.m., in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, tomorrow morning, it may be that the leadership will attempt to create a period for the transaction of routine morning business by unanimous consent. Because a number of other factors may intervene that will make time very tight in the morning if we are to finish consideration of the veto message by noon, I will not do that at this time. If there is an urgent need for morning business tomorrow, if Members will communicate that to me or to the minority leader, in the case of Senators on the other side of the aisle, I will be glad to take account of their requirements.

Tomorrow the Senate will convene at 10 a.m.

After the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, it is anticipated that there will perhaps be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

I further anticipate that the messenger from the House of Representatives carrying the action on the President's veto will arrive in the Chamber at or around 11 a.m. tomorrow. It is a matter of such privilege that it is automatically laid before the Senate when it is received and displaces the pending business. So we will be on that measure as soon as the messenger is admitted. I hope we can finish action on the veto message by noon tomorrow.

After the disposition of the veto message, we will resume consideration of the debt limit bill, at which time the Baucus amendment will be the pending question.

I remind Senators that there is now an order against a tabling motion against the bill or any amendment to the bill. Therefore, I assume that the proponents will want to relinquish the floor and engage in worthwhile debate. As I have said, everything has been said on this subject that can be said.

In any event, we will proceed tomorrow to the supplemental appropriation veto message, and after that, we will be back on the debt limit bill and the Baucus amendment.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATORS DIXON AND NUNN ON TOMORROW

Mr. President, I am advised that two Senators have requests for special orders tomorrow. I ask unanimous consent that after the recognition of the two leaders under the the standing order, the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) be recognized on special orders for not to exceed 15 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see no other Senator seeking recognition.

I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate now stand in recess until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 5:07 p.m. the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Friday, September 10, 1982, at 10 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

PORTS BACK MARITIME REGULATORY REFORM

HON. MIKE LOWRY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, various ports of America, large and small, speaking through their trade organization, the Association of American Port Authorities, are strongly supporting H.R. 4374, the maritime regulatory reform bill, which this House will consider next week.

Recently a paper was circulated which claimed that port cities would be damaged by the legislation. The Association of American Port Authorities has written an important response to that paper, and I have enclosed for the record that letter to provide the Members the opportunity of that input before the vote next week. The letter is addressed to the distinguished chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, who has been instrumental in bringing this important legislation to the floor.

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF PORT AUTHORITIES,
Washington, D.C., September 8, 1982.

Hon. WALTER B. JONES,
Chairman, House Merchant and Fisheries Committee, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am writing to share with you our analysis and reactions to the essay of the "Shipping Act of 1981 on American Port Cities," submitted recently to your committee by the National Institute of Economics and Law (NIEL).

As you know, Mr. Chairman, this Association, founded in 1912, represents virtually all the public port authorities of the United States. During consideration of H.R. 4374 and S. 1593, we have actively communicated with appropriate members of Congress relating the positions and concerns of the U.S. port industry on key points of the proposed legislation.

In responding to the NIEL position summary, I want to state at the outset that we are completely unfamiliar with any mandate by NIEL to define and project the views of the U.S. port industry. We know of none of our ports that asked the Institute to act on their behalf, nor do we know of any ports that have been contacted by NIEL. While we would appreciate the efforts of any appropriate and qualified organization to assist us in developing research analysis and in projecting port industry positions on key issues, we find the NIEL statement to be generally an ill-prepared, ill-based summary of the portent of H.R. 4374 and S. 1593 on the interests of U.S. ports and the communities in which they operate. The input of this Association to these two bills is in large measure reflected in the markups, and whereas NIEL may find reason to project ominous impacts on our industry, we believe the proposed legislation is basically a reasonable response to the necessities of regulatory reforms.

Our response to the NIEL essay has been prepared on the basis of review conducted by port authority attorneys and port directors from the four coasts, an effort coordinated by the Association's Law Review Committee. During this review, we concluded that the proposed legislation could be refined with a series of technical amendments which would serve to clarify the appropriate status of U.S. ports as fully-recognized parties within the structure of regulations covering the maritime transportation industry. These proposed technical amendments are attached and we respectfully request your consideration.

In a letter to Senator Gorton dated February 8, 1982, AAPA outlined the major concerns of all U.S. ports regarding reform of U.S. maritime regulatory laws. At that time, we said:

". . .[I]t is vital to the success of any maritime regulatory reform plan that ports continue to be a principal element of federal ocean regulatory law. The primary inclusion of ports in the Shipping Act of 1982 is imperative to assure the continued economic success of functions associated with the flow of U.S. waterborne commerce.

"Under current law and regulatory procedures administered by the Federal Maritime Commission, ports hold a very unique place. Congress and the FMC have formulated through the years certain "rights" and "requirements" that recognize ports as essential transportation links in the movement of waterborne commerce.

"Statutory rights of ports contained in Sections 16 and 17 of the Shipping Act of 1916 provide port entities legal standing to protect themselves against undue preference or rate discrimination. Section 8 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920 protects ports against unreasonable cargo diversion. Section 205 of the 1936 Act sets a standard for conferences in order to prevent port services discrimination."

In the months since, AAPA has closely monitored all developments relating to H.R. 4374 and S. 1593. We are satisfied that these bills, as amended, preserve the existing statutory safeguards afforded ports.

During hearings before the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law on May 6, 1982, NIEL opposed H.R. 4374 on grounds it would unwisely expand antitrust immunity in the maritime industry. NIEL is now suggesting that American ports should rally in opposition to the bill, arguing this time, that it does not provide them with antitrust protection adequate to match those afforded to ocean carriers. It appears that NIEL has reversed its concerns on antitrust immunity in just a few months time.

Following is a series of summary observations on a number of specific allegations raised in the NIEL paper:

1. NIEL charge (page 1): H.R. 4374 and S. 1593 contain "several procedural and substantive changes to existing law" which allow common carriers/conferences to "allot ports or otherwise regulate the number and character of sailings between ports, and to engage in exclusive, preferential, or cooperative working arrangements among themselves or with one or more marine terminal operator . . ."

AAPA response: NIEL ignores the fact that these supposedly port debilitating powers are already permitted under the Shipping Act of 1916 (46 USC 814). This statute has generally performed satisfactorily in allowing ports to protect themselves. Over the years, ports have challenged various agreements and routing arrangements under the powers authorized by Sections 15 and 16 of the 1916 Act as well as other "port protection" statutes contained in Section 8 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920 and Section 205 of the 1936 Act.

Neither bill would alter these statutory protections.

2. NIEL charge (page 2): "The Federal Maritime Commission strictly scrutinizes any agreement that diverts traffic from a port that would be the natural routing for the goods" and will ". . . generally find any carrier rate agreement that attracts cargo from an area 'naturally tributary' to a port to some other port to be unjustly discriminatory."

AAPA response: NIEL's analysis misstates the current status of cargo diversion law and the FMC agreement-approval process. Its arguments are not based on recent practice, but on cases no more recent than 12 years ago, some dating as far back as 1957. Those early precedents have since been bypassed by time, technological change and current FMC views of cargo diversion as embodied in the famous "minibridge" case (Council of North Atlantic Shipping Association, et al. vs. American Mail Lines, Ltd., FMC 73-38 (1977)) and a subsequent alteration contained in N.C. State Ports Authority, et al vs. Port Containerline Ltd., FMC 77-50 (1980). Moreover, NIEL was unable to cite a single instance where an agreement has been rejected by the commission on the grounds of cargo diversion. The reasons are obvious: (1) nearly every major agreement approved by the commission involving minibridge, microbridge, or landbridge has in effect, sanctioned cargo diversion practices; (2) the carriers involved have negotiated and compromised in order to meet the concerns of affected ports.

U.S. ports are well aware of their right to challenge those agreements. Enactment of the proposed legislation would not change current patterns of cargo diversion. As might be expected with any change in law and the regular turnover in FMC membership, port diversion cases will be interpreted and reinterpreted in the light of circumstances, transportation technology and economic fairness for shippers. The specter of cargo diversion fears raised by NIEL is hardly a revelation to ports, all of which recognize that competition for cargo is a constant fact of business life.

3. NIEL charge (page 3): "[A]n agreement diverting traffic from its natural port now comes to the Commission with a strong presumption of invalidity."

AAPA response: This statement is not substantiated by NIEL or by the record of the FMC affecting conference agreements. U.S. ports are well aware that many conference agreements receive routine FMC approval.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Few ports, however, follow these actions on a daily basis. Of greater concern to most ports are the post-agreement activities of carriers, including publication of rates. These are the actions that have drawn port protests over the years (see Far East Conference Tariff Rule Regarding Assessment of Wharfage, FMC 75-21 (1978), In the Matter of Furnishing Container Chassis, FMC 80-28 (1980), or Petition Regarding Terminal Handling Charges of Various North Atlantic Conferences, FMC (1981)). Once again, the ability of ports to protest post-agreement practices are unaffected by either bill.

4. NIEL charge (page 3): "Section 14(b) [1916 Act] presently prohibits the use of any dual-rate contract that requires a contract shipper to divert goods from their 'natural routing'." NIEL goes on to state that proposed reform legislation will act to dilute the protections now available under this Section.

AAPA response: That particular provision was adopted 20 years ago. At no time since has a single case involving "natural routing" under Section 14(b) come before the FMC.

Cargo affected by conference loyalty contracts moves as dictated by economic necessity as ports and shippers are well aware. The proposed reform amendments to Section 14(b) would not change this practice.

5. NIEL charge (page 6): Ports will not be exempt under agreements with carriers under H.R. 4374 and as a result "would be liable for acts of immunized carriers potentially subject to criminal prosecution and treble damages."

AAPA response: This charge is without merit. The Judiciary Committee report (97-611, part 2, page 33) clearly states that the carriers' antitrust immunity extends to their dealings with marine terminal operators. In any case, an agreement between two parties should be viewed by the FMC and the courts as a single transaction, thus immunizing both. In the interest of clarity, however, a minor technical amendment to Section 3 of H.R. 4374 (which is similar to the language contained in Section 4(b) of S. 1593) would better serve the committee's intent and end once and for all such academic speculation. (The amendment is listed as number one on the attached list of proposed technical amendments.)

6. NIEL charge (page 6): "Port authorities have sought to have the proposed legislation protect the right of all conference members to act independently" and neither H.R. 4374 nor S. 1593 provides the right of independent action.

AAPA response: It is true that AAPA has requested the right of independent action. While neither bill offers independent action procedures to the extent requested, we feel nevertheless the matter was adequately addressed in the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee report where it states: ". . . while desirable as a competitive tool [it] could in fact be used to compete unfairly against independent non-conference carriers . . ." (97-611, part 1, P.25). Accordingly, AAPA is satisfied with the compromise position found in H.R. 4374 allowing conference carriers to exercise the right of independent action on a 45-day maximum notice. This will give ports and shippers sufficient time to amend conference tariffs as circumstances warrant.

7. NIEL charge (page 7): Conferences will be able "to exact substantial concessions from all ports and smaller ports could be precluded from any meaningful participation in conference controlled traffic."

AAPA response: We find that this comment tends to misstate existing law and practice. Naturally, differences exist between conference agreements in the various port ranges. AAPA is well aware of the concerns that ports of various sizes have regarding existing conference service. However, neither bill would change the existing practice that allows conferences to decide which ports are served. Those decisions would continue to be based on cargo flows and the capacity of facilities at individual ports to handle them.

In conclusion, I wish to acknowledge the understanding and sensitivity shown by your committee and its staff to the concerns of our industry. We pledge our continued cooperation as the 97th Congress continues its consideration of maritime regulatory reform legislation.

Sincerely,

J. RON BRINSON,
President.●

HOSPICE CARE GETS LONG-OVERDUE RECOGNITION

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, It is a national tragedy that our terminally ill citizens have been for far too long reduced to living out their days in health care facilities, alone and without the comfort of friends and loved ones. I commend the authors of the recently passed Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act—an act which I supported—for allowing hospice care to be paid for under medicare. This provision would allow for care of the dying in the home instead of a hospital.

The hospice movement has grown in size and strength in recent years, largely in response to the growing cost of maintaining the terminally ill in hospitals. In 1978, there were 59 organizations offering hospice care; by mid-1981 this number had grown to 440. Hospice care is directed at chiefly providing relief from pain, often in facilities that are separate from hospitals, offering competent care in a fashion that allows the terminally ill dignity and compassion in the last stages of their illness.

Begun in England, the movement has grown in this country where the Congressional Budget Office has estimated that hospices are now serving about 50,000 nationwide—or 10 percent of potential users. This new medicare provision will hopefully increase participation by 109,000 at less cost to the medicare program—saving $48 million by 1986 when the provision expires. In 1983, each hospice user would spend $1,100 less than in a hospital. The benefit would also cover some items which medicare cannot pay for, such as outpatient drugs, family counseling, medical supplies for the patient's comfort, as well as respite service and home health care.

As an original member of the Select Committee on Aging, I maintain a special interest in the health care needs of medicare recipients. I believe this provision is a long-overdue step in recognizing cost-effective alternatives which will be better tailored to the needs of our elderly who are ill. However, this provision must be the first—and not the only—step we take in seeking ways in which to preserve medicare services to the elderly through the support of health care programs which offer viable alternatives to more costly institutionalization. For the benefit of my colleagues, I wish to insert an editorial from the New York Times which endorses the hospice concept and commend it to their attention.

TO EASE THE PAIN OF DEATH

For too many, the end of life is a nightmare of lonely hospital rooms and sterile combat against unstoppable disease. But there is an alternative: hospice care, an inspiring concept imported from Britain. The idea is to let the terminally ill remain at home for as long as possible so that friends and family can provide care under the supervision of a physician. Both the patient and the family receive help in coping with death.

Thanks to a provision of the omnibus tax reform bill now awaiting President Reagan's signature, hospice care will become an eligible expense under Medicare. The provision may add as many as 100,000 patients to the 50,000 now served by some 400 organizations nationwide. It also demonstrates that Reaganomics need not eclipse new ideas for social programs.

Although final approval of the hospice measure came amid the jumble of Congress's race toward adjournment, the consideration process was prudent. No one opposed the principle of offering more Americans a dignified way to die, but some objected to the cost.

Supporters of the measure knew that at a time when social programs are being cut to the quick, it would have been neither wise nor fair to create a major new program of public health expenditures. But they were able to point to a study by the Congressional Budget Office that found that the program would ultimately pay for itself.

To obtain covered hospice care, a patient would have to forgo treatment and drugs that might prolong life. Thus the program would substitute more humane but less expensive care for the high-priced services now given the terminally ill in hospitals at Government expense. By fiscal 1986, the Budget Office predicted, annual net savings for the taxpayer will approach $50 million.

Yet the coverage, available for up to 210 days, will be broad: home care for the dying patient, counseling for patient and family, pain-relieving drugs and medical supplies. "Respite care" will also be available to ease the strain placed on family members by the need for constant attendance.

The hospice idea is an encouraging new area of social service. Congress deserves high marks for pursuing it to fruition in an era dominated by austerity budget politics.●

HAPPY BIRTHDAY CLAUDE

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, today is an auspicious occasion. It marks the 82d birthday of my good friend and colleague, CLAUDE PEPPER. Although CLAUDE and I began our service in the House of Representatives together in 1963, his illustrious career of public service began in 1928 with his election to the Florida State House of Representatives from Taylor County which is located in the Second Congressional District I am privileged to serve.

From that time he has been a dedicated public servant. He served honorably and well in the U.S. Senate from 1937 until 1951 and has never left the public eye. We all know of his tremendous contributions to the well-being of older Americans through his service as chairman of the Select Committee on Aging and the prime example he serves for senior citizens everywhere.

I hope all my colleagues will join me in wishing CLAUDE a very happy 82d birthday and many more to come.●

CAREY CRONAN—A MAN WE WILL MISS

HON. STEWART B. McKINNEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, Congress seems a little emptier this fall, and in fact, it is. A very special person—Carey Cronan—has passed away. Carey was a member of the Washington press corps for 33 years, still a very active member producing a weekly column and daily stories until he died at age 73. His greatest fear was that the Bridgeport Post-Telegram editors might decide he should retire. Carey did not even want anyone to know he went to the hospital for those last few days because his bosses might learn of it. But everyone knew Carey would never be too old to do what he loved the best—report the news. He came to Washington in the days of Roosevelt when the small press corps spent the morning on Capitol Hill, then shared a ride over to the White House for the afternoon story. Everyone who knew him has a favorite story about Carey Cronan, who was himself the inveterate storyteller. However, I felt the following piece, written by one of the Bridgeport reporters Carey included on his long list of trainees over the years, is probably the most appropriate tribute to a man we all loved, respected, and will miss.

CAREY CRONAN LOVED BEING A REPORTER

(By John Gilmore)

There is an old story about newspaper people who don't like to be called journalists . . . they prefer to be called reporters. A journalist, the story goes, is a pompous old fool with a pencil who carries a cane.

This could have been the philosophy of Carey Cronan. He loved being a reporter. His life was built around the profession and he never considered it simply a job. It was his life.

For 33 years Carey was the Washington correspondent for the Post Publishing Company. He watched the comings and goings of Connecticut representatives and senators. He knew them all.

Bridgeport mayors traveling to the nation's capital always stopped in to say hello to the veteran reporter. They felt it necessary, although he may have wondered why.

He was a fixture on the Washington scene, a legend in Connecticut.

And he never carried a cane as part of his wardrobe. Carey was a reporter. Carey passed away last month and left a void in the Connecticut press corps, both here and in Washington. He won't be replaced easily. He will long be missed.

His style was simple: get the basics, who, what, where, when, why and how.

It was almost impossible to get Carey to speculate or offer an opinion in a news story, a long-time friend and associate said. He just wouldn't do it. He didn't practice the new journalism.

But he did have opinions about things that happened around him. One of his strongest opinions was that former U.S. Sen. Thomas Dodd, who was censured in 1967 for misuse of campaign funds, was railroaded.

Carey felt the Senator was betrayed by a disloyal staffer.

Carey's career stretched back to 1928, when he took his first newspaper job in Bridgeport. He dabbled in radio reporting for a while, and was even considered by some as a pioneer in electronic journalism. But he returned to newspapers, his first and true journalistic love. There was something magical and permanent about words being preserved on paper.

Carey loved watching the interaction among the nation's elected representatives in Washington and truly believed the basic system of government was sound. He believed scandals were the product of a few bad apples in government and not the system. But he had seen the government grow and acknowledged the complexities of the nation's government as it approached the 21st century.

He would sit back sometimes and remember the days when presidential press conferences amounted to bringing the press corps into the Oval Office for a drink and simply talking about things that were happening. But that was in the days before the Eisenhower administration.

That was also before the television explosion into journalism, the explosion that brought instant analysis, live remote coverage and videotape. It was a time when a reporter's equipment consisted of simply a pad of paper and a pencil.

Things have changed over the years in American journalism, and Carey generally accepted those changes. He maintained an ability to survive. He survived because he had the basic talents necessary to be a reporter.

And he was a storyteller. Cronan was a storyteller of the first order. He could tell stories about people and, most importantly, himself.

Carey was at home with his work, his friends and a good cigar . . . a good Topstone cigar.

The cigar became his trademark to friends. When he was first married, he was fond of saying, he told his new wife Mary that he smoked cigars and there would be no discussion of the issue. She accepted his terms, Carey would say with a grin.

As a member of the National Press Club, Carey had the respect of his peers. All the media stars of Washington knew him and, more importantly, respected him.

Carey Cronan was a reporter. And you honored him by calling him a reporter.●

DENOUNCEMENT OF SOVIET UNION ON BEHALF OF THE SALOMON FINKELSTEIN FAMILY

HON. WENDELL BAILEY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BAILEY of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues the plight of the Jews in the Soviet Union.

We all know that the U.S.S.R. has a blatant disregard for human rights. It is no wonder that so many have tried to escape to Israel where they can be reunited with loved ones and worship in peace. However, the Soviets have slowed Jewish emigration to a trickle and with it doused many hopes for religious freedom.

One who has repeatedly tried to leave the Soviet Union is Salomon Finkelstein. He along with his wife Frida, and son Artur long to be reunited with Salomon's parents who emigrated to Israel several years ago. The family first asked permission to leave Russia in March 1972. Their application was refused in June of that year. No reason was given but the Finkelstein's believe it is because of Salomon's previous army service from 1968–70.

Today is Salomon Finkelstein's 33d birthday. Although I do not have the power to give him what he wants most in life, I can speak on his behalf to strongly denounce the Soviet Union's Jewish emigration policy. As part of the 97th Congressional Class on Soviet Jewry, I urge my colleagues to do the same. We must continue to fight for Salomon Finklestein and those like him who only want the freedom that we in this country so often take for granted.●

WOMEN'S EQUALITY DAY—AUGUST 26, 1982

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my unwavering support to commemorate August 26, the anniversary of the ratification of the women's suffrage amendment, as "Women's Equality Day."

Although the first efforts to secure voting rights date back as early as 1648 when the suffrage petition was placed before the house of delegates in the colony of Maryland, women did not win this indispensable right until 1920. Throughout those long years, committed women fought continuously and relentlessly to secure equal legal rights. Ratification of the 19th amendment marked a milestone in the quest for women's equality. Susan B. Anthony, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Lucy Stone are all familiar names to us, but there were many more who devoted their lives to this noble cause.

Yet, to simply praise their efforts and to celebrate the anniversary of the women's suffrage would denigrate their fight. Needless to say, equality for women is not confined to voting rights. It extends to equal legal rights in every sphere, to equitable educational and employment opportunities.

Although Congress has continually voted to obliterate inequities in the law, women must still hurdle discriminatory laws and practices. For instance, women comprise well over 48 percent of our total work force, but earn 59 cents of each dollar a man earns. Such inequities hurt not only individual women and their families, but also the prosperity and well-being of the Nation as a whole. We need to fight for the full participation of women in all facets of society.

Hence, as we celebrate this festive occasion, let us reaffirm our commitment to the equal rights amendment. Although opponents of the ERA have effectively halted its momentum, the ERA, in fact, is alive and kicking. Just as it took more than three centuries for women to win the vote, the campaign to ratify the ERA will also be long and arduous. I look forward to the day when we can add the ERA to our roster on Women's Equality Day.●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO HON. SOL STETIN OF PATERSON, N.J., OUTSTANDING CITIZEN, ESTEEMED NATIONAL LABOR LEADER, AND GREAT AMERICAN

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, September 10, the residents of my congressional district and State of New Jersey will join together with a prominent group of concerned citizens from labor, business, civic and community organizations in support of the establishment of our Nation's first labor museum—the Botto House American Labor Museum—in a commemorative salute to the development and achievements of working people. It is indeed fitting and appropriate that the honored guest of this testimonial will be a highly distinguished citizen, national labor leader and good friend—Hon. Sol Stetin of Paterson, N.J.—whose lifetime of dedication and personal commitment in ever seeking the highest standards of excellence in his quest for economic and social justice for all of our citizens has truly enriched the historical, educational, and cultural heritage of our community, State, and Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our deepest of appreciation to Sol Stetin and share the pride of his good wife, Frieda; their two daughters and sons-in-law, Sandra and Ira Gash, and Myra and Robert Levine; and their grandchildren, Lauren and Amy Gash; Lisa, Michael, and Scott Levine upon this milestone of achievement in their family endeavors.

Mr. Speaker, Sol Stetin has been in the vanguard of a concerted effort to establish the first labor museum in the United States and the founding of the Botto House American Labor Museum, Inc., a private, nonprofit organization dedicated to the acquisition, restoration, and preservation of the Pietro Botto House of Haledon, N.J., as a State and National historic site and national historic landmark, and is president of the board of trustees of this most prestigious historic preservation organization.

Sol retired 2 months ago as senior executive vice president of the Amalgamated Clothing & Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO, after serving a half century of fruitful and fulfilling years in the American labor movement. He formerly served as president of the Textile Workers Union of America and as a vice president and member of the AFL-CIO executive council. The Botto House American Labor Museum is a project he cherishes: it will depict the contributions and heritage of working people in New Jersey and the entire Nation.

Mr. Speaker, there is much that can be said of Sol Stetin and his lifetime of achievements in service to people and with your permission I would like to insert at this point in our historic journal of Congress a brief outline of his good works and affiliations that will be particularly cited by his colleagues and friends on September 10, as follows:

SUMMARY OF ACHIEVEMENTS AND AFFILIATIONS OF SOL STETIN

Sol Stetin, born in Poland, a resident of Paterson, New Jersey for 61 years, recently retired as Senior Executive Vice President of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, after a distinguished career of nearly fifty years in the American labor movement. Active in the early organizing drives of the CIO, Stetin rose to the presidency of the Textile Workers Union of America, before merging his union with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers in 1976.

For about a half-century, Sol Stetin has spoken out on the major issues of the day: peace, social justice, education and opportunity for all citizens, and fair treatment for workers and their families. His voice has never wavered from a passionate, consistent commitment to justice and dignity for all.

From the day he started to work, the life story of Sol Stetin and the history of modern textile trade unionism became one and the same. In 1933, as a charter member of Dyers Local 1733 in Paterson, he was active in the formation of the old Federation of Dyers, Finishers, Printers and Bleachers of America. He signed his first union card on September 27, 1933 in the old United Textile Workers Union. In 1935, after the formation of the Committee for Industrial Organization—which became the Congress of Industrial Organization—he knew instinctively that he had a role to play in history's greatest organizing drive. And he did.

Sol Stetin is a former Trustee of William Paterson College, Wayne, New Jersey, where he received an Honorary Degree. He has been active in the Institute of Management and Labor Relations at Rutgers the State University since its inception in 1947 where he also received an Honorary Degree of Doctor of Humane Letters. A wing at the Rutgers Labor Education Center in New Brunswick, N.J. has been named in his honor. He served on the AFL-CIO Executive Council. He is now an AFL-CIO Vice President Emeritus.

Upon retirement, Stetin has taken on a new project with characteristic zeal and energy: establishing one of America's first labor museum at the Botto House National Historic Site In Haledon, New Jersey. Stetin has always been a strong advocate of education for the working class and was instrumental in beginning the labor education program at Rutgers University. His advocacy of education, along with his love for the Paterson area has led him naturally to the Botto House in Haledon.

During the epic 1913 Paterson Silk Strike, the home of Pietro Botto, an immigrant textile worker, became the focal point of a dramatic effort by silk and dye workers to secure better working conditions. John Reed, Upton Sinclair, IWW's Bill Haywood, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn and Carlo Tresca all came to Paterson and planned strike strategy at the Botto House. When Paterson barred the strikers from assembling there, Pietro Botto invited the workers to use his property for mass meetings. Although the strike failed, historians generally agree that it paved the way for the successful organization of textile workers in the 1930's.

Sol Stetin serves as President of the American Labor Museum/Botto House National Historic Site's Board of Trustees. The American Labor Museum seeks to convert the Botto House into an institution which will both interpret the past and suggest possibilities for the future well-being of American workers. His career as a labor leader and public citizen has been concerned with the advancement and development of all people. The establishment of the American Labor Museum/Botto House National Historic Site and the testimonial dinner in Sol Stetin's honor deserve full support.

Mr. Speaker, Sol Stetin has served our people and our country with honor and distinction. He is an outstanding individual whose richness of wisdom and quality of leadership in his daily pursuits, particularly on behalf of the working men and women and their families have touched the lives of many, many people in my congressional district and throughout our Nation. I appreciate the opportunity to publicly acclaim all of his good works and share the pride of his family and many, many friends in his professional expertise in educational civic and charitable endeavors which have made a vast contribution to the quality of life and way of life for all of our people. We do indeed salute an outstanding citizen and great American, Hon. Sol Stetin of New Jersey.●

"COP KILLER BULLETS" OUTLAWED IN BROOKHAVEN, N.Y.

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report that the town of Brookhaven, N.Y., has adopted a local law that restricts the possession and distribution of armor-piercing handgun bullets, which can rip through the bulletproof vests worn by police officers.

As one who has authored similar legislation at the Federal level (H.R. 5437), I am greatly encouraged by this very significant development.

It should be noted that Brookhaven has been joined by a number of other localities and States—including Minnesota, Kansas, Rhode Island, Alabama, Oklahoma, and Illinois—in enacting similar laws against these so-called cop killer bullets.

Each time a State or locality acts to outlaw this high-powered ammunition—which is not used for legitimate purposes but has been used to kill police officers—we are reminded of the severity of this problem. Already, H.R. 5437 has received the bipartisan cosponsorship of over 80 of my colleagues; identical legislation has been authored in the Senate (S. 2128); and the House Subcommittee on Crime has conducted hearings. I am confident that enactment of a Federal law to address this national problem is only a matter of time.

Simply put, our Nation's 528,000 law enforcement officers need and deserve whatever added protection we can provide them. The town of Brookhaven—and particularly Councilman Stephen Burke, who authored the local law—are responsible for giving them that protection. I am committed to doing the same on a nationwide basis.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert the text of the Brookhaven law:

HANDGUN BULLETS

29A-1. INTENT

It is the intent of the Town Board to restrict the possession, disposition and use of certain handgun bullets that are designed primarily for the purpose of armor penetration so as to give law enforcement personnel a reasonable degree of protection from penetration of body armor. This local law is not intended to restrict the availability of ammunition for personal defense, sporting, or hunting purposes.

29A-2. DEFINITIONS

For the purposes of this local law, the following terms shall be given the following meanings:

Body armor—commercially available, soft, bullet-resistant apparel with a penetration resistance equal to or greater than body armor classified as Threat Level Class II that complies with New York State Industrial Code Rule 55 or National Institute of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice Standard 0101.01 dated May 1978.

Dealer—any person engaged in the business of selling ammunition at wholesale or retail who is licensed under Chapter 44 of Title 18, United States Code.

Dispose of—dispose of, give, give away, loan, offer for sale, sell, transfer, and otherwise dispose of.

Handgun—a firearm originally designed to be fired by the use of a single hand with a barrel five (5) inches or less in length.

Person—natural person, firm, partnership, corporation, or company.

Restricted handgun bullet—a handgun bullet that is designed specifically to penetrate armor, including body armor as defined herein, and which is comprised of any hard metal or hard metal alloy, or soft metal jacket with a hardened core comprised of any hard metal or hard metal alloy, including Teflon coated handgun bullets, which purposely reduces the normal expansion or mushrooming of the bullet's shape upon impact.

29A-3. PROHIBITED ACTS

(a) No person shall with intent to commit an unlawful act dispose of, possess, or use any restricted handgun bullet or bullets in the Town of Brookhaven.

(b) No dealer shall dispose of any restricted handgun bullet or bullets in the Town of Brookhaven.

29A-4. PENALITES

Any person convicted of violating this local law shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not exceeding One Thousand ($1,000.00) Dollars or by imprisonment for not more than thirty (30) days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, provided, however, that any person who uses or possesses a restricted handgun bullet during the commission of another crime may be punished by such fine and imprisonment for not more than six (6) months which sentence shall run consecutively to any sentence imposed for conviction of such other crime.

Section 2. This local law shall take effect ninety (90) days from the date of filing in the office of the Secretary of State.●

ARTICLE ON THE TOBACCO PROGRAM FOR THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

HON. L. H. FOUNTAIN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. FOUNTAIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to place the following editorial from the Des Moines Register in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that all Members of the Congress may have the opportunity to read it.

We North Carolinians have always known that the tobacco program is a boon, not a bust, for the American farmer and for the American economy, and this editorial speaks to that issue. It is encouraging to see that citizens from nontobacco areas are realizing the crucial importance of the tobacco program—a program which helps to maintain millions of jobs and which generates billions of dollars annually in our Nation's economy.

I salute the editors of the Des Moines Register and highly commend this editorial to each and every Member of the Congress.

A BETTER TOBACCO PROGRAM

Congress last week gave final approval to a bill that will make welcome changes in the federal government's tobacco program.

The program is frequently attacked by anti-smokers who argue that the federal government has no business supporting a crop that causes cancer. The primary aim of the program, however, is not to promote tobacco production, but to protect the welfare of the small farmers who make their living growing tobacco. Agriculture Department experts argue that if the program were abolished, many of the small producers would be forced to get out of farming, and that tobacco would be produced by fewer, larger farms. Such a change would do nothing to reduce tobacco production or to convince Americans to quit smoking.

Unless the country is prepared to ban smoking, a tobacco program can be useful. The bill passed by Congress improves the tobacco program in three ways:

It eliminates taxpayer support, except for administrative expenses. The program costs were already minimal. According to the Senate Agriculture Committee, the tobacco program cost taxpayers less than $40 million over the past decade. The USDA expects to recover eventually 98.8 percent of what it had invested in the tobacco loan program.

Now even these costs will be eliminated. From now on, tobacco growers will be required to make contributions to a special fund that will be used to cover losses suffered by the tobacco program.

To grow tobacco, a farmer must own or lease a tobacco allotment. Many people who own tobacco allotments don't actually produce the crop; they lease their allotments to active farmers. The new legislation makes modest moves toward getting the allotments back into the hands of actual farmers.

The bill gives the secretary of agriculture authority to lower the price-support level on tobacco. This should help ensure that U.S. tobacco will be more competitive in world markets and help limit the buildup of surplus tobacco stocks.

The measure gives the program the distinction of being the only major farm-commodity program that farmers pay for themselves. That's a good reason for the tobacco program to deserve a better image.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. GARY A. LEE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. LEE. Mr. Speaker, due to official business, I was unable to be present in the House Chamber yesterday, September 8. Had I been here, however, I would have voted in the following manner on H.R. 6307, the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act.

Rollcall No. 308: I would have voted "aye" on this amendment seeking to strike provisions which apply RCRA regulations to small quantity generators and to require the EPA to study and report to Congress on the advisability of applying regulations to operations generating less than 1,000 kilograms a month.

Rollcall No. 310: I would have voted "no" on the amendment seeking to strike language preserving the rights on litigants under any statute of common law; and on

Rollcall No. 311: I would have voted "yea" on final passage of the RCRA reauthorization bill, H.R. 6307.●

TRIBUTE TO COL. VICTOR M. ROBERTSON, JR.

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to say a few words about a soldier's soldier who recently retired from the U.S. Army, Col. Victor M. Robertson, Jr.

Colonel Robertson has had a long and impressive Army career. Much of his service was with the infantry combat units where he served as company commander in the 5th Regimental Combat Team in Korea, the 71st Infantry Division at Fort Lewis, and combat support company and Company D, 325th Airborne Infantry Regiment, 82d Airborne Division. In addition to commanding the 74th Aviation Company in Vietnam in 1965-66, he commanded the 1st Battalion, 14th Infantry, 4th Infantry Division in Vietnam in 1969. He served as Division Chief of Staff with the 25th Infantry Division from 1972-75, and commanded the 2d Brigade.

His other high level staff assignments included: Aide-de-camp to the commanding general, 1st U.S. Army from 1963 to 1964; staff officer in war plans division, and Army Secretary for Joint Actions, Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations and Plans from 1966 to 1969; executive officer to the Chief of Staff, U.S. Army Vietnam in 1970; branch chief, Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff for Individual Training, Continental Army Command in 1970-71; and Chief of Staff, U.S. Army Military District of Washington from 1978 to 1981. He was assigned to the military district of Washington in 1978.

Colonel Robertson's outstanding military career is highlighted by the military decorations he has received. These include: the Silver Star, Legion of Merit with Oak Leaf Cluster, Distinguished Flying Cross, Bronze Star with "V" Device and two Oak Leaf Clusters, Meritorious Service Medal, seven awards of the Air Medal, and the Army Commendation Medal. He was also awarded the Combat Infantry Badge, Senior Parachutist Badge, Senior Aviator Badge, the Army General Staff Identification Badge, and the Vietnamese Parachutist Badge.

His many contributions to our Army would not have been possible without the support of his lovely wife, Lois. They will be greatly missed by all who had the pleasure of their association. I join the Army in congratulating Colonel Robertson on a most successful career and I wish him, and his wife, Lois, the best of luck in their future endeavors.●

LEGISLATION TO PROMOTE HYDROPOWER IN THE NORTHEAST-MIDWEST REGION

HON. JAMES L. NELLIGAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. NELLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation which is designed to promote the development of our many hydropower resources in the Northeast-Midwest region of our country.

In 1979, according to Army Corps of Engineers figures, the capacity of 1,251 existing hyropower facilities nationwide was 64,000 megawatts of electricity. This represented approximately 13 percent of the Nation's total generating capacity.

There is tremendous potential for growth in the hydropower industry. According to the corps' "National Hydropower Resources Study," development of hydro potental at sites with existing dams could increase total capacity by 250 percent. Further development of nearly 4,500 potentially feasible, but undeveloped sites could increase total capacity by up to 500 percent.

Clearly, we can no longer afford to neglect our hydropower resources, and the vast potential they afford for reducing our dependence on oil imports. And yet, major obstacles remain to thwart hydropower development.

One of the main obstacles is the lack of finance capital. Once constructed, hydro facilities are relatively inexpensive to operate. However, startup costs, which include the costs of complying with necessary Federal environmental regulations, can be substantial.

To help meet the costs of feasibility studies, which can take between 3 and 4 years to complete, the Department of Energy administered a low-interest loan program between 1977 and 1980. Discontinuation of this program in 1981 has made financing more difficult, especially for municipalities and smaller utility firms.

The problem is especially acute in the Northeast and Midwest, which are the only regions of the country which lack access to Federal support for hydro projects via one of the five Federal power marketing authorities.

To correct this inequity, I am introducing legislation to create the Northeast-Midwest States Federal Hydropower Financing Authority. Under this legislation, midwestern and northeastern States would have the option of joining this regional power marketing authority, thereby becoming eligible to apply for lower cost loans and loan guarantees to cover up to 70 percent of the costs of hydropower development.

Interest rates on loans would reflect the Government's cost of borrowing. State and municipal power authorities, rural electric cooperatives, interstate river commissions, and consumer and stockholder held utilities in member States would be eligible for financing.

According to corps studies, the northeastern and midwestern States contain half the feasible hydro sites, and 20 percent of the potential generating capacity nationwide. I urge Members from these regions to investigate the hydro potential within their own districts. Such information is available simply by contacting the Army Corps of Engineers.

If you feel that hydroelectricity has the potential to aid your district,

States, or region in meeting its long-term energy needs, and if you feel that it is unfair that the Northeast and Midwest are the only regions without access to the financial resources of Federal power marketing authorites, I would urge you to consponsor my legislation.●

RECLAIM AMERICA

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mrs. COLLINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, today, our Nation is in the midst of the deepest recession since the Great Depression of the 1930's. Economic policies dictated almost totally by the Reagan administration have produced the highest deficits this country has ever experienced and all economic indicators signify the gross failure of supply-side economics and rigid monetarism. Over 10 million people are out of work and the prospects for a strong healthy economy are gloomy at best.

For these reasons, towns and cities across the Nation are rallying to impress Congress, the President, and corporations that the American people cannot continue to accept policies that penalize the poor, the elderly, and working class in order to finance tax cuts that favor the wealthy and military enhancement programs too large and rapid for cost effectiveness and efficiency.

This movement, appropriately named Reclaim America, is sponsored by the National People's Action, a Chicago-based coalition of neighborhood organizations nationwide. The National People's Action is working in concert with unions, churches, peace groups, and all people's organizations to reorder the priorities of the current administration and corporate America.

Rallies, meetings, and other activities have been scheduled by NPA's Reclaim America in cities across the country for September 6-9. September 10 has been designated as the first joint Reclaim America action in Chicago and after stops in Cleveland and Philadelphia, the movement will bring its agenda to the Capital on Monday, September 13. NPA will end Reclaim America Week on Wall Street, New York City, on September 14.

I support this movement and commend the efforts of the National People's Action to bring together all people for the purpose of preserving democratic principles which form the foundation of our Republic.●

MARITIME REGULATORY REFORM

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, during the recent past, there have been several uninformed and misleading newspaper editorials attacking H.R. 4374—a bill to improve the international ocean commerce transportation system of the United States. The major premise of this maritime regulatory reform legislation is that the United States needs a healthy merchant marine for its national defense and its economic security. To be healthy, our merchant marine must be able to compete on an equal basis with foreign ocean carriers. H.R. 4374 would remove many of the constraints in our laws that now prevent it from doing that. Its enactment would, I am convinced, be in the best interests of all Americans.

H.R. 4374 has been carefully developed by the two committees that have reported it out. It is the product of extensive hearings, input from all facets of the industry and its customers, and a great deal of research and study—both in the Congress and in the executive branch. It is a complex bill that addresses the serious problems of a major industry.

I, therefore, would like to call attention to an editorial published by the Journal of Commerce whose staff has carefully followed this legislation during this and prior Congresses. It represents a much more informed and knowledgeable view of H.R. 4374 and the realities of the international ocean shipping business than was evident in the editorials in other national newspapers.

[From the Journal of Commerce, July 27, 1982]

SPECIOUS REASONING

Within the span of a few days recently the Washington Post, the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal all came out for defeat of the Biaggi and Gorton Bills for maritime regulatory reform. The vehemence of their attacks contrasts with the general indifference they have shown over the years toward the worsening plight of the American-flag merchant marine and the recurring crises which have afflicted ocean shipping of all flags in the commerce of the United States.

The danger is that the very considerable element in Congress whose interest in the shipping industry can most charitably be described as minimal will simply accept the editorial opinion of these three prestigious newspapers as acceptable truths. Such an attitude could mean that the pending legislation on this critical subject, the product of years of discussion and countless hours of testimony, would in effect be jettisoned.

A couple of common threads run through the three editorials: First, that shippers would benefit if only the ocean conferences—the "price-fixing cartels"—were shouldered aside in favor of good old American-style competition on the high seas; and second, that the American-flag merchant marine isn't as badly off as its "lugubrious" owners like to pretend.

In these days of government-owned and politically motivated cargo fleets—not to mention some privately owned predators of the sea—holding the American merchant marine to concepts of free market competition is simple foolishness. It would mean its immediate and virtually total destruction.

The Wall Street Journal's specious reasoning is illustrative: "We don't give antitrust immunity to oil tankers, tramp steamers and grain boats, which account for most of the shipping tonnage in and out of U.S. ports. There is absolutely no reason to make an exception of cargo liners."

What sort of comparison is that? Tankers, trampers and grain boats go when and where the cargo is provided; otherwise the owners send them into lay-up. Conferences are for liners that operate on fixed, regular schedules, cutting available space only when trade suffers a severe recession.

Would American shippers prefer to depend on fluctuating and uncertain tramp ship schedules to get their products into overseas markets? Would American importers like the goods they count on from abroad for seasonal sales to arrive only if the ocean carrier can book a full ship?

Taking most of its Ammunition from a recent report of the General Accounting Office, The New York Times declares that "existing regulations stifle competition and stop carriers from quickly adjusting their rates and services to market conditions"—a charge the industry itself has been making for many years. It then concludes: "The Biaggi-Gorton aproach would only make matters worse. America's shipping industry needs freedom to compete, not protection to charge whatever the traffic will bear."

The Times' notion of just how much freedom of competition is left on the sealanes today is sadly out of date. The bills of Rep. Mario Biaggi, D-N.Y., and of Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., still differ in some points, including the important one of whether to permit closed conferences, so it is a bit premature to refer to the "Biaggi-Gorton approach," but no matter.

Commenting on the original draft of the GAO report the Federal Maritime Commission observed: "There is no question that in the short run, removal of the antitrust exemption would result in increased price competition. However, the nature of the liner shipping industry is such that nationalistic interests manifested by extensive government subsidization and control of their merchant fleets may result in prices, over the long run, being higher than would be the case under the present system.

The FMC went on: "Given the cost structure of the industry (i.e., a high proportion of constant to total costs, with declining average costs per unit of output), elimination of the antitrust immunity would most likely result in rate wars in the short run as carriers cut rates to attract as much cargo as possible to fill their vessels. With nationalistic interests exerting a strong influence, the result of the rate war would probably not be the survival of the most efficient liner operators, as economic theory would posit, but rather, the surviving carriers would more likely be those with the strongest backing of their national governments."

The result, thus, might well be that the more efficient carriers would exit a given trade. And, over the long run, the combination of inefficient operations and barriers to entry created by government-supported merchant fleets could well result in prices higher than they would have been in the absence of shortrun price competition.

This, we submit, is a far more realistic scenario of what would really happen than the bland notions of "free competition" put forward by the New York Times and Wall Street Journal.

There is a third option, the FMC suggests, apart from approving closed conferences or revoking all antitrust immunity—encouragement of rationalization among steamship lines through such devices as space charters, pooling and joint service agreements.

Consortia and pools could help American cargo lines meet the problem of rapidly increasing costs of new ships. What puts U.S.-flag carriers at a competitive disadvantage is not the Shipping Act of 1916 but the substantially higher costs of shipbuilding, maintenance, repairs and crews. We certainly don't oppose American-flag consortia, but with so few surviving lines—including two in acknowledged financial difficulty—we think they could have only limited benefit. Nor do we find in the GAO report any real hint of how the U.S.-flag lines are going to overcome their problems, in the near future—especially if they are deprived of the security of conference rates.●

DAIRY PRICE SUPPORT PROGRAM HAS REACHED SCANDAL STAGE

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the dairy price supports program in this country seems to unfairly provide protection to farmers while other businesses are continually subjected to the whims of the market. By artificially stimulating demand, the Government has created a situation whereby farmers are producing far more milk and dairy products than the Nation wishes to buy, the consumers are paying more at the stores, and to add insult to injury—those same consumers must buy and store the Government-owned surplus with their tax dollars while getting little in return. In order to keep prices on the market up, most of this surplus must remain in Government hands, and the volume is increasing each day.

As a recent Chicago Tribune editorial so insightfully explained, it is about time we modify our price supports program. Particularly, the proposal in the Senate to cut the milk support level would be a step in the right direction.

The editorial follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, July 31, 1982]

DAIRY PRICE SUPPORTS MUST END

Every hour of every day U.S. taxpayers are paying a quarter of a million dollars to buy cheese, butter and milk powder that nobody is going to eat. Next year, we'll be paying even more—unless something is done fast to change a dairy price support program that has gone crazy.

The program was set up during World War II to stabilize prices and to help ensure a steady and adequate supply of milk. It is the most costly of several support programs for agricultural products.

Under the dairy program, the government sets a minimum support price and then buys enough milk and milk products to bring the market price—the amount paid by suppliers to supermarkets and food manufacturers—up to about the support price. The government is, in effect, another big competitor in the milk market, bidding prices upward.

For the taxpayer and consumer, the results are twofold: we pay more for dairy products than we otherwise would, and $2 billion a year of our tax dollars are being spent on buying and storing the products and running the program.

The first result is distasteful enough. In other parts of the world, notably the European Common Market, the government does not buy the milk but pays the farmer a premium over the price he receives in the marketplace. Consumers end up paying a fairly low price rather than a high price because of the government subsidy.

In the United States, though, farmers are subsidized at the expense of consumers. And while farmers may deserve sympathetic treatment in tough times, many consumers are living through even tougher times. The European system is an obstacle to free trade, but at least the people are charged for it only once—as taxpayers—and don't have to pay for it in higher prices as well.

Our price support system moves from the unfair to the rediculous when we consider its $2 billion cost to the taxpayers and what little we get for that money—at a time when we're facing cuts in other government programs and increases in taxes.

For every family in the nation, Uncle Sam now owns four pounds of dried milk, three pounds of cheese and two pounds of butter. If we were given that food, or even if it were sold at reduced prices, we'd feel a lot better about the whole situation.

The trouble is, if the government made a massive handout we wouldn't need to buy as much milk, cheese and butter through normal market channels. There would be a glut and prices would fall, forcing the government to step in and buy still more of the food in an attempt to push prices back up again.

To avoid this vicious circle, the government has given the food only to needy families, and its handouts have not kept pace with its purchases. The surplus keeps growing; its storage alone now costs close to $50 million a year.

Another possible solution, selling the products overseas, has been ruled out by State Department officials who fear such selling would disrupt overseas markets and that some of the food might be resold to the Soviet Union.

The administration has talked of increasing demand for dairy products by encouraging bakeries and others to use them more, and the American Farm Bureau Federation wants to increase demand by putting quotas on imports of imitation dairy products.

A more sensible and workable solution, though, would be to stop farmers from producing about 10 percent more milk than the nation wants to buy. And the best way to do that seems to be to gradually phase out the price support program.

The Reagan administration has made a start in that direction, eliminating an April, 1981, price support increase and freezing supports through next October at their October, 1980, level. But bolder moves are clearly needed. A proposal before the Senate to cut the support level from $13.10 to $12 a hundredweight by next Jan. 1 would be a good next step.

Critics say that in the short run that would lead to increased—not reduced—milk output as farmers try to make up for the cut in their income. But there's only so much milk you can get from a cow, and it's hard to imagine farmers investing in many more cows when milk prices are dropping.

In the longer run, the critics say, some farmers would go out of business. While few would like to see that, it's hard to understand why farmers should be protected from bankruptcy while other businesses are not. We may want to be sure we can feed our own people, but we don't need billions of pounds more food than the people want to eat.

Some farm leaders have accused the administration of not trying hard enough to stop the dairy surplus buildup. The food is being held hostage to force Congress to take action, they say. Even if that is true, it is not to be condemned. If holding food hostage is what it takes to convince congressmen to end or at least modify the dairy price support program, so be it.●

A BILL TO AMEND THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

HON. CLINT ROBERTS

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. ROBERTS of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation to amend the National Labor Relations Act, to prevent the practice of "closed shop" hiring, by outlawing the exclusive hiring hall.

On the contemporary labor-management scene, the exclusive hiring hall is a familiar phenomenon. Such a hiring hall comes into being when an employer and a union, as the "exclusive representative" of an identified group of employees, agree that the employer shall hire only those persons who have first been referred for employment by a union-operated hiring hall. Under current Federal law, such a hiring hall must be nondiscriminatory, without special preferences to union members.

In practical matters, though, it is many times operated as an exclusive hiring hall, and it has long been a common practice for unions to use the hiring hall as a device for imposing compulsory unionism on working people. A person comes cap-in-hand to a hiring hall hoping to be referred to a job; he knows that his chances of success improve if he pleases the union officials. The best way to accomplish this is to be a union member, so having no real choice, the person joins the union in order to obtain employment.

My legislation will alleviate this problem by repealing section 8(f) of the act outright, the key provision that presently allows this mischief, and by including a terse declaration that the exclusive hiring hall is prohibited.

Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that the Congress will address this situation soon, and will consider this legislation as one solution. The United States has been built upon a free laborer with a right to work, without undue influences on his freedom.●

ROLLS ROYCE OF TRUCKSTOPS

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, during these times of economic hardship, it gives me pleasure to bring to the attention of this body an American free enterprise success story. It takes place in the town of Oak Grove, Mo., and is a shining example of what hard work and self-initiative can still accomplish in this country.

Oak Grove is a small town east of Kansas City, Mo. While many of my colleagues have probably never been there, Oak Grove achieved considerable fame nationwide among truckdrivers for a truckstop there which has been referred to as the "Rolls Royce of Truckstops." The Kansas City East Union 76 Auto/Truckstop, home away from home for truckdrivers, has been voted by nearly 30,000 long-haul drivers the No. 1 truckstop in America. This is the second year in a row that this business, owned and operated by Mr. Bill Conklin, has been afforded this honor. They have ranked among the top 10 since the contest, sponsored by the trucker quarterly magazine, Road King, was begun 4 years ago.

The success of this full service truckstop has been attributed to the commitment of the people who work there. The employees at the Kansas City East Union 76 Truckstop genuinely care about providing good service to their customers. They realize that a service station such as this becomes a second home during a trucker's long journey across the country and they work hard to insure that their stay is as pleasant and comfortable as possible.

I congratulate Bill Conklin and his employees on receiving this well-deserved award. This success story serves as an inspiration to all small businessmen and I wish them the best of luck in all future endeavors.●

CRESTA BLANCA WINERY'S 100TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to bring to my colleagues' attention the fact that the Cresta Blanca Winery, one of the most distinguished and respected names in the American wine industry, is celebrating its centennial this year. Located in Ukiah, Mendocino County, Calif., the Cresta Blanca Winery produces a variety of wines of unsurpassed quality which have helped to make the State of California one of the greatest wine producing areas of the world.

Cresta Blanca was founded by Charles A. Wetmore, a celebrated California grape and wine industry pioneer. He was a perfectionist in his methods and 1889 Cresta Blanca competed against 17,000 other wines at the Paris Exposition. it won the coveted Grand Prix, thus proving that American wines could compete with the finest in the world. During the ensuing years this tradition of excellence has been zealously maintained and, as a result, Cresta Blanca has won top honors in many competitions.

I know my colleagues will join with me in expressing their commendation of the Cresta Blanca Winery for its many contributions to the viticultural and enological interests of the United States and to congratulate the winery on its 100th anniversary.●

OCEAN LINER SHIPPING

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, soon we will be considering H.R. 4374—a bill to improve the regulation of ocean liner shipping. A primary purpose of this bill is to remove those constraints, uncertainties, and administrative burdens that our present shipping laws impose on American ocean carriers and that put them at a competitive disadvantage in relation to foreign carriers. The net result of enactment of this legislation should be a more healthy, competitive, and efficient American ocean liner fleet with lower costs to American consumers.

What has been bothering me is the overall impression given by a number of uninformed editorials in major newspapers that this legislation is proposing something entirely new; namely, cartelization of shipping. These editorials imply that the antitrust exemption of the ocean line industry is new and bizarre. This is simply not true. It is not bizarre, nor is it new.

H.R. 4374 is basically a reaffirmation of the antitrust immunity provided that industry over half a century ago. Ocean shipping has utilized conferences—or cartels—for over a hundred years. They have been recognized, allowed, and regulated in the United States since the Shipping Act of 1916. Unfortunately, in the intervening years, both the enforcement of that act and its judicial interpretation have undergone substantial change. As a result, ocean carriers operating in our trades are unable to predict with any certainty the extent of the antitrust exemption originally enacted in 1916. It is the purpose of H.R. 4374 to eliminate those uncertainties and to reaffirm the principles established in the 1916 act.

An extensive study by the present administration also reached the conclusion that our shipping laws need to be overhauled and that collective activities by ocean carriers should be "clearly immune from the antitrust laws." If these conclusions by the Congress and the administration are bizarre, they are shared by all facets of the maritime industry and by most knowledgeable observers of international ocean shipping.

I, therefore, would like to share with you two informed rebuttals to the editorials that attacked H.R. 4374. These rebuttals effectively correct some of the uninformed statements made in those editorials.

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 27, 1982]

PUTTING U.S. SHIPPING ON AN EVEN KEEL

Your July 15 editorial "Torpedo the Maritime Bills" identified many of the ills suffered by the ocean liner shipping industry but misconstrued the cures. You enumerated uncompetitive operating and capital costs, an inefficient and possibly counterproductive subsidy system and overcapacity as problems. We have said the same ourselves.

What we have also said is that the United States is dependent upon world trade for its economic health and that its economic and defense needs are best served by a strong and efficient merchant marine.

We are proud of the accomplishments of Sea-Land Service, Inc., the largest and most successful U.S.-flag liner operator, without having taken government subsidy. We believe that other companies can, given the correct operating environment, serve the public effectively and make a reasonable profit without subsidy. However, we also recognize that five of Sea-Land's eight major American competitors completed 1980 in the red prior to receiving federal operating subsidies and that they may have extreme difficulty in replacing aging ships.

Reform is needed both in the subsidy programs that relate to carriers' costs and in the regulatory/antitrust environment which will accompany whatever comparative cost environment exists. However, they are separate issues requiring separate legislation. The need for regulatory/antitrust reform is most urgent. Carriers and shippers alike, including Sea-Land, strongly support the Gorton and Biaggi bills, which do not involve subsidy.

Overcapacity is a critical problem. In most world markets shipowners reduce the impact by sharing capacity. American owners have not been able to accomplish this under present law, although competing foreign owners have been permitted to do so in U.S. trade. The Gorton and Biaggi bills would permit such cost reduction.

Overcapacity could also be reduced, if the bills are not torpedoed, by carrier agreements to limit the numbers of vessels to those actually needed for current and anticipated cargo volumes in the liner trade.

The basic issue raised in the editorial was whether liner conferences ought be permitted at all. Both bills contain explicit prohibitions against abuse of conference power and provide penalties for violation that are far more severe than the fines imposed under the antitrust laws. Unlike tankers, tramp steamers and grain ships, which seek cargoes of opportunity in the trades most lucrative at the moment, liners are common carriers serving fixed ports and routes on fixed and regular time schedules. They use highly expensive terminals and vessels which must operate on schedule even if insufficient cargo is available. The uncertainties of cargo availability for committed assets create the need for price stability that conferences provide. Importers and exporters also support freight rate stability so that they can predict their costs.

The Gorton and Biaggi bills strive to achieve reasonable balance among shipper and carrier needs. They do not entirely eliminate the antitrust laws but make the rules more efficient and certain.

Chairman, Sea-Land Industries, Inc.

THERE'S NO FREE MARKET IN SHIPPING

To the EDITOR:

The Times editorial titled "Beware the Cargo Ship Cartel" (July 14) is devoid of the facts on which reasonable people could decide issues of maritime policy.

The logical result of the position set forth in that editorial would be to deny the United States virtually all opportunities to participate in its own foreign commerce much less the world's commerce.

The rules of ocean transportation are set by the leading maritime nations of the world, an attribute not enjoyed by the United States. Shipping cartels (or shipping conferences as they are known) already exist in most developed trades of the world and are not, as The Times would suggest, some new device that would be created by Senator Gorton's and Representative Biaggi's legislation.

Those conferences, which would continue to exist with or without the blessings of the United States, were evolved to serve a critical purpose: they provide the only workable means of preventing cut-throats and pirates from harmfully destabilizing the world's shipping services—a market where genteel participants are at the mercy of determined national governments.

Your rationalization that the United States merchant marine may not need attention because of its reputed good health is grossly at odds with the facts.

In 1950 the U.S. fleet carried 42 percent of U.S. foreign trade. That share has steadily dwindled to the point where today the fleet carries less than 4 percent of that trade. Where 15 years ago there were 25 shipping companies in the U.S. liner trades, today there are nine, and likely soon to be fewer.

The major premise lurking in your editorial, namely, that the free market offers the optimun solution for ocean shipping, is also seriously out of touch with reality. There is no free market in ocean transportation. It is a structure dominated by national governments set on building and maintaining merchant fleets under their national flags regardless of cost and in defiance of any U.S. attempts to alter the world unilaterally.

We wonder whether The Times is so vehemently in favor of free market forces as to advocate raising newspaper postal rates from their heavily subsidized levels up to the rates that the rest of American citizens have to pay when we send mail.

PETER J. LUCIANO.

SAMUEL I. NEWHOUSE

HON. GUY V. MOLINARI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, today, September 9, 1982, a new boat will be christened to serve on the world famous Staten Island ferry. It is particularly fitting that the vessel will bear the name of Samuel I. Newhouse.

The first born of a struggling immigrant, whose father arrived a short distance away at Ellis Island not long before, Samuel Newhouse became the epitome of the American way of life. He was an office boy at 12, a publisher by the time he was 16, a lawyer at 21, and by the time of his death in 1979 at the age of 84, he had put up more than $500 million, most of it his own money, to acquire 31 newspapers, 7 magazines, 6 television stations, 5 radio stations, and 20 cable TV systems.

His remarkable career in journalism had its first beginnings when, virtually on his own, he rebuilt the failing Bayonne (N.J.) Times. At the age of 16, he was so successful, that he was earning the extraordinary income of $30,000 a year in 1916.

In the year 1922, he made his first move to Staten Island, and made the purchase that was to be the foundation of all he would accomplish in the many years ahead. S. I. purchased the Staten Island Advance, which was to become the principal voice of that island in New York City.

The rest is history. Over the years, S. I. Newhouse acquired the Newark Star Ledger; the Syracuse Herald Journal; the Syracuse Post Standard; the Jersey Journal; the Harrisburg (Pa.) Patriot; the Harrisburg News; the Portland Oregonian; the St. Louis Globe-Democrat; the Birmingham News; the Huntsville (Ala.) Times; the Huntsville News; the Springfield (Mass.) Union; the Springfield News; the Portland Oregon Journal; the New Orleans Time Picayune; the New Orleans States Item; the Mobile Press; the Mobile Register; the Mississippi Press; the Cleveland Plain Dealer; eight Booth papers in Michigan; the Ann Arbor News; the Bay City Times; the Flint Journal; the Grand Rapids Press; the Jackson Citizen Patriot; the Kalamazoo Gazette; the Muskegon Chronicle; and the Saginaw News.

Magazines: Parade supplement; Vogue; Glamor; House and Garden; Mademoiselle; Self; Gentleman Quarterly; Brides; British Vogue; British Brides; British House and Garden; French Vogue; Maison et Jardin; Italian Vogue; Australian Vogue.

Plus six televisions stations and five radio stations.

Over three quarters of a century, S. I. Newhouse developed, expanded, and nurtured all of these elements of the free press, and maintained the individual editorial integrity of each outlet, allowing each one its own personality and direction, while insisting on total journalistic responsibility.

All of these are remarkable achievements, but then of course, S. I. Newhouse was a remarkable man.

From painfully poor surroundings he rose, provided a living for thousands upon thousands as he did so. His was the American dream, and it brought blessings to many.

As the Samuel I. Newhouse ferry journeys the waters of the New York Harbor, it will serve as a reminder in later years, to a generation yet unborn, of the contribution of its namesake.

With great pleasure, I submit to my fellow Members of this body the name and the memory of Samuel I. Newhouse, a child of America, and an example to all that this country still holds the promise of the future.●

NATIONAL TASTE AND SMELL DISEASE AWARENESS DAY

HON. DONALD J. MITCHELL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Speaker, today, I have introduced a joint resolution, a measure authorizing the President to proclaim March 21, 1983 as "National Taste and Smell Disease Awareness Day."

According to a 1981 survey, it is estimated that the lives of 16 million Americans are affected by the loss or dysfunction of two of their five senses, the senses of taste and smell.

Taste and smell dysfunctions present hidden handicaps. There are no outward signs of these problems, but for the affected individuals, danger, anxiety and fears for personal safety are often present. Accidental poisoning from spoiled food, or the inability to detect gas fumes in home or car can result in personal harm or even death. For the victim of taste or smell disorders, the smell of smoke as a sign of fire is nonexistent. Unable to taste or smell, a person is robbed of vital protective senses. A distorted sense of taste or smell can make even the most precious rose or the most delectable food become repugnant and repulsive. Taste and smell dysfunctions can also be symptoms of underlying diseases and they can occur as side effects of taking even common drugs.

Despite the magnitude of these medical and personal problems, there remains a widespread lack of understanding and knowledge about these diseases. Precious few resources—facilities, trained medical personnel or scientific knowledge—exist to cope with taste and smell disease. There are no textbooks on the subject. No courses are taught in medical schools. Physicians are frequently unable to care for taste and smell disease patients since most are unfamiliar with the disorders and, therefore, have no understanding or their diagnosis or treatment.

The epidemiology of these disorders is also not clearly understood. However, a recent national survey indicated a disproportionate number of people with these diseases living in California, New York, Florida, and Pennsylvania.

The causes of loss or dysfuntion are complex, cutting across various medical disciplines. According to Dr. Robert I. Henkin of the Georgetown University Medical Center, a pioneer in the field of taste and smell diseases:

They occur frequently following influenza, head trauma, radiation therapy to the oral cavity and with allergic rhinitis (inflammation of mucous membranes). They also occur for reasons that are not known. There are also underlying conditions such as metabolic diseases, nutritional disorders, reaction to therapeutic drugs and exposure to various chemicals and toxic vapors. Symtoms may appear as early warning signs of cancer, diabetes, hypothyroidism or deficiencies of vitamins and minerals. And there are unknown or congenital reasons why an individual loses these senses.

The Taste and Smell Foundation, a nonprofit, tax-exempt organization, established by a group of individuals suffering from these diseases, is supporting the operation of the Nation's first taste and smell clinic, at the Georgetown University Medical Center, where on a regular basis, patients suffering the loss or dysfunction of these senses can receive medical treatment on an intensive, interdisciplinary research basis. The foundation is committed to the growth and expansion of scientific, medical, and public attention to human taste and smell dysfunctions.

Although the foundation has taken a step in the right direction, the road to better awareness of taste and smell disease remains a long one. Research is needed to learn more about the anatomy, physiology, biochemistry, and pathology of these disorders. Improved access to diagnostic and therapeutic services is essential. An educational program for the medical and lay publics should be established to provide the latest and best possible information to meet the needs of both a growing patient and medical practitioner population.

Toward the goal of improved awareness of these disorders, I offer this resolution calling for March 21, 1983, to be proclaimed, "National Taste and Smell Disease Awareness Day."

The text of the resolution follows:

H.J. RES. 590

To authorize and request the President to proclaim March 21, 1983, as "National Taste and Smell Disease Awareness Day"

Whereas the lives of an estimated 16 million Americans are affected by the loss or dysfunction of their senses of taste and smell;

Whereas taste and smell dysfunctions are often hidden handicaps which present no outward sign of disease but present danger, anxiety, and fear of personal safety for those affected;

Whereas there is a widespread lack of understanding or knowledge about taste and smell diseases in spite of the magnitude of the problem;

Whereas medical science is on the threshold of breakthroughs in the field of taste and smell diseases through the pioneering work of medical professionals such as Dr. Robert I. Henkin of the Taste and Smell Foundation at Georgetown University Medical Center; and

Whereas a national public awareness program needs to be launched to enhance public knowledge of these serious disorders and offer those afflicted an awareness of the availability of medical care and comfort: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating March 21, 1983, as "National Taste and Smell Disease Awareness Day", and inviting the Governors and chief officials of State and local governments of the United States to issue similar proclamations. The President is further requested to include in such proclamation an invitation calling upon the press, radio, television, and other communications media, the health care professions, and all other agencies and individuals concerned with diseases affecting the senses of taste and smell, to observe that day with public activities in order to impress upon the people of the United States the importance of improved research on, and treatment of, taste and smell diseases, and in order to urge the people of the United States to support programs to improve services to those afflicted with such diseases.●

DOD AUTHORIZATION COMMENTARY

HON. DON BONKER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, when all is said and done, historians will record that the Reagan administration did not reduce Federal spending or balance the budget—it merely transferred huge expenditures from the domestic to the military side of the ledger.

Recently, the House of Representatives had the opportunity to examine carefully the administration's proposed Department of Defense authorization for fiscal year 1983. Instead of giving some direction to a Reagan rearmament plan that lacks coherence, the House decided essentially to rubberstamp what was placed before it. Few spending cuts were made and the most destabilizing, security endangering weapons systems were left in place. The House had the opportunity to make spending reductions which would have helped both to revitalize the economy and to enhance our national security. Regrettably, that opportunity was ignored.

The economic consequences of this massive buildup will be great. Contrary to popular myth, military spending is not good for the economy. A dollar spent on arms generates far less economic growth than a dollar spent on civilian programs. For example, $1 billion spent on the MX missile would generate an estimated 14,000 jobs; spending the same amount to promote retail trade or education would generate over 60,000 jobs. We must not forget that the strongest defense America has is a vigorous and expanding economy.

When one excludes the social security trust fund and interest on the national debt, the Reagan administration proposes to spend fully 50 percent of the Federal budget on its massive military buildup. Defense experts are rightly concerned that such a huge amount cannot be spent wisely and efficiently in such a short period of time. The increase in Pentagon spending reminds one of what conservatives accused liberals of doing in the 1960's—throwing money at the problem.

The funding of two programs—the B-1B bomber and the C-5 military transport plane—seemed particularly incredible to me. Both are clearly inefficient and wasteful.

Congress authorized the $4.8 billion that the administration requested for funding for the B-1B bomber. The Nation is now committed to building 100 of these bombers of dubious military value at the greatly inflated cost of $400 million a piece. President Carter and Congress wisely canceled the bomber in 1977 because of its exorbitant cost and uncertain capability for penetration improved Soviet air defenses. Instead, the decision was made to equip our existing B-52's with cruise missiles, at far lower cost, which could be safely launched well outside the Soviet reach.

Now, these warplanes will be acquired even though they will soon be rendered useless by advances in Soviet air defenses and by the upcoming production of the improved Stealth bomber. I am disappointed that the House rejected the opportunity to dump this expensive, soon to be obsolete, bomber.

The House also turned back an amendment to eliminate funding for the defect-plagued, overpriced C-5 military airlift and to replace it with funding for the acquisition of commercially available cargo planes, principally the Boeing 747. Even though the 747 alternative offered life-cycle savings of $7.9 billion over the Lockheed C-5 for essentially the same airlfit capability, the House, under extreme pressure from the President, the Pentagon, and Lockheed lobbyists, voted to fund the C-5. Another opportunity to save the taxpayer's dollars was thus wasted.

What concerns me as much or more as the money wasted are the consequences of procuring some of these new weapons for the real security of our Nation. Several highly destabilizing weapons systems, systems which would actually reduce our security and increase the chances of war if deployed, were proposed by the administration and, regrettably, approved by the House of Representatives. Two that I voted against as not in the Nation's best interest were procurement of the MX and Trident II missiles.

The MX, if deployed, would actually undermine strategic stability, because the Soviet Union would likely view it as an offensive weapon, providing the U.S. with a first strike capability. The MX will only increase Soviet fears, driving them toward a dangerous launch-on-warning policy or even toward consideration of a preemptive strike.

Moreover, the administration is planning to spend $2.6 billion just this year on the MX missile even though no final decision has been made on its basing mode. The President does not know where he wants to put this dangerous, destabilizing weapons system, but he does know that he wants to spend billions of taxpayers' dollars on it.

Production of the Trident II missile will also undermine American security. The Trident II, because of its low trajectory and tremendous accuracy would likely force the Soviet Union to adopt a launch-on-warning policy. It would arrive at the Soviet targets so quickly that the potential for an accidental confrontation, perhaps because of computer error, would be greatly increased. It is in our best interest that the Soviet Union have an adequate warning time. the Trident II missile would deprive them and us of that crucial buffer.

Furthermore, money planned to be spent on the destabilizing Trident II missile could alone finance the production of 14 additional Trident submarines equipped with the more stabilizing Trident I missiles. Certainly that shift in funding would be a safer and more cost-effective deterrent to nuclear war.

In sum, the massive arms buildup proposed by the Reagan administration and largely approved by the Congress will have two principle effects. First, it will threaten the vitality of our already struggling economy. Money spent on the military rather than in other sectors of the economy will help to exacerbate already unacceptable unemployment. Second, funds diverted to the highly destabilizing weapons for which the President seems to have a special affinity, will have, ironically, the effect of reducing our national security. By forcing the Soviet Union to adopt a launch-on-warning policy by producing and deploying these new and dangerous weapons systems, we are only bringing ourselves closer to the abyss of nuclear war.

I urge the House not to squander our next opportunity, to examine critically, and to improve the military budget.

Mr. Speaker, I have had printed below a recent editorial from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer which echos my thoughts on this subject. I recommend it to my colleagues.

DEFENSE BUDGET POSES A DANGER

Congress appears about to pass a 1983 defense authorization bill in excess of $175 billion—some $45 billion higher than the amount being spent in the current year. For a couple of reasons, we have grave reservations.

The first reason is the impact on the economy. The recession continues in large part because of high interest rates, and interest rates stay high in large part because of marketplace expectations of continued huge federal deficits—perhaps $140 billion to $160 billion a year for the next several years. The deficit, of course, is the gap between tax revenues and government spending. Taxes have been cut to spark a recovery that never came, but the only spending cuts were in nonmilitary areas. Military spending will be going up by 35 percent.

The second reason is waste. Conservatives are fond of accusing liberals of "throwing money at problems." The defense authorization covering the year starting Oct. 1 seems to offer a number of examples of doing just that.

Take the MX missile system. The budget contains $3.7 billion for this system of land-based intercontinental ballistic missiles to replace the current Minuteman system, which is supposedly vulnerable to a Soviet first strike. But there isn't even a plan for basing the MX. What is the justification for earmarking money when they don't even know how to use it?

The bill also contains $4 billion for the highly questionable B-1 bomber, headed for early obsolescence. Compared to these huge sums, the $252 million to be wasted on the mindless civil defense plan to shuffle people in places like Seattle off to places like Yakima, while the Russians presumably brood about whether they will attack, is a tiny amount. Yet it is still waste.

The Senate and House have passed somewhat different versions of the defense authorization bill. The Senate version totals $177.9 billion and the House version $175 billion. They also have yet to reach agreement on a number of important issues, such as whether the Air Force will buy Boeing 747s or Lockheed C-5s. Nevertheless the fact that the two bills are so close suggests that the final tally will be $175 billion or more.

There is one possibility, suggested the other day by Alice Rivlin, director of the Congressional Budget Office. She said Congress could go back and take a whole new look at the budget, including military spending, in light of continued gloomy economic news. The idea is sound.

This nation, unfortunately, needs a strong defense. But it needs a strong economy as well. Simply ballooning the defense budget does not guarantee the first goal, and it may seriously jeopardize the second.●

IN MEMORY OF FRANK CHELF

SPEECH OF

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

Wednesday, September 8, 1982

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my sympathies to the family of our former colleague, Frank Chelf, who died on September 1. Frank was a warm and dear friend to me as we served together on the Judiciary Committee. An Army Air Corps veteran of World War II, Frank Chelf entered politics in Kentucky after the war because of his deep commitment to serve his country. He was a man of principle who was willing to work very hard for causes he believed were right. As a member of the Judiciary Committee's Immigration Subcommittee, Frank made a lasting contribution to our immigration laws, working to bring greater fairness to the way immigrants are allowed into the country. Frank had been an orphan, and he worked hard to permit those children orphaned in World War II to find a home in the United States. His compassion and fairness were well known and respected by his colleagues in the House, and we were sorry to see him retire in 1967 after 22 years of distinguished service.

Frank Chelf loved his home State of Kentucky and he loved his country. His service as a veteran and statesman reflected his great love, and I am proud to have been his friend.●

A TRIBUTE TO SGT. ELEANOR JEFFERSON HALL

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I pay a special tribute to Sgt. Eleanor Jefferson Hall who recently retired from the St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department. Sergeant Hall's remarkable contribution of service is deserving of public recognition for her career with the department was a highly distinguished and noteworthy one.

On Friday, August 6, 1982, Sergeant Hall terminated a love affair with the St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department. It was truly a love affair which began October 15, 1956, when Sergeant Hall raised her hand and took the oath of office to protect the life and property of all of the citizens of the city of St. Louis. From the very beginning, Sergeant Hall possessed the necessary qualities to become a productive and outstanding police officer because she cared about people.

Eleanor Helen Jefferson was born in Clarksdale, Miss., and, later with her parents, relocated in St. Louis, Mo., where she was educated in the St. Louis public schools. Upon completion of high school, Eleanor enrolled in the School of Charm and Modeling for she had and has always exhibited and practiced self-improvement. This is a quality which she brought with her to the police department and still possesses. She was a radiant and inspirational beacon for both young people as well as older adults during the entire period of her 26 years of service.

Sergeant Hall became a probationary patrolman on October 15, 1956, and upon graduating from the academy, she was assigned to the juvenile division where she immediately became a refreshing asset. She not only explained the pitfalls of self-destruction by living outside of the law but insisted upon self-pride and improvement to all individuals whom she encountered.

Her professonal manner and commitment to high standards resulted in her becoming the second female to ever achieve the rank of sergeant in the St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department. She, too, served meritoriously in a number of demanding assignments in various divisions throughout the department including the juvenile, narcotic, morality, gambling, public affairs, and uniform line divisions. In each of these assignments, she performed in a highly credible and outstanding manner and sought to enhance her background through study at local universities.

Sergeant Hall's achievements extend beyond the St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department and she has received numerous citations and letters of commendation for superior work.

Sergeant Hall is married to Mr. Lee F. Hall and they are the proud parents of three lovely daughters: Erma Jean, Adria, and Geraldine. Their children constitute the centerpiece of their lives.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in Sgt. Eleanor Jefferson Hall we have a lady for "all seasons" who has demonstrated the power of love, wisdom of the ages, the beauty of family solidarity, the love of children, and above all a guardian of the law and social justice and an abiding faith and love for her native land.

I am pleased to cite her as an unusual American who cares profoundly about people and human possibilities. All of us are enriched and inspired by the extraordinary example of Sgt. Eleanor Jefferson Hall. I am sure that all Members of the Congress join me in congratulating Sergeant Hall on her retirement and her remarkable contribution of service.

To Sergeant Hall, I extend my warmest best wishes, Godspeed, good health, and personal fulfillment as she undertakes other interests of her choosing.●

A NEW SCHOOL YEAR—CHALLENGES AHEAD FOR HANDICAPPED EDUCATION

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, the week after Labor Day signifies the beginning of the new school year across the Nation. It is a time when schoolchildren can look forward to a new year of learning and challenges. However, for the 4 million handicapped children served under Public Law 94-142, the Education of the Handicapped Act, this new school year threatens to be fraught with attempts to take away their right to attend classes along with their nonhandicapped peers.

On August 4, the Department of Education issued proposed rules revising programs under Public Law 94-142, landmark legislation which has brought handicapped children into the mainstream of the classroom and has no longer relegated them to learn in separate facilities away from their nonhandicapped peers. As one of the original authors of this legislation, I can attest to the kinds of conditions that these children were once forced into and the progress they have made since this program has been in effect since 1977.

It is this kind of progress in education that prompted me to introduce House Resolution 558, legislation which urges that these rules, in their proposed form, be rejected. Clearly, at a time when appropriations for Public Law 94-142 have not grown consistent with the original intent of the law, coupled with drastic cuts in other Federal education programs, relief is needed by local school districts. In my own city of New York, it costs nearly $10,000 a year to educate a handicapped child. Of this cost, less than $250 is provided by Federal funds—the remainder is provided through State and local tax levy tax dollars. Relief can and must be provided to local jurisdictions in the absence of dollars. However, this relief cannot fly in the face of the intent of the law and the rights of handicapped children—and their parents—must be preserved.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I am including the text of House Resolution 558 as well as the list of Members who have added their names as cosponsors and urge others to join us as well.

H. RES. 558

Resolution expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that regulations recently proposed by the Secretary of Education under the Education of the Handicapped Act should not be permitted to take effect

Whereas the amendments to the Education of the Handicapped Act made by the Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975 (Public Law 94-142) have been the cornerstone of educational rights for more than 4,000,000 handicapped children; and

Whereas the intent of the Congress to provide a free, appropriate public education to all handicapped children must be preserved; and

Whereas this education has been secured since 1977 when regulations under the Education of the Handicapped Act were prescribed; and

Whereas regulations proposed by the Secretary of Education in a notice of proposed rulemaking published on August 4, 1982, seek to alter essential related services to children served by the Education of the Handicapped Act, limit the access of handicapped children to regular classroom instruction with nonhandicapped children, and alter the role of parents in assisting in the development of educational programs for their handicapped children, as well as limit the role of States and local schools in providing services to handicapped children under such Act; and

Whereas any changes in current regulations must be made only after a thorough examination by the Congress and the public: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that—

(1) regulations relating to assistance to States for the education of handicapped children, proposed by the Secretary of Education in a notice of proposed rulemaking published on August 4, 1982 (47 Federal Register 33835 et seq.), should be rejected in their present form and should not be permitted to take effect during any period in which the Congress is in recess; and

(2) the provisions of section 431 of the General Education Provisions Act, which provide a procedure for congressional disapproval of all education regulations, apply in this instance, and the Congress should use this procedure for disapproval if final regulations proposed by the Secretary of Education seek to dilute congressional intent in administering the Education of the Handicapped Act.

STATEN ISLAND MID-ISLAND GIRL'S SOFTBALL TEAM

HON. GUY V. MOLINARI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to honor a group of my constituents, whose fortitude and team spirit should be a lesson to us all. The Staten Island Mid-Island Little League girl's team, composed of 10–12-year-olds, entered the 1982 Little League Softball World Series, rising above 15,000 other teams to enter the celebrated event. On August 20, needing only one game to win, they were defeated by 1 to 0 by a Glendale, Calif., team. On the following day they lost once again by the narrow margin of 2 to 1.

The two games, played in Kalamazoo, Mich., ended their hopes of being the world champions.

For many months, the girls had held the dream of being the best in the country—their hard fought climb to the top established several records. They are the first team ever, in New York State or New York City, to reach the finals, and to lose after going so far was a crushing blow to these young ladies from Staten Island, but they are the children of several generations of Staten Islanders who have fought the good fight, and they won their share of battles, sometimes against what seemed to be overwhelming odds. As the sting of defeat wore off, these fine youngsters rallied, realizing that reaching the finals is an honor that very few can share.

In many ways, these girls personify this great country of ours, their spirit that took them to the top, and despite what I consider to be a minor setback, have returned to Staten Island fired with enthusiasm for that not too distant game when they will win. I am proud of their tremendous effort, their indomitable courage and their sense of fair play.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to enter their names in the RECORD, so that all may know of their achievement: Ellie Traino; Renee Annucci; Laurie Falcone; Florence Inciardi; Denise Lorelli; Jodi Kulak; Regina Diel; Dawn Roloph; Dawn McCann; Ann Marie Giamundo; Julie Fleschner; Carolyn Anarumo; Keri Ann Dugan; and Susan Pepe.

And, of course, Coach Jack Hurley, Manager Sandy Gonchar and the team's families, who fired the spirit that took them to such great heights. Speaking for all Staten Islanders, let me say that we do not consider the Middle Island Little League girl's team as losers, but as winners in every sense of the word. We all share the same deep pride in their outstanding accomplishments.●

A RETURN TO AMERICAN IDEALS "ONE MAN'S CHARLESTON"

HON. THOMAS F. HARTNETT

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, few people recognize major shifts in policy as we plod through a life of inperceptable change. I recently received a very thought-provoking article by Tom Hamrick printed in the Charleston News and Courier on August 8, 1982. I want to share it with my colleagues in the hope that the commonsense views of this pundit might provide to be enlightening and serve as a mutual reference point of where to begin, as we consider the need for new and meaningful legislation.

ONE MAN'S CHARLESTON

(By Tom Hamrick)

I don't know about you, but I am frightened that the U.S. as it once existed is no more, and that our toboggan ride into the pit may now be so quickened that we can't stop an inevitable disaster. I am terribly concerned that time is running out and tomorrow's skolars may compare a short-lived America to a Roman Empire which also bought its way into oblivion with bread and circuses.

I am sickened that I live in "one nation under God" where a simple prayer has been banned in our skules by a Supreme Court I've long quit trusting to always act in the best interests of the Silent Majority. I do not feel these prayers should be secular . . . they shouldn't . . . but Gentile or Jew, surely we all owe a debt of gratitude which could at least be expressed in silent thanks in the classroom. (And was there ever anything more un-American than taking the traditional Christmas pageant out of skule?)

I am tired of turning on my teleset and hearing a mournful local commentator spill tears over some mama (wed or unwed) who tells the tube she can "hardly feed seven head" of children on her welfare aid, and then report her eighth production is due soon. Why should responsible citizens pinch pennies in planned parenthod, and then be forced to also pick up a piece of the tab for uncaring femmes who turn their bodies into welfare slot machines?

I am disgusted with a runaway fed budget soaring out of kilter . . . while so many of the people we send to Congress lack the gutz to put our house in order.

I am frightened that crime is out of control . . . when the cause is ridiculously simple: the handcuffs are on the cop instead of the crud. And I couldn't care less if Public Defender Mark Archer doesn't have all the funds he needs to keep the garbage out of the can. I am tired of delayed trials and the technical loopholes which are craftily exploited by unconscionable attorneys to free the guilty. If we lack cells, let's put our thugs in tents. If soldiers can live under canvas, so can the scum.

I am totally turned off with college athletix, when we hire semi-literate jocks and ease them thru skule with crip courses in basket-weaving and hopscotch. It is past time that college sports return to amateur status, with competing athletes made eligible only on basis of respectable grade averages in a standard curriculum. Let's stop turning classroom clods into Saturday's gods.

I am appalled by our skyrocketing gimmecracy . . . which has created an army of shiftless Americans which feels that other people who toil should guarantee them daily survival which doesn't require the lift of a finger . . . except to autograf a welfare check . . . Before the Great Giveaway came along, there were a lot of 14-y-o kids like me peddling newspapers on streetcorners, reared by divorcee mothers who refused alimony and welfare, and who proudly worked as sales clerks to keep gritz on the table of a walk-up flat. And that was the real American Way, before pols began passing out the freebies which destroy initiative and responsibility.

And I grow ill when I hear about foodstamps being spent for Pepsis, Oreos and select steaks, or gambled away, and realize that a lot of us eat less meat (or no meat at all) to finance the frivolities of others. And then there are also those millions of $$$s we scatter (and often waste) on skule and summer feeding programs because Congress feels today's youths can't survive on the same peanut butter sandwiches which kindled yesterday's student bodies.

I am tired of hearing that we lack the gelt to replace a bridge or hwy . . . and yet we have mountains of moolah to dump into El Salvador, or Shana, or Israel, or Togoland, and other pieces of geography big and small, in an effort to buy friendships which often end in one-way streets when the chips are down.

I suffer the doldroms when I pay my income taxes in full, while others avoid detection by accepting cash under the counter. Really, now, shouldn't we consider replacing our hit-and-miss income tax with state/fed sales taxes, to insure that each of us . . . individually or industrially . . .

shares the burden whenever we buy a loaf of bread or a pint of Pabst or import a ton of steel?

I am depressed that half of America's teen-age blax are unemployed, and yet there is total silence from so-called black leadership in pressuring D/C to lift a $3.35 hrly wage barrier which is denying them a foot on the ladder, particularly in the ranks of dropouts who face a career on the increasingly crushing dole.

I am dismayed by gigantic campaigns to enroll the illiteri as voters, and I have large doubts that our foredads ever intended that sheep be taxied to the polls to mindlessly ditto a "recommended slate" of candidates they know little or nothing about, except they've been endorsed by some wardheeler. I also worry much that we are all losing, B&W, as our local two-party system is increasingly split into two opposing racial camps, white against black.

I am disheartened that so many of our deserving aged are forced into circumstances of embarrassed poverty, while we always have taxbux for bigger and costlier givvecrat programs designed to help those who will not help themselves.

I am ashamed that we impose so little control over multi-million-$$$ spending for black-oriented medicine that we allow costly health programs to be converted into black job centers managed by hi-salaried but unqualified big shots, at the expense of the aged and ailing for whom taxland appropriated the funds. And I wonder if some of the people we appoint to supervise these operations as board mbrs are paying attention . . . or even care.

I am not proud of today's unionism, which has put pay ahead of production and cost us our world mkts, which enables our teachers to escape accountability in the classroom, and which argues that misfits in union ranks must be protected forever, so long as they tally their wkly dues.

And I cannot understand why Congress discourages thrift by imposing tall taxes on nest eggs, thereby denying banks a prime resource for the lower-cost loans needed to revive the economy.

Sure, thousands of you agree. But, meantime, honey, us Good Guys are getting the hell beat out of us because we're all waiting for the Other Guy to scream first . . . Sad, ain't it?●

A VICTIM OF CURRENT POLICY SPEAKS OUT

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, recently Michael P. Smith of Marion, Ill., visited me. He is a cerebral palsy victim, 30 years old, trying to get by on extremely limited SSI and food stamp assistance.

I am inserting into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter which he sent to me which illustrates how the least fortunate in our society are being hurt by our present policies. This is not fair and does not make sense.

I hope my colleagues in the House and Senate will read this and I hope some people in the administration will read it also. What we are doing is we are saving money in too many instances at the expense of the people who can least afford it.

MARION, ILL.
June 25, 1982.

DEAR SIR: I'm writing to draw your attention to a situation of vital importance to me: Living.

Please allow me to take a few minutes of your time to explain what I mean. I am handicapped, I have Cerebral Palsy. I am thirty years old, divorced, and live alone. I receive Supplemental Security Income (S.S.I.), Food Stamps, Medicaid Benefits, and I live in a Federal Housing Project. I am unemployed, although I would like to work if I could find someone who would hire me and pay me enough to make a living. I am a bookkeeper.

I now receive $264.70 per month S.S.I., $32 per month Food Stamps, and I pay $60.00 per month for rent.

Beginning July 1, 1982, I will receive $284.30 per month S.S.I., $27 per month Food Stamps, and my rent will still be $60 per month.

The increase in S.S.I., of $19.60 or 7.4% is due to an increase in the cost of living. The reduction in Food Stamps of $5.00 or 15.5% is due to an increase in income. What this all boils down to is this: My total resources (S.S.I. and Food Stamps) before any expenses are now $296.70 per month. After July 1, 1982, my total resources will be $311.30 per month, or an increase of $14.60 per month or 4.9%.

What I want to know is this: What happened to the 7.4% cost of living increase? Why can't there be a coinciding increase in Food Stamps? An increase of $2.00 or 6.2% in my Food Stamps would increase my total resources $21.60 per month or 7.2%. That seems more fair than 4.9%, doesn't it?

I hope you can see what I've been trying to explain. Please help introduce and pass legislation to raise Food Stamp apportionments at the same rate and time as the cost of living increases on government checks.

I am quite sure that, if you stop to consider all the billions of dollars in Foreign Aid and refugee relief that this country gives away, this is not too much to ask of you for a fellow American.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL P. SMITH.●

ASSURING THAT HELP IS ONLY A BEEP AWAY

HON. MARGARET M. HECKLER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Speaker, as the primary sponsor of H.R. 3921, legislation to provide coverage under medicare for personal emergency response services, I would like to share with my colleagues an article which underlines the need for such authorization. This article, "When Life's at Your Fingertips," appeared in the August 22 issue of Parade.

Written by Lawrence Galton, the article demonstrates, by case histories, how the lives of the impaired elderly are enhanced, and even saved, by having medical assistance "only a beep away." Following is the text of the article:

[From Parade, Aug. 22, 1982]

WHEN LIFE'S AT YOUR FINGERTIPS

(By Lawrence Galton)

Mary Calkins, 57 years old, was home alone when she fell out of her wheelchair a few months ago. Unable to move, she would have been left helpless—except for a little wireless transmitter device in her pocket.

By pressing a button, Mrs. Calkins set in motion a system that immediately signaled an emergency center in Cincinnati's Bethesda Hospital. Within five minutes, a neighbor—alerted by the hospital—was there to help.

That system, called Lifeline, is being used by more than 12,000 people across the country. It has been shown to improve the health and quality of life of the elderly and disabled of all ages as well as to cut medical costs. People who would otherwise have to be institutionalized can now remain independent, says Sue Campbell, the Lifeline coordinator at Bethesda Hospital, where the system is hooked up to the homes of 150 people.

Lifeline is more than a lifesaver, says Dr. Carlos Castellon, director of the department of emergency medicine at Lee Hospital in Johnstown, Pa. "It's a companion, a source of psychological comfort."

Here's how Lifeline works: A wireless transmitter, carried in a pocket or attached to clothing, sends messages to a communicator in a home phone, which then automatically calls the hospital or other community agency where monitored equipment has been set up. The emergency response center has an information card for each Lifeline user listing medical condition and people to be called in an emergency. These are backed up by community service providers such as an ambulance service and police.

In addition, the telephone communicator incorporates an automatic timer. If no phone calls are made or received within a 12- or 24-hour period and the timer has not been reset manually, a "time-out" call is made to the hospital.

Lifeline was designed by Dr. Andrew S. Dibner, a geronotology specialist. In 1972, he got the idea for a timer that would call for help automatically and developed it with the aid of engineers. Before it was widely offered, a federally financed three-year study found that Lifeline users were less anxious, slept better and were more satisfied with their lives than nonusers. They also saved money. Lifeline users averaged one day a year of nursing home care, compared to 13 days for nonusers. The annual savings in institutional care costs averaged $1400 per user.

Since completion of the study in 1979, more than 400 Lifeline programs have been started in 46 states. Typically, they are operated by hospitals. Volunteers usually install the equipment in homes and instruct users, who may number up to 250 at one time. Hospital auxiliaries often finance the system. The charge to clients—$10 a month—may be scaled down to meet their financial abilities. And legislation has been introduced to provide medicare coverage for the service.

A recent survey of programs across the country shows that the average Lifeline client is 75 and that 75 percent are women. Most live alone and have mobility problems. Falls, frequently in the bathtub, are the most common emergency, with heart attacks next. "Time-out" emergencies—when the system automatically calls for help—occur about 5 percent of the time.

Lifeline has been useful in many kinds of situations. In Boston, for example, a young woman with severe brittle diabetes has been saved from five coma-induced emergencies in the last three years. And at St. Joseph's Memorial Hospital in Kokomo, Ind., Lifeline is part of a monitoring system for infants judged susceptible to crib death. If the monitor signals an interruption of breathing, parents immediately press a button, and a medical team is dispatched from the hospital.

The beep-beep sound made by the transmitter button has even discouraged would-be intruders.

Says Kass Bolshaw, Lifeline coordinator at the Marian Health Center in Sioux City, Iowa: "I know one thing. If my own parents were in a position where they might need Lifeline, I would certainly install it."

For further information about Lifeline, including specific programs, write: Lifeline Systems Inc., 400 Main St., Dept. P. Waltham, Mass. 02254.●

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, the effort of private industry to voluntarily institute affirmative action programs is taking place thoughout our Nation without much fanfare. I am proud of the fact that a major corporation in my district of New Jersey, Merck & Co. of Rahway, has initiated one of the Nation's most extensive affirmative action communications programs to demonstrate how equal opportunity can create a better work environment for everyone and lead to progress for the company as well.

Merck, one of the Nation's largest health products firms, has made day-long forums the cornerstone of an extensive affirmative action training program called phase III. It is believed to be the first such program to include the entire work force of a major corporation. In Merck's case, this amounts to 16,000 people at 61 plants, administrative, and sales locations throughout the United States. Earlier phases of the company's affirmative action awareness program reached down only to the supervisory level.

Explained John J. Horan, chairman and chief executive officer.

> We want to communicate Merck's affirmative action commitment to every single employee and to demonstrate how our equal opportunity policy and practices create benefits for all employees. It is our belief that this program will help Merck people create a more open work environment—one in which each employee will be more effective because his or her individual worth is recognized and respected.

Merck hopes its new program will actually impact on the day-to-day work environment of its people. The company established an office of equal employment affairs 14 years ago and conducted two previous communications programs relating to affirmative action. The first, in 1977, involved all executives and managers and the second, in 1979, involved supervisors, shop stewards and union officials.

"Phase III's debate without fear of censure gives our employees a unique learning experience," explained Walter R. Trosin, Merck's vice president for human resources. "They now have a vehicle to examine, discover and dispel misconceptions and prejudices that cloud affirmative action and its benefits.

"If we can remove barriers to a more supportive work environment, each employee becomes more capable of reaching his or her full potential. The individual progresses, and the company does as well."

The phase III program is still underway, though more than three-quarters of Merck's U.S. employees have participated in the no-holds-barred discussions on sensitive subjects of race and sex bias. The company believes its pioneering human relations project is a success. According to Stephen M. Darien, Merck's executive director of U.S. personnel relations:

> It has led to greater understanding of our affirmative action program and to better communication between people at all levels of the company. I think it encourages respect for the rights and feelings of coworkers and fosters a more cooperative and productive atmosphere.

Nine of every 10 participants to date not only rate the program as good to excellent, but report they have a clearer view of Merck's goals and polices, a questionnaire survey shows.

The program has another novel aspect. Instead of using professional trainers, the company has recruited and trained 1,000 of its line managers to act as discussion leaders. They preside over small group sessions limited to 10 to 15 persons.

The openness of the sessions has greatly enhanced communications and understanding among employees and supervisors. So much so, said B. Lawrence Branch, director of corporate equal employment affairs, that even people thought by their coworkers to be aloof are drawn into telling of work-related problems.

Merck reports that 69 percent of phase III participants said they felt more positive about the company's equal employment and affirmative action program as a result of the training. While 3 percent said their feelings about affirmative action were more negative than before, some 28 percent felt the same as before training, many noting that their attitudes had been positive. "The change in attitude expressed by more than two-thirds of the people undergoing the training shows that voluntary action programs of this kind can be dramatically effective," Mr. Darien said.●

THOUGHTS OF NUCLEAR EXTINCTION

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, over the years we have learned to live with the bomb simply by not thinking about it. In debating nuclear weapons, we can easily forget the horrible devastation they would bring to this planet.

Fortunately, the nuclear freeze movement across this country is waking up the American public to the dangers of nuclear war and to the fact that the Reagan administration's nuclear arms buildup leads us closer to the threat of nuclear war.

I would like to commend to my colleagues an article written by Mary Janes Hayes in the June 7, 1982, issue of the Patriot Ledger of Massachusetts. It provides a very personal and valuable account of what nuclear extinction would mean to one person:

[From the Patriot Ledger, June 7, 1982]

LET US RETREAT FROM THRUST TOWARD EXTINCTION

(By Mary Jane Hayes)

When I consider what I read in the papers—that costs for many social programs will be held down or cut, while defense spending on tanks and bombers and missiles, and many another means of destroying our fellow humans will rise from $183 billion in 1982 to $216 in 1983; that the Reagan administration will ask Congress to more than double military aid for El Salvador next year in addition to hinting that U.S. troops might be employed; that the president told Congress Feb. 8 that production of new lethal nerve gas weapons "is essential to the national interest," thus clearing the way for an end to a nearly 13-year-old moratorium on their manufacture; above all, that notwithstanding the United States and the Soviet Union between them have 16,000 nuclear warheads, enough to pulverize the earth and yet Strategic Arms Reduction Talks have not begun—when I consider all this preoccupation with death—this emphasis on confrontation instead of communication—this bearing of us inexorably and against our will toward extinction—I pause to reflect on the sweetness of my life.

I think of my family and friends, of the obligations and relations that give direction to my days. I think of my father, who was a thoughtful and articulate gentleman who set to the end of his life an example of personal integrity. I think of my mother, who is a home-making artist to her finger-tips, and who combines with her talents, pluck and staying power. I think of how that pair together succored and sheltered their young, despite the ravages of the Depression.

I think of the brother who taught me to draw and of the twin sister with whom could (and can) be shared every phase of maturing. I think of the husband who has constantly challenged me to become a fuller person than I otherwise might have been, not through words, but being the considerate man of action that he is.

I think of the two children, now young adults, it has been my privilege and charge, my anguish and joy to nurture. I think of inlaws and relatives of whom I am truly fond. Of the comrades I grew up with and with whom were enjoyed long years of croquet and Camp Fire Girls. I think of all the other people I've encountered along the way, from the noblest to the most pitiful, and especially of that handful that have made a real difference to my way of thinking or seeing or feeling. Were I never to meet another soul I could cry with a full heart: What men I've known! What women!

I think of the nature with whom I've become as intimate as if I were an Indian. I think of early rambles with my father through a local beechwood, my hand in his, his tall form moving along beside my smaller one, shafts of sunlight falling across logs and roots and clumps of mosses. From that day to this I have never ceased to love and wonder at the marvels of the physical world. Day by day, week in and week out, year after year I've walked it until nature and I have become so deeply bonded that she holds few negatives for me. I think of my appreciation of the fact that each part of her cycle is necessary and beautiful.

I think of winter with its icy light and the purity of its piercing cold; of the miracle of spring and particularly the magic of May which swells into the crescendo of summer, of autumn when trees are no longer clothed in leaves but crowned with jewels. I think of the birds in my backyard, of the blue jays so unconsciously graceful as they beat up or plummet down, of the chickadees under the protectorate of everyone's tenderness, and of the squirrels who outwit every baffle my brain can devise.

I think of my garden and yard and the therapy and esthetic gratification they provide, from the picking up of twigs in March to the covering over of the border in November for its annual slumber. I think how mine is not a sentimental love; for I have been tossed viciously about in skies in the days when I was an airline stewardess, and often on the high seas, now that I am a sailor. I understand perfectly well what Camus meant by the indifference of nature, but I love her not a whit the less because of it.

I think of the books that have guided, inspired, entertained and cheered me beyond the describing—from the folk and fairy tales of my youth to the volumes that have become part of my bones and blood as an adult. I think of the impassioned letters of Vincent van Gogh to his brother, Theo; of the novels of George Eliot and Thomas Hardy; of the essays of Emerson; of poems of Emily Dickson and William Wordworth.

I think how charmed I am by youngsters, by the sons and daughters of my neighbors who move me constantly to affection and delight.

I think of the dogs I've adored, from our first pet, named "Shep," (as disreputable a mutt as ever toured a neighborhood knocking over garbage cans and plaguing cats); through our two beagles "Rinky" and "Salty," to the 56 canines in my immediate vicinity, each of whom is a beloved acquaintance.

I think of my pleasure in great music: in Rachmaninoff, Tchaikovsky, Chopin, Brahms, and in favorite songs like "Greensleeves" and "Eidelweiss."

I think of the nine years I waited on table for a local caterer, through which I gained the satisfaction of hard physical work and the pride of serving a worthy master. (The woman who was our boss in those years had standards and the force of character to see to it that her help lived up to them.) I think of the excitements of stewardessing in the days when flying was still something of an adventure, and of the enrichments provided by travel and a viewing of the earth from an entirely new perspective. I think of several years of teaching with its confirmation that nothing mattered more than the cherishing of children. I think of the throes and agony of creative writing and the almost terrible gladness that accompanies achievement.

I think of the griefs that have granted me whatever grace of soul I possess. I think how loss, anxiety, humiliation, how uncertainty and guilt are the raw materials of compassion; how whatever fellowship in feeling I am able to extend has been forged in the dark crucible of sorrow. I think, too, of the happiness that has sprung up in me like daisies; of the golden familiar; of the blessedness of routine.

When I consider these things tears rise into my eyes from the depths of my being. It has been—it is—so inexpressibly precious. One life, mine, multiplied by millions worldwide—each unique, each precious, each endangered. And not only these, but all of those to come. Snuffed out, possibly, without their ever having had a chance to experience in all its manifestations.

We stand just at the edge of the abyss. It's not too late to retreat to the green fields of life.●

ANNOUNCING THE DEATH OF CHIEF JUDGE HERNÁN PESQUERA OF PUERTO RICO

HON. BALTASAR CORRADA

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness and grief that I communicate to the House the untimely death of the chief judge of the U.S. district court for the District of Puerto Rico, Hon. Hernán Pesquera, who died last night in Puerto Rico.

Judge Pesquera was 58 years old and was appointed to the Federal bench by President Nixon on August 21, 1972. He served with great distinction during the last 10 years devoting all his energy and exceptional talents to impart justice to those coming before the court. Judge Pesquera served as chief judge for 2 years with administrative skills. During his tenure, he saw the court grow from two to seven Federal judges in Puerto Rico. Together with the late Judge José V. Toledo, Judge Pesquera was instrumental in supporting my own efforts and those of others in 1978 to increase the number of U.S. district court judges in Puerto Rico from three to seven when Congress enacted a law to that effect.

The great ability and hard work of Judge Pesquera will be missed by the court, the bar, and the legal community. As a personal friend, I am grieved by his death.

I extend my deepest condolences to his widow, Sonia Marty de Pespuera, their children Sonia, Maria Margarita, Hernán, and Isabel Cristina, as well as all the members of the family.●

SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS OF SOLIDARITY

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, on August 28, 1982, the members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 595, celebrated their 75th anniversary in Oakland, Calif.

Since it was founded in 1907, local 595 has flourished and expanded as it protected the interests of working people in the community. Today it has 1,400 members.

In these troubled economic times, the importance of unions, serving as the voice for working people, cannot be overemphasized. I would like to congratulate Thomas J. Sweeney, business manager/financial secretary of local 595, and all the members on their fine achievements, and I wish them many more years of success.●

SENIOR CITIZEN JOBS

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. Speaker, because of a schedule conflict this morning, I was unable to deliver a prepared 1-minute speech regarding the title V program and the President's veto of the supplemental appropriations bill. I would like to include these remarks in the RECORD to indicate my strong support for the jobs program and my intention to vote to override the President's veto of H.R. 6863.

My statement follows:

Mr. Speaker, when word first got out that President Reagan wanted to eliminate Title V jobs for senior citizens, I met with a group of these workers in my congressional district. They were outraged that this administration would take away their opportunity to earn some money and to serve the needs of our community. I gave them my promise that I would fight the attempts of the Reagan administration to take away their jobs.

Eliminating Title V jobs will hurt people. It will hurt the senior citizens who hold these jobs. Many of them will be left with very minimal means of support. Many of them will also be hurt emotionally and psychologically, as the administration is in effect telling them that our country has no need of their talents and willingness to work.

The people who are now being served by Title V workers will also be hurt. They will have to go without certain services as it is unlikely that State or local governments will step in to fill the gap.

Mr. Speaker, if we are serious about keeping people employed, and if we are serious about trimming the budget without hurting the elderly, it is imperative that we vote to override the President's veto of the Supplemental Appropriations bill.●

PENSION FUND INVESTMENT IN THE RESIDENTIAL HOUSING MARKET

HON. RICHARD A. GEPHARDT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, recently the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations of the House Education Committee held field hearings on the issue of pension fund investment in the housing industry. I would like to commend the chairman of the subcommittee, PHILLIP BURTON, and the other members of the subcommittee for holding these hearings into this most important issue.

Congressman RON WYDEN prepared testimony for these hearings on his bill, H.R. 6781, the Residential Mortgage Investment Act of 1982. This legislation is designed to remove the impediments to pension fund investment in residential mortgages, one of the major issues discussed at these field hearings. This legislation has already been cosponsored by 245 Members of the House from both sides of the aisle.

I commend to my colleagues Congressman WYDEN's testimony which provides an insightful view on this issue.

CONGRESSMAN WYDEN'S TESTIMONY

Mr. Chairman, I would first like to express my sincere appreciation to you for your kind invitation to participate in this hearing.

The economic vitality of the American housing industry is of the utmost importance to me and to my constituents in the state of Oregon. The health of the Oregon economy is in large part dependent on the health of the timber, lumber, housing, and real estate industries.

Because of the longest and most severe slump in housing in more than 40 years, Oregon is experiencing its longest and most severe economic slump in more than 40 years. In many Oregon communities, the effects of the recession have been devastating, with unemployment rates running close to the worst levels experienced in the Great Depression of the 1930's.

The diagnosis of the housing industry's malaise is clear: a severe shortage of affordable mortgage capital that has driven mortgage interest rates up to unprecedented levels and priced all but a miniscule percentage of the American people out of the homebuying market.

The cure is also clear: find new sources of mortgage capital. And pension funds, both public and private, represent the largest potential new source of mortgage capital—more than $600 billion.

At the present time, only about 3 percent of this vast pool of funds is invested in housing and real estate. There is no reason why that percentage should not and can not be higher—without endangering the prudent investment of pension funds.

Mortgages and mortgage-backed securities are sound, safe and profitable investments. A recent Salomon Brothers survey showed that, over a 10 year period, mortgage securities outperformed investments such as corporate bonds and long-term U.S. Treasury notes.

Mr. Chairman, I commend you for calling this hearing to explore the various options available to those pension funds interested in diversifying their portfolios with housing investment instruments. I am convinced that your involvement and leadership in this clearly worthwhile endeavor will prove to be a real benefit to pension funds, the housing industry and the homebuying public alike.

It is fitting to hold this hearing in your home state of California, Mr. Chairman. In recent months, the State of California has developed one of the most innovative programs in the nation to encourage public pension fund investment in housing. More than $100 million has been invested in mortgage instruments so far and the results are impressive: 6,746 jobs created, $144 million in personal income and $20-million in tax revenue generated. Both candidates for governor of California this year have endorsed this program and are calling for an expansion of this type of investment.

There is no reason why a similar surge of investment by private pension funds in housing should not occur and should not have similarly impressive results in stimulating new housing construction, creating new jobs and generating new revenue.

One reason why there has not been greater private pension fund investment in housing is because the United States Department of Labor, in interpreting the Employment and Retirement Income Security Act, has seen fit to draft restrictive regulations that apply only to pension fund investment in housing and, in my view, have discouraged pension fund managers from considering mortgage investments.

Although the Department of Labor did issue several exemptions for pension plan investment in residential mortgages earlier this year, the exemptions still do not reflect the realities of the mortgage marketplace and ERISA regulations continue to restrict unnecessarily mortgage investment and continue to treat housing as a second class investment.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, Congressman Dick Gephardt, Congressman Barber Conable and I introduced a bill last month—the Residential Mortgage Investment Act—that would remove these additional arbitrary regulatory impediments and permit mortgages to compete for the attention of private pension fund managers on an equal footing with other types of investment.

This legislation (HR 6781), now pending in the Labor-Management Relations Subcommittee, has quickly attracted widespread bipartisan support in the House and now has 235 cosponsors.

Mr. Chairman, the final action taken by the Labor Department, while making some significant improvements, nevertheless continues to impose numerous additional time-consuming and costly burdens on investments in mortgage securities.

Let me take this opportunity to list what I consider to be some of the major shortcomings in the Department of Labor's position on this issue:

The exemptions limit pension fund investments to "recognized mortgage loans," but define that to mean only loans that qualify under Fannie Mae, Ginny Mae or Freddie Mac—roughly 60 per cent of the residential mortgage market. There is no reason why other conventional mortgage securities packaged by private mortgage investment bankers should be excluded. Salomon Brothers alone has handled $71 billion in conventional mortgage securities in just the past 18 months.

The Department chose not to extend the exemptions to multi-family housing, even though requested to do so.

Plans are still forbidden to participate directly in the mortgage investment marketplace. Investments must be made through an "established mortgage lender", approved by HUD or some other government housing finance agency.

Pension fund managers are arbitrarily prohibited from purchasing more than a specified and limited percentage of any particular issue of mortgage backed security certificates.

If an employee benefit plan does not follow the conditions included in the Department's "class exemption"—or if a fund manager is uncertain whether a particular mortgage transaction qualifies under the exemption—the plan must request an opinion or seek an individual exemption from the Labor Department.

This procedure in itself is costly and burdensome. It is unlikely that a Labor Department response could be expected in less than 90 days. In this interim period, many profitable investment opportunities could be lost.

Most important; pension fund managers are still not allowed to make mortgage security investment decisions on their own. The manager instead must delegate this decision to an independent fiduciary or "qualified real estate management." This requirement—which applies exclusively to mortgage investments—creates a psychological barrier, adds additional costs and erodes whatever competitive edge the investment might have on its own merits.

Mr. Chairman, Congressman Gephardt, Congressman Conable and I introduced H.R. 6781 because we think this list of special restrictions on pension fund investment in housing includes real and substantial barriers and is not supported by sound economic reasoning.

Under the ERISA statute, pension plan trustees are given the responsibility and authority to direct and control the investment of pension plan assets. We believe the Department of Labor, in restricting mortgage investment capabilities, has usurped this responsibility and authority to an unreasonable degree, a degree that is not only economically unsound, but also fails to reflect the intent of Congress.

We introduced this bill because we believe that, by removing these arbitrary regulatory impediments—while retaining the basic prudency, diversity and arms length transaction standards—pension funds will have a new incentive to invest in housing.

We believe that a significant new infusion of mortgage capital will quickly flow from private pension funds to the housing marketplace and that this new source of capital is bound to have a downward impact on mortgage interest rates.

California's Public Investment Strategy program has already plowed the ground and has proven how a prudent investment of a reasonable percentage of public pension fund reserves can serve as a real stimulus to a state's housing and construction industries.

There is no reason why a similar surge in housing construction cannot happen all over the country if mortgage securities are allowed to compete on a level playing field with other private pension fund investment opportunities.

Mr. Chairman, once again, I thank you for the opportunity to participate in this hearing. I hope I can convince the Subcommittee that a legislative revision of the ERISA regulations on mortgage investment is a reasonable and sound method of encouraging new pension fund investment in residential housing.

My colleagues and I stand ready to work with the Subcommittee on any technical suggestions you might have on this bill. Thank you.●

AMNESTY TO ALIENS COSTLY TO STATES

HON. HAL DAUB

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I introduced a bill, H.R. 7060, to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act, by updating the Registry Date provision. I have taken this action to allow my colleagues in alternative to the "amnesty" provisions currently contained in H.R. 6514, the Immigration Reform and Control Act, to be considered by the Judiciary Committee on Tuesday, September 14.

To stress the need for modification of H.R. 6514, I offer the following article reprinted from the Sacramento Bee on September 2, 1982, for my colleagues' benefit.

[From the Sacramento Bee, Sept. 2, 1982]

IMMIGRATION BILL MAY INCREASE STATE WELFARE TAB $1 BILLION

(By Leo Rennert)

WASHINGTON.—California would be saddled with up to $1.3 billion a year in additional state and local welfare outlays for illegal aliens eligible for legal resident status under a pending immigration bill, state officials warned Wednesday.

Under instructions from State Senate President Pro Tem David Roberti, Washington lobbyists for the Legislature have launched an all-out drive to persuade Congress to make major changes or kill the measure altogether.

Led by California, a coalition of states that would feel the impact of the bill, including Florida, Texas, New York and New Jersey, will meet today to draft a set of financial safeguards for submission to the House after the Labor Day recess.

When the Senate passed its version Aug. 17, the Reagan administration succeeded in attaching an amendment that would deny federal welfare assistance for three to six years to illegal aliens whose stay in the United States would be legitimized by the bill.

California and other states argue this would require them to pick up full welfare costs for hundreds of thousands of aliens as they begin the transition from undocumented status toward full citizenship.

At issue are such welfare programs as Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), Medicaid (known in California as Medi-Cal), food stamps and Supplemental Security Income. Normally, costs for these programs are split between Washington and the states.

While estimates about the number of illegal aliens vary widely, federal authorities tend to place the total at 3 million to 6 million. California alone may account for more than 1 million, according to new state projections.

State officials say they were slow to grasp the immigration bill's full impact on their strained treasuries during Senate consideration. But now that initial estimates are beginning to emerge, they are aghast at how much of an extra tab they may have to pick up.

As new battle lines form for the post-Labor Day session, California and other major states are likely to insist that the federal government pick up all initial welfare costs for undocumented aliens eligible for legal status.

President Reagan is certain to reject such demands. Administration officials estimate full federal financing would cost $6 billion to $10 billion over the next four years and there's no room for such outlays in the president's budget-slashing plans.

The House thus may be caught in a squeeze play between the White House, which wants an immigration bill only if it entails a minimal increase in the federal budget, and the states, which are beginning to insist that they won't accept the bill if they get stuck with most of the extra costs.

With Congress due to adjourn in a few weeks for the November election campaigns, that kind of impasse could doom the bill's chances this year.

In a letter to Rep. Don Edwards, D-San Jose, Roberti said he is "most disturbed" by additional financial burdens that would be imposed on the states under both the Senate-passed bill and a House version awaiting action in the Judiciary Committee in a couple of weeks.

Edwards is the senior Californian on Judiciary and chairman of the state's Democratic congressional delegation.

California officials estimate the annual extra tab for the state's strained treasury under the Senate bill would be $1.2 billion, plus another $130 million in locally funded general assistance programs.

The administration has agreed to channel up to $300 million a year to affected states in bloc grants to ease the impact. But state officials argue this would be totally inadequate. California, which is believed to account for 30 percent of illegal aliens and up to 50 percent of the potential welfare load, would get only about $100 million a year—less than 10 percent of its estimated extra costs.

The House bill would extend current federal-state matching formulas to aliens eligible for legal resident status. But state officials contend this still would saddle them with about $600 million in extra annual expenses as their share of new welfare services.

As long as immigration remains basically a federal question, they maintain Washington should underwrite the full cost of any major change in the status of illegal aliens.

California lobbyists hope that Edwards will offer an amendment to shift the financial burden completely to the federal government.

Roberti, who's about to become chairman of an immigration and refugee task force of the National Conference of State Legislatures, said California theoretically could take its cue from the Reagan administration and try to deny state benefits to former illegals.

"But I would find such action to be not only constitutionally questionable but morally reprehensible," Roberti remarked.

"The federal government may choose to tax these newly acknowledged residents of our nation while denying them basic public assistance. I believe Californians in good conscience would not.

"Furthermore, to do so would only push the costs onto local goverment, and in no way remove the fiscal consequences of federal action from the shoulders of California taxpayers.

"Reimbursement of costs that state and local governments would have to bear as the result of any federal decision to legalize undocumented aliens is essential. Without such a provision, I believe legalization should be actively opposed."

Legalization of undocumented aliens is a key feature of the bill, which also seeks to limit the number of legal immigrants while curbing the flow of illegal border crossings.

Under the Senate version, illegal aliens who arrived in the U.S. before 1977 would be granted permanent resident status. Those who arrived between 1978 and 1980 would get a temporary designation and become eligible for permanent status within three years. Federal welfare payments would be denied to both groups during these transitional periods.

"For the states, this is becoming the big sleeper issue," said David Vienna, whose Washington lobbying firm represents the California Legislature.

Leigh Snell, an immigration specialist in the Vienna firm, said the immigration bill went from "bad" in the House version to "horrendous" in the final Senate draft.

The Brown administration, while letting Roberti take the lead on this issue, also has been studying the likely state fiscal impact.●

THE PEOPLE'S PARADISE

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I submit for the RECORD an article from the National Review which discusses religious and press freedoms in the People's Paradise of Nicaragua. Again, reality clashes with the lies of collectivist propaganda and philosophy.

The article follows:

[From the National Review, Sept. 17, 1982]

ON THIS ROCK I WILL BREAK MY CHURCH

The Marxist Catholics of Latin America have been so diligent in publicizing themselves that it is possible to forget that there are still traditional (that is, Catholic) Catholics in that part of the world. Yet so there are, and in Nicaragua they have been taking a beating from the Sandinistas.

The latest clash began last month when Archbishop Obando y Bravo returned to Nicaragua from a trip to Rome carrying a letter from Pope John Paul II criticizing the "People's Church"—essentially a Marxist end-run around episcopal authority—as "absurd and dangerous." The government forbade La Prensa, the lone independent newspaper, to run it. The editors countered by electing not to go to press at all. Whereupon the Sandinistas agreed to let the Pope's letter run, provided it was not given page-one treatment. Shortly thereafter, however, the government struck back. Sandinista thugs jumped the archbishop's spokesman, Father Bismarck Carballo, at lunch, forced him to strip, and drove him through the streets. The state-controlled media claimed he had been surprised in a tryst with a parishioner. La Prensa refused once more to publish, rather than run the government's fabrication. There followed demonstrations in half a dozen Catholic high schools.

Meanwhile, Nicaragua's tiny Protestant minority has also fallen on bad times, as missionaries are expelled and churches taken over. The Sandinista interior minister, in a press conference straight out of Animal Farm, accused the Seventh Day Adventists of plotting to blow up high-tension wires, and warned that their "days in Nicaragua are coming to an end."

Central American anti-clericalism runs deep. The Mexican revolution, which preceded the Russian by seven years, ferociously persecuted Catholics. Mexican presidents (nominally the heirs of that revolution) ostentatiously avoided churchgoing.

In Nicaragua, Marxism sharpens the local impulse. How could it be otherwise? How can you tolerate an organization that believes in rendering unto Caesar only what is Caesar's, when you believe that everything is Caesar's? Jailers of the world, unite; you have nothing to lose but your prayers.●

TRIBUTE TO FRANK CHELF

HON. GENE SNYDER

OF KENTUCKY

Wednesday, September 8, 1982

● Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a former colleague and friend, Frank Chelf, who passed away this past week.

One of the major challenges I have always faced since being elected to represent the Fourth Congressional District of Kentucky, was the challenge of trying to live up to the record of accomplishment, achievement, and statesmanship set by Frank Chelf during the 22 years he so ably represented the Fourth District. His has been a difficult act to follow.

Indeed, Frank Chelf represented the Fourth District of Kentucky longer than any other person has to date and throughout those 22 years, he served his district extraordinarily well.

In my freshman year, here in the House of Representatives, when I represented the old Third District, I had the honor and the pleasure to get to know and work with Frank, who, at the time was the dean of the Kentucky delegation. He was a man easy to respect because of his keen wit, his diligence, his oratorical skill, his humanitarianism and his dedication to his constituents. You could always count on Frank to put things in proper perspective and bring the proceedings down to earth with one of his off-the-cuff floor speeches for which he was so well known.

Frank Chelf was also a man easy to like because of his good nature and his remarkable sense of humor. Watching him in action those first 2 years, gave me as a freshman Congressman, quite a lesson in both the art of effective representation and gentlemanly conduct.

Congress lost a great legislator when Frank decided to retire to the life of a gentleman lawyer in 1966 and both Kentucky and the U.S. House of Representatives have lost a great friend with his passing now.●

IN MEMORY OF JAMES WALTER KEYS

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, the city of Newark's antipoverty agency will name its headquarters for one of the most dedicated humanitarians to ever serve the people of Newark, James Walter Keys.

Jim Keys, who died earlier this year, was truly an activist in the battle against poverty and despair in our city. He was one of the first employees of the United Community Corporation (UCC) over 20 years ago, and he worked tirelessly to build this agency into a force for relieving the misery of the poor, the disadvantaged, the elderly, and the handicapped people in Newark. His dedication infused others with a spirit of community involvement, and in the process earned him the nickname "Mr. UCC." Jim brought together many different churches, social clubs, civil rights groups, volunteer agencies, and other self-help organizations to work for the common goal of helping people in need. He had a gift for communication, working effectively to develop cooperation among many different people, which continues even after Jim has left us.

Jim Keys was a friend of mine, and indirectly a friend of every citizen of Newark who cared about the quality of life in our city. The United Community Corporation's Executive Director, Dave Edwards, as well as UCC's director of senior services, Kitty Taylor, remembered the human qualities of Jim Keys in a recent article in the Star-Ledger. I ask that the article be reprinted in the RECORD.

The dedication of the UCC headquarters in Newark is more than a fitting tribute to a good man; it will serve as a constant reminder of the ongoing need for community service.

[From the Star-Ledger, Sept. 6, 1982]

UCC TO NAME BUILDING FOR LONG-TIME EMPLOYEE

(By Julia Katrina Graham)

In memory of James Walter Keys Sr., the United Community Corp. (UCC) will name its headquarters building, 31 Fulton St., for him during interdenominational services Sept. 15.

"Jim was always a man on the go and a great humanitarian, always involved in the community and with people of all ages. There was no race, color, or age line—he loved all people," said Kitty Taylor, director of senior services, and a friend of Keys for 15 years.

"He was an activist. Whenever anyone called him, he was always ready to come—he never said no. Whenever he saw there was a need for assistance, he always volunteered without being asked," she said.

James Walter Keys was born on May 2, 1916 in Mayfield, Ky. Although he was a Baptist, he "respected all religious faiths, and attended churches of all denominations," according to friends. He died early this year.

He came to Newark 41 years later where he attended classes at Rutgers University and Essex County college. For a number of years he was employed as a musician with the Picadilly Pipers.

"Because of our love for music, we really hit it off," said Rick McInerheny. "I knew him very well; he was a special guy."

Keys was among the first employees of the UCC, serving the city's anti-poverty agency for more than 20 years, earning him the nickname "Mr. UCC."

"Jim was always helping people who were poor and needed food and clothing. The last project he worked on was getting cheese for those who needed it. Even when he was in the hospital he was still helping me and others," said John McGee, senior service outreach employe and long-time friend.

According to his friends, Keys was an inspiration to youth and a friend to the elderly.

Ella Lovelace, a senior service volunteer said, "Whenever we went on bus trips, Jim made sure we were comfortable."

His friends said Keys not only had good rapport with the community, but also with business and other professional organizations.

"It was because of Jim and his efforts that we received contributions from businesses for trips for senior citizens and gifts for children. Because of his rapport with the media he was responsible for having two busloads of children go see the 'Midday Live' show," said Norman Gaskins, executive director of the UCC.

Not only was Keys a member of the UCC, but he was an active member of Lions International Inc., Roseville's Lions Club, Kiwanis Club, NAACP, the National, N.J. and Newark Senior Citizens Coordinating Council, Peoples Association to the Memory of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Project Volunteer, Emanuel Senior Citizens Day Care Advisory Board, COED, one of the founders of the Resource for Renaissance Project, and was on the Red Cross and Salvation Army Advisory Boards.

Dave Edwards, executive director of the UCC said, "It took me three minutes to trust him explicitly. When I first started working here in October, instead of me telling Jim what needed to be done, he would take the initiative and do what needed to be done. Jim lived and breathed UCC."

The interdenominational memorial service, which is open to the public is scheduled for Sept. 15 from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. and will take place outdoors.

Persons who worked closely with Keys throughout his life will have two minutes to recall their memories. Musical selections will be performed, including a song called "Love," which Keys wrote.

BUILD UP MICHIGAN CAMPAIGN

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a recent front page article in the Washington Post clearly discussed the economic problems in Michigan. It is no exaggeration to describe the economic situation in my home State as a depression.

But the situation discussed in the Post article only presented one aspect of the mosaic that comprises Michigan.

Another aspect is the work of the people and of the organizations in Michigan who have not fallen into a mental slump because of the economy and who are sticking with Michigan and actively working to rebuild it.

One such group is the Builders Exchange of Detroit and Michigan.

The Builders Exchange is Michigan's oldest and largest construction association with over 2,400 member companies. This organization has mobilized its vast resources to initiate a "Build Up, Michigan!" campaign to help in the recovery of the State and its construction industry.

The Builders Exchange recognizes the economic problems that exist, but believes these problems are overshadowed by Michigan's possibilities for future growth and greatness.

The Builders Exchange promotes the idea that it is time to start talking about Michigan and its construction industry's many good, strong points. Instead of being negatively reactive, the Builders Exchange wants all of us to be proactive when it comes to discussing the future of Michigan.

The "Build Up, Michigan!" program is designed to be an ongoing campaign and not just a loud, one-time effort. Month by month, the program will continue to grow, touching more and more people throughout Michigan and the surrounding States.

It will carry forth a positive message that, even though Michigan has its economic problems now, the long run will show that Michigan is still a great place for people and businesses to settle, to stay, and to build.

Mr. Speaker, when times are tough, it is easy to give up and walk away. But nothing concrete ever gets done that way.

The positive approach encompassed in the "Build Up, Michigan!" campaign of the Builders Exchange of Detroit and Michigan will do much to help in the recovery of that great State. I wish to commend the Builders Exchange for their deep concern and their initiative in helping in Michigan's recovery.●

COASTAL REVENUE SHARING ACT OF 1982

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to briefly address by distinguished colleagues regarding the bill entitled "The Coastal Revenue Sharing act of 1982," just introduced by my friend from Louisiana, Congressman JOHN BREAUX. Although the Commonwealth of Kentucky is certainly not a coastal State, I, as Chairman of the Subcommittee on Panama Canal/Outer Continental Shelf, am concerned about coastal areas with large-scale OCS oil and gas leasing activity. I, therefore, am a cosponsor of this bill. I believe the concept of OCS revenue sharing is a fundamentally sound one. However, I am concerned about the possible overly rigid earmarking of funds generated by revenue sharing. Funding to those most concerned with OCS development should be provided in a manner that will permit them to choose the best method for mitigating against or planning for the potential impacts of OCS leasing. Coastal governments affected should be free to choose how to best react to this program, and the amounts generated should be directly related to the amount of leasing activity off a coastal State and such activity's proximity to the coastline.

I believe that the approach to OCS revenue sharing presented in Mr. BREAUX's bill will be most acceptable to the administration and to State and local government officials involved in OCS development. I urge my colleagues' favorable consideration of this measure.●

OCS REVENUE SHARING

HON. JOHN B. BREAUX

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, today, I and several of my colleagues have introduced legislation to establish a fund for the sharing of revenues from Outer Continental Shelf (OCS) oil and gas development with coastal States and units of local coastal governments. As the Members are all aware, the Department of the Interior has recently announced a much needed program for accelerated OCS oil and gas leasing. It is with an eye to facilitating this program and providing assistance to coastal States and local governmental units impacted by this program that we introduce this bill.

The major elements of the legislation:

First, provide for the accruing of a small percentage of Federal bonus and royalty revenues from OCS lease tracts and production derived during fiscal year 1984 and thereafter for distribution in fiscal year 1985 and thereafter;

Second, mandate a 50-percent pass-through of the funds which would accrue to each coastal State to units of each local coastal government; and

Third, stipulate that not less than 25 percent of the amount received by coastal States during any fiscal year be used to assist local communities impacted by OCS activities in their natural resource management and development efforts.

In the true spirit of revenue sharing, similar to the approach which has been adopted for the sharing of mineral development revenues with inland States, no other conditions or "strings" are attached to this pass-through of funds. This approach has been taken due to our belief that the governmental units most directly affected by OCS activities should be free to choose how to best react to this extremely important national program.

In addition, the bill reflects our belief that amounts generated for sharing with these governmental units should be directly related to the amount of leasing activities off their coast and such activities proximity to the coastline.

Finally, the bill contains a floor which will insure a minimum funding for all coastal States and local communities where OCS planning activities are occurring and a ceiling to further protect the future revenue position of the Federal Treasury.

This legislation is straightforward. It is not designed to provide back door financing for any existing programs of the Federal Government, but is rather intended to replace a number of categorical grant programs that this administration, and many of us in the Congress, have found wanting.

I believe that the approach encompassed in this bill will prove to be most attractive to the State and local officials who are involved in day-to-day planning for OCS exploration and development activities.●

ARMS TO TAIWAN

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, today I am inserting for the benefit of my colleagues, for articles which articulate the deep concerns held by many conservatives regarding U.S. policy toward Taiwan vis-a-vis our policy toward Communist China.

I believe it is extremely important that members of this House become aware of the serious foreign policy implications we will face if the United States does not continue to be a strong ally to Taiwan.

It is completely unrealistic to expect mainland China to negotiate in good faith with the Taiwanese. This Communist government has no intention of allowing Taiwan to exist as a free democracy. For this reason, it is imperative that the United States maintain a strong friendship with Taiwan and continue to supply this country with quality arms support.

I commend my colleagues attention to these excellent articles describing the important foreign policy responsibilities we have toward Taiwan.

[From the New York Times, Aug. 3, 1982]

PEKING TURNS ITS BACK

The news from China is disturbing. A lurch back to dogmatism, propelled by economic troubles and an approaching Communist Party Congress, is straining what was at best a difficult relationship with the United States. President Reagan wasted a year straightening out his attitudes toward Perkin. Now the Chinese seem eager to rebuff him.

Mr. Reagan has gone about as far as he should in placating Peking on arm sales to Taiwan. He has abandoned his unwise campaign talk about upgrading relations with the Nationalists. He is ready formally to endorse the idea of "one China," a concept on which Communists and Nationalists are agreed. He is prepared to put limits on selling advanced weapons to Taiwan. And he would give his blessing to Pekin's idea for a peaceful fusion of mainland and Taiwan—which is further than three previous American Presidents cared or dared to go.

Yet for all the dismay these American approaches caused in Taiwan, Peking's recent responses have been stony.

The Communists refuse to accept the sincerity of Mr. Reagan's intentions; his offer of American technology in return for an understanding on Taiwan was rebuffed as a crude bribe. The resignation of Secretary of State Haig, whom the Chinese knew to be a defender of strategic partnership, seems to have made it even harder for anyone in Pekin to champion the American connection. Policy toward the United States may be a factor in Peking's power struggles; an accord on Taiwan may be impossible at this point.

Americans emphatically believe they have a moral obligation to provide Taiwan with defensive arms, as provided in the Taiwan Relations Act and as understood by Peking when a normalization deal was struck with Jimmy Carter. With military sales to Taiwan drastically reduced, the United States at a minimum ought to authorize renewal of the co-production of F-5E jet fighters. But Pekin demands an end to all weapons sales, in language so strident as to suggest it prefers the grievance to an accommodation.

The outcry over foreign devils in China has a depressing resonance. So does the call to doctrinal purity, part of an orchestrated attack on capitalist "decadence." Rational diplomacy with China may be an early victim of its next revolution.

ABANDONING TAIWAN . . .

President Reagan is on the brink of approving a joint U.S.-Communist Chinese communique that friends of an independent Taiwan regard as a prolonged death sentence for the island regime and the conservative movement will resent as the president's worst betrayal yet.

From Taiwan's standpoint, all that can be said for the new communique is that it does not end U.S. arms sales on a certain date, as Peking demanded. It does, however, make clear that the weapons supply cannot go on indefinitely and will not be upgraded.

This reinforces the 1971 Shanghai Communique's recognition of "one China," pointing to eventual control over Taiwan by the mainland communists. Since the phase-out of U.S. arms is not linked by the new communique to reduce tensions between the two Chinas, the long-term prognosis for Taiwan is bleak.

To conservatives who have tried to overlook the drift toward moderate Republicanism by the Reagan administration, the betrayal of Taiwan is the last straw. Reagan, who championed Taiwan throughout his political career, has not consciously abandoned his principles. Rather, on this as on other questions he has insensibly followed the lead of the permanent government bureaucracy.

Although pro-Taiwan conservatives in Congress are pressuring the president to reject the communique, it is hard to imagine throwing aside what has been hammered out secretly in Peking negotiations this summer, especially when the communist regime accepted less than anybody ever expected.

This represents a victory from the political grave for Alexander Haig, who as secretary of state battled for the paramountcy of the Washington-Peking link over the future of Taiwan. Haig's obduracy on the China question was one of the least publicized and most important causes for his fall.

Haig insisted that good relations with Peking required nothing less than a communique setting a date certain for ending arms shipments to Taiwan. A few days after Haig was sacked, Reagan rejected his communique and instead approved a fuzzier version and shipped it off to Peking. Friends of Taiwan breathed easier, not because they liked the softer version but because they thought China's Deng Xiaoping would reject it out of hand.

Deng disappointed them. The Chinese would accept no linkage of terminating aid to Taiwan with reducing tension between the communist and nationalist regimes, but agreed to a promise that present weaponry would not exceed past quality and quantity and would not continue indefinitely.

The 32-year emotional legacy since Chiang Kai-shek fled the mainland makes this accommodation unforgivable for the president's conservative constituency.

OUR CHINA POLICY MAY DRIVE TAIWAN TO SOVIETS

(By Smith Hempstone)

In what would amount to violating the spirit if not the letter of the law of the land, the Reagan administration apparently is trying to formulate a policy acceptable to Communist China that would have the effect of eventually shutting off the present modest flow of American arms to Taiwan.

The Taiwan Relations Act of 1979 asserts that "the United States will make available in Taiwan such defensive articles and defensive services in such quantities as may be necessary to enable Taiwan to maintain a self-defense capability." The act further provides that "the President and Congress shall determine the nature and quantity of such defensive articles based solely upon their judgment of the needs of Taiwan."

The Reagan administration, according to Sen. Barry Goldwater (in an interview with The New York Times), plans to circumvent its clearly stated responsibility to ensure the defense of Taiwan by proposing to Peking a plan under which Taiwan in the future would not receive any more or better arms of any type than it now does.

While this falls short of Peking's demand for a complete cessation of arms sales to the Nationalist Chinese, it would ensure the ultimate obsolescence of the arms made available to Taiwan by the United States. Further, inflation in the end would price Taiwan out of the American arms market.

In January, President Reagan announced his decision to supply Taiwan with additional F-5E jet fighters, rather than the more advanced FX aircraft the Nationalists were seeking. Mainland China's F-8 fighter, a copy of the Soviet MiG-21, is in some ways equal or superior to the F-5E. The F-12, which boasts elements of western technology, will be even better when it is developed in 1985.

Yet in an apparent attempt to kowtow to Peking, the White House, which had set July 29 as an informal target date for ending formal notification of the decision to allow continued co-production of F-5Es in Taiwan, has allowed this date to slip by. Quick action on this modest upgrading of the Nationalist air force is necessary to avoid a break in the Northrup production line.

What the administration is hoping is that Peking will agree that Washington's decision to allow inflation to erode the worth of American arms sales to Taiwan meets the Communist requirement that the U.S. halt significant transfers of military hardware, which Communist China regards as an infringement of its claim of sovereignty over the island republic. The White House has little room for maneuver because it unwisely agreed last winter that no further arms deals with Taiwan would be consummated while negotiations continue in Peking, thus giving the Communists every reason to string out the talks.

Peking ducks such as National Security Council staffer Don Gregg, soon to become Vice President George Bush's principal foreign policy adviser, have yet to suggest publicly what the United States has gotten out of playing its vaunted "China card."

The Communist Chinese have yet to criticize the Soviets for the repression in Poland. They have not renounced the use of force to resolve their conflict with Taiwan. They have not stopped denouncing the presence of American troops in South Korea.

The jobs and profits that were supposed to flow from the re-establishment of the China trade have proved illusory. Little Taiwan, with a population of only 17 million, is America's sixth-largest trading partner, with two-way trade exceeding $13 billion. Our trade with Mainland China, which boasts a population of nearly 1 billion, amounts to only about a third of that.

The ultimate effect of the administration's craven China policy will neither promote the cause of human rights on Taiwan nor lead to the peaceful reunification of the two Chinas. If anything, this policy could well drive Taiwan into the arms of the Soviet Union in its quest for a guarantor of its security.

Such a flip-flop may seem far-fetched, but it is no more so than the one that has seen the United States abandon an old friend for an uncertain dalliance with Peking. The Soviets, an Asian power in their own right, have cordial relations with India and a firm foothold in Vietnam. Moscow has played footsy with the Koumintang before, and would do again if it served its interests.

RIGHT WING FEARS DESERTION OF TAIWAN

(By Ron Cordray)

Despite assurances from President Reagan that he remains committed to the defense of Taiwan, conservatives see growing dangers of U.S. abandonment of that nation.

The latest signal that has raised the concern of conservatives is the pending appointment of a moderate Republican to a key National Security Council position on China relations.

Sources say three conservatives were passed over for the position which will be given to David Lux, formerly on the China desk of the Commerce Department. The sources said Lux was backed by Donald Gregg who held the position prior to becoming Vice President George Bush's security adviser.

Conservatives view continued arms sales to Taiwan as the key to this administration's Taiwan commitment.

Gary Jarman, national director of the American Council for a Free Asia, said the "fundamental value of selling arms to Taiwan is not just to have weapons to repel an attack, it's a deterrent. It automatically brings us into the equation. The commitment to sell arms is the real deterrent."

"The pro-Peking faction realizes that a halt of arms sales to Taiwan would force Taiwan into unification negotiations with the Peoples Republic of China," one congressional source commented.

President Reagan met with about two dozen congressmen last week to discuss Taiwan, namely the contunued sale of arms to that nation and the joint communique to be issued by the United States and China.

Relative to the U.S. position on Taiwan, Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz, told the president that "someone in the State Department is doing you a disservice" by saying one thing "while you're saying another."

In response, Reagan said, "I can assure you I have my people in charge who are going to do what I represent."

The administration told congressmen it would send to Congress this month notification of a continued co-production agreement with Taiwan of the F-5E fighter and the sale of spare parts to Taiwan.

It was stated that the congressional notification and release of the joint communique with Peking would not be linked.

Reagan told congressmen the administration is attempting to arrive at language in the communique which will give Peking the "form" and yet give Taiwan the "substance."

Congressional sources said the president was confronted with the concern that an improperly worded communique would jeopardize Taiwan politically and militarily. In response, Secretary of State George Shultz said, "You're absolutely right."

Reagan said the statement on arms sales to Taiwan speaks in terms of quantity and quality only as it relates to the present situation. He said if China changes its position, the U.S. arms position also would change.

It was implied that the specific issues of quantity and quality of arms sales would not be in the communique, at least not spelled out explicitly. Reagan said it was his intention to be vague to allow flexibility.

Apparently to alleviate conservatives' concerns, Reagan told of a meeting he had with ex-president Richard M. Nixon following the normalization fo relations with China. At that meeting, Reagan asked Nixon what he would do in response to an attack on Taiwan. Nixon told him his response would be to respond with everything we have. Reagan then told Nixon, "I would also do that."

Conservatives remain concerned, however. They point to pro-Peking attitudes in the State Department and the views of Vice President George Bush who, according to sources, told Peking the Taiwan Relations Act is basically a nuisance.

They claim Bush fears a downgrading of relations with China and this could be a yoke around his neck in a 1984 or 1988 presidential bid.

Just as conservatives are concerned in other areas, they view the Taiwan debate as another example of moderate Republican views superseding the conservative views they expect President Reagan to represent.

With the United States and China reportedly close to agreement on the joint communique, conservatives may not have to wait long to determine if the pattern is continuing.●

PEACE IN THE MIDDLE EAST

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this occasion to extend my personal congratulations to Special Envoy Philip C. Habib for his historic contributions in the Middle East peace initiative. In recognition of his commendable diplomatic efforts and tireless service to his country, President Reagan presented Mr. Habib with the Nation's highest civilian award, the Medal of Freedom. As you know, the Medal of Freedom is bestowed by American Presidents on people who have made exceptionally meritorious contributions to the security or national interest of the United States, to world peace, or to cultural or other significant public, or private endeavors.

During the past 3 months, Envoy Habib was engaged in a marathon negotiating effort to bring to an end the tragic bloodshed and chaos in Lebanon. In the midst of the vicious fighting, he traveled to war-torn Beirut and deftly worked with many concerned groups to put an end to the fighting. He displayed not only personal courage, but incredible stamina in pursuing the drawn out negotiating efforts. His courageous efforts were demanding of both his energies and his considerable expertise in negotiating. He successfully brought about the cease-fire in Lebanon and the resolution of the crisis in West Beirut.

Those of us who have known Phil Habib over the years appreciate that he has served his country in many difficult diplomatic assignments overseas; we know firsthand of his exceptional contributions to our country and to world peace. Tuesday, President Reagan described Mr. Habib's recent negotiating efforts as "one of the unique feats of diplomacy in modern times."

I also want to strongly applaud the President and Secretary Shultz for their dedication, determination and vision in committing the many resources of our country to the pursuit of the elusive goal of bringing peace to this troubled land. Without their full support, Mr. Habib's long-term efforts would not have been possible.

I fervently hope that the cease-fire and recent developments in Lebanon will be the first step along the road to peace. Although much remains to be done, I am hopeful that this initial effort will ultimately lead to a just and lasting settlement for all of the concerned parties in that part of the world; they have indeed borne far too much suffering, grief, and bloodshed in recent years, and will, I am sure, welcome a new dawn of peace.●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO ANTHONY REED, DISTINGUISHED CITIZEN, ESTEEMED UNION REPRESENTATIVE, AND GREAT AMERICAN

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, September 11, the residents of my congressional district and State of New Jersey will join with local 669 UAW retirees of Paterson, N.J., in testimony to an esteemed union representative, outstanding citizen, community leader, and good friend, the Honorable Anthony Reed of Paterson, Wayne, and Toms River, N.J., who has announced his retirement as International Representative of the most prestigious UAW organization of United Automobile, Aerospace, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America.

Mr. Speaker, I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our deepest appreciation to Tony Reed for all of his good works and share great pride in the success of his achievements with his good wife, Jean Leslie, and their family: son Robert and wife Vicky of San Diego, Calif.; son Anthony, wife Robin, and daughter Katie of West Milford, N.J.; daughter Kathleen, husband Robert Sherger, and children Erika, Reed, and Sara of Lincoln Park, N.J.; daughter Diane, and husband Joseph Telford of San Diego, Calif.

Mr. Speaker, as Tony Reed retires from his highly respected office of representation on behalf of the United Automobile, Aerospace, and Agricultural Implement Workers of our Nation, I am pleased to participate with his many friends and colleagues in seeking national recognition of his untiring and compassionate efforts on behalf of his fellow man.

We are all familiar with the goals and objectives of the UAW in their constant vigil to enhance conditions in the workingplace and protect our working people and their hopes for better tomorrows. Tony Reed has, by his representation and lifetime of dedication to these same true American ideals of everything we hold dear—the laborers in the vineyard of our industrial complex, their families, homes, jobs, pensions, security, and opportunities to advance—has truly enriched our community, State, and Nation.

Mr. Speaker, we are proud to boast that Tony Reed is a native-born citizen of Paterson, N.J., the first industrial city of our Nation. He was born August 3, 1920, and is one of 11 children of William and Jennie Reed. He is a lifetime resident of our great sovereign State of New Jersey, residing in Paterson and Wayne until moving to Toms River in 1977.

As a young man of 19 years, Tony joined the employment roster of the Curtiss-Wright Corp., of Wood-Ridge, N.J., a manufacturer of national and international renown and a major employer in the State of New Jersey, and particularly for the people in Passaic and Bergen Counties in my congressional district. For close to four decades he worked on the production lines of Curtiss-Wright as a laborer and machine operator until his retirement in 1977.

During the course of his career pursuits, Tony earned the highest respect and esteem of his fellow workers at the Curtiss-Wright Corp. He was elected union steward in 1951, financial secretary in 1963, and in 1965 was elected president of UAW Local 669 at Curtiss-Wright. On November 1977 he was appointed to UAW Region No. 9 as international representative.

Mr. Speaker, there is much that can be said of Tony Reed and his lifetime of achievements in service to people. His leadership and highest standards of excellence in ever seeking to improve the quality of life and way of life for our people throughout his lifetime have endeared him to all of us.

In civic affairs, Tony has extended the richness of his wisdom and expertise—always giving willingly and unselfishly of his time—in helping others. We are especially proud of his compassion, dedication, and untiring efforts on behalf of his fellow workers. His personal commitment to them and to the economic, social and cultural enhancement of the community has been a way of life for him.

Tony's professional expertise in the American labor movement has enabled him to achieve State and national acclaim for his union representation of the employees of Curtiss-Wright Corp.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed appropriate that we reflect on the deeds and achievements of our people who have contributed to the quality of life here in America. There is so much that can be said of the friendship and good will that Tony has so willingly and abundantly given over these many years that mean so much to the lives of all of us. I appreciate the opportunity to seek this national recognition of all of his good works.

As we gather together on September 11 in tribute to his leadership endeavors and sincerity of purpose dedicated to service to people, we do indeed salute a distinguished citizen, outstanding community leader, and great American—the Honorable Anthony Reed of New Jersey.●

"HUMANISM" BACKGROUND EXPLAINED BY THEOLOGIAN

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, one of the words that is being tossed about in the political arena these days is the word "humanism."

The first time I heard the phrase "secular humanism" was on the floor of this House.

And I have felt uneasy about the misuse of this word.

The other day in The Lutheran Standard I read an article by Michael Rogness, pastor of The First Lutheran Church in Duluth, Minn., titled "Speak a Good Word for Humanism."

Before we clutter the political lexicon with a misuse of that word, it would be good for everyone to read this Lutheran minister's analysis.

I urge my colleagues in the House and Senate to do so.

SPEAK A GOOD WORD FOR HUMANISM

(By Michael Rogness)

"You're a humanist!" is a stinging criticism for millions of people today. By contrast, the same statement would have been considered a glowing compliment until a few years ago.

What has changed?

The word "humanism" now has many meanings. Some are far different from what it originally meant.

RISE OF HUMANISM

It started out as a splendid word, very much at home in the Christian church.

In medieval society, scholars were interested mainly in other worldly topics such as the nature of God, revelation, and the heavenly spheres. The various natural and social sciences were either nonexistent or in their infancy. Literature, music, and art dealt almost wholly with Christian themes and ceremonies.

Then, in the 14th and 15th centuries, scholars, artists, and writers began to turn their attention to this world."Let's see what human beings are like" was the theme of their inquiry. This marked the birth of humanism—a movement that grew within the church.

These scholars were Christian. They saw humanity as the peak of God's creation. Humanists believed human beings were exalted because they were created in God's image and given the breath of life. A favorite text of the humanists was in Psalm 8: "What is man that thou art mindful of him . . . ? Yet thou hast made him little less than God, and dost crown him with glory and honor."

The classic visual example of this humanism is Michelangelo's portrayal of the handsome Adam on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel in Rome, with his finger outstretched to receive the divine spark transmitted from the Creator's own finger reaching to him.

This high regard for human beings caused humanism's influence to spill out in several directions. Humanists took a renewed interest in common people. The democratic impulse can be traced to humanism; to inevitably developed from the conviction that each human being should be considered God's creature. Kings, princes, and bishops were important in the order of creation, but serfs and workers also were children of God.

Humanism prepared the way for the Reformation through its interest in all people and by its encouragement of scholarship for learning the biblical languages. This, in turn, led to the renewal of the gospel's proclamation of God's love and grace for all people, from king to slave!

"Humanism" was indeed a splendid word!

CHANGING DEFINITIONS

Since then the meaning of the word has wandered in many directions. My advice is never to discuss humanism without first defining what is meant by it.

1. Humanism as "humanitarianism" is a general term to describe active concern for the welfare and well-being of people. Every Christian should be humanitarian and a humanist in this sense, if we take Jesus' parable of the good Samaritan seriously and follow his command to "love your neighbor."

2. Humanism as "the study of the humanities" refers to the whole range of subjects that examine human nature, society, and culture: literature, history, art, economics, sociology, psychology, social studies, and so on. Nowadays they are set apart from the "natural sciences," although many of the natural sciences also were given a boost by early humanists. Surely we want our very best young Christian scholars to enter all these fields of study.

3. "Christian humanism," as described above, expresses the conviction that every human being is precious because we are created by God.

4. "Secular humanism" is the term that draws fire today. It also has thrown the word humanism into disrepute. Secular humanism is humanism without God.

GOD NOT IN THE PICTURE

Webster's New World Dictionary defines humanism as "thought or action concerned with the interests and ideals of people." A secular humanist would share that concern, but God is not in the picture. One problem of secular humanism is that it is humanism without humanism's moorings. The anchor for a Christian humanist is the conviction that the world is God's creation and that each person is created in God's image, is loved by God, and therefore is of great value as a child of God. Secular humanists lack this foundation and therefore give human beings value only as they choose. A secular humanist might affirm the worth of a human being, yet conclude that certain nationalities, retarded persons, or elderly people are not as valuable as the rest of us.

A Christian humanist derives ethics from God; a secular humanist derives convictions of right and wrong from whatever opinions or sources he or she chooses. One secular humanist may or may not agree with another secular humanist. It is therefore impossible to consider secular humanists as any kind of solid bloc of opinion or strategy.

WHEN WAS TERM USED?

When was the term secular humanist first used? Who knows? It was listed as a religion without a belief in God in a footnote to a 1961 Supreme Court opinion. Ultraconservatives have interpreted this as some sort of legal recognition of secular humanism as the de facto religion of the land, although the footnote actually does not such thing. (The late Justice Hugo Black, who wrote the opinion, would be astounded by that interpretation.)

Those who see secular humanism as the menacing threat to Christianity point to the "Humanist Manifesto," signed in 1933 by 34 intellectuals. These 34 individuals called for a new "religious humanism" to replace traditional creeds. They also urged people to reject "acquisitive and profit-motivated society" in favor of a "socialized and cooperative economic order [with] the equitable distribution of the means of life."

IN STEADY DECLINE

Their manifesto was more a socialist than a religious document. But it gave birth to the American Humanist Association, whose membership, now about 3000, recently has been in steady decline.

In 1973 Paul Kurtz, a philosophy professor at New York University in Buffalo, drafted the "Humanist Manifesto II," which was signed by 61 persons. This document was candidly antireligious, rejecting God, enshrining "self-actualization" as the goal of life, insisting that ethics is "autonomous and situational," and affirming the right to birth control, abortion, sexual permissiveness, euthanasia, and suicide.

Both manifestos received only scant attention from the news media or anybody else. They would have faded into obscurity if it were not for their opponents, who have blown their influence way out of proportion!

Unfortunately many Christians have chosen to abbreviate the term "secular humanism" They have focused not on "secularism," which is a real danger to the faith, but on "humanism"—thus ruining an otherwise good word! I recently read two examples of this distorted view of humanism: "Humanism is the worship or recognition of man's claim to sovereignty and lordship." "Basically, humanism is a rejection of the ultimacy of God's throne and its replacement by the thrones of men. . . . Humanists within the church place sovereignty or lordship in man." Those are definitions not of humanism, but of secularism. But the damage has been done, and one hardly dares to say "I am a humanist" anymore.

FOSTERING PARANOIA

We are being hustled into a paranoid panic by those who have convinced themselves that "275,000 humanists have infiltrated [our country] until every department is controlled by the humanists." This dark "conspiracy theory," promoted by San Diego Baptist minister Tim LaHaye, is a blind shot with no foundation except the fears and suspicions of those who want to believe it. Also wildly inaccurate is the shrill charge of the Rev. Leo Wine of Ashland, Oregon, that "humanists' obsessions [are] sex, pornography, marijuana, drugs, self-indulgence, [and] rights without responsibility."

Religious-media hucksters play on the fear of their audiences. This is easy enough, because Christians are concerned about signs of decline in various aspects of our national life.

But such paranoid accusations and distorted statements, lumping thousands into a vast plot, only make Christians look ridiculous to fairminded people and convince the public that Christians are irresponsible in their accusations.

We Christians are deeply concerned about many trends in our society. We need to face these not with panic or paranoia, but with reasoned analysis and compassion.

For instance, it is true that there is an antireligious bias on many university campuses and in the news media. The valid impact of religion in our national life is largely ignored or often belittled. Christians are depicted one-sidedly, either as bigots or doddering fools.

It's also true that crime has increased, moral standards have loosened, and TV and movies now portray behavior as acceptable today that would not have been shown at all 20 years ago.

We are concerned about these trends, and we should speak out and make our convictions known.

Yet we should be clear on this point: What we really oppose as Christians is not humanism, but secularism and nonhumanism.

We oppose secularism because we believe that God is creator and Lord of this world and that we are his stewards.

We oppose nonhumanism because, as the opposite of humanism, it has little regard for persons as individuals of value. A university, hospital, office, or agency that regards people impersonally as numbers is "nonhumanist." We Christians should attempt to treat people as persons of worth, even in the midst of bigness. Some employers treat workers impersonally; that is nonhumanism. Some people talk about nuclear war callously, not realizing the ghastly and unthinkable suffering it would cause. That is nonhumanism, and we Christians must oppose it. Some people regard the gross national product as more important than the needs of the poor, the minorities, and those with disadvantages. That is nonhumanism, and we oppose it.

EXAMPLES OF NONHUMANISM

We are appalled at the nonhumanism that consider Jews inferior to others and killed millions of them, or the nonhumanism that led to Stalin's liquidation of 20 million peasants in the Soviet Union and the murder of millions in China in the 1950s. We are dismayed when the world's refugees, the starving, or the "boat people" are spoken of only as statistics. Those are all dramatic examples of nonhumanism, but there are countless examples on a smaller scale around us.

We Christians should welcome help from humanists of any stripe in our concern for people. We might not agree with secular humanists, but we welcome them if they work for civil and minority rights, job equality, peace, and other true humanist concerns.

I wish we could rescue the word "humanism," although it has been so badly battered that rescue might be impossible. But we should and do stand up for "humanitarianism," the "humanities," and the grand tradition of Christian humanism.

All in all, I should still like to be counted a humanist!●

ON BEHALF OF THE REFUSENIKS OF THE U.S.S.R.

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, today I am speaking on behalf of a family that cannot speak—a family that resides in the Soviet Union. Veniamin and Bella Lifshitz have tried to leave the Soviet Union and join their children and grandchildren in Israel since 1971. Repeatedly, they have been denied permission to emigrate because of Veniamin's alleged access to sensitive military information obtained when he served as a colonel in the Soviet Army more than 30 years ago.

In 1948, at the age of 40, Veniamin retired from the army as a semi-invalid with permanent heart damage. During the next 12 years, he was employed at a light industrial plant, not connected with any secret or sensitive work, until failing health forced him to resign. Since 1960, Veniamin has suffered from severe chest pains and recurring migraine headaches, sometimes confining him to bed for months at a time. It is indeed tragic, Mr. Speaker, that this 74-year-old man and his 69-year-old wife, are forced to remain in the U.S.S.R.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleading their case to the House of Representatives and to the Government of the Soviet Union hoping that their emigration applications will be approved in the near future.

I commend my colleagues' attention and participation in this worthwhile effort—an effort to help innocent refuseniks to leave the Soviet Union and be united with their loved ones in Israel.●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. RALPH LIEBERMAN

HON. JOHN H. ROUSSELOT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to honor an outstanding citizen, Mr. Ralph Lieberman of Commerce, Calif., who has been selected to receive the "Man of the Year" award by the Kiwanis Club of his hometown.

Mr. Lieberman will be feted at the Kiwanis' annual barbeque luncheon on October 1. Later in November, he will be the recipient of the Industry Statesmen Award at a special meeting held in Washington, D.C.

These awards come at the culmination of Ralph Lieberman's 50-year career with Sinclair Paint Co.

Ralph Lieberman has grown along side of Sinclair Paint Co. When he began working, there were only three employees. Sinclair now boasts almost 1,000 employees, a headquarters, and 2 other locations. But one thing has stayed the same under Ralph Lieberman's direction: the quality of the paint. Although he retired this year, he still keeps a hand in the business, talking with the staff almost every day.

He is also a past president of the industrial council and continues to work with that organization as chairman of the nominating committee and as a member of the board of directors.

Besides being one of Commerce's outstanding business people, Ralph Lieberman is being recognized as "Humanitarian of the Year." Somehow, on top of his business duties, Ralph has found the time to work for area charities. His two favorite charities, the United Jewish Welfare Federation and the cardiovascular unit of Cedars of Sinai Hospital, have him working for them on nearly a full-time basis. He began working for the federation in the 1960's and served for 2 years as division chairman.

The Commerce Kiwanis could not have made a better choice for "Man of the Year." Ralph Lieberman has made outstanding contributions in business and charity work alike. I would like to congratulate Ralph Lieberman on his latest achievement.●

FIFTY WAYS TO PROMOTE INDUSTRIAL INNOVATION

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, it is frequently said that there is nothing Government can do to promote industrial innovation except get out of the way. Others, less skeptical of the role of Government, have still been cynical, and have asserted that there are no good ideas on how Government could help achieve this important national goal.

Personally, I have rejected both points of view and have instead advocated a variety of constructive initiatives. For several years, primarily through the Committee on Science and Technology, I have helped draft and in several cases enact legislation designed to encourage industrial innovation and productivity. During the Carter administration some modest progress, which I criticized as being inadequate, was made in implementing these programs. Surprisingly, given the oft-stated goals of the Reagan administration, most of the constructive initiatives in place when President Reagan entered office have been curtailed or eliminated.

Fortunately, not all initiatives originate in Washington, D.C. A few days ago the Governor's office in California issued an important report entitled, "Winning Technologies: A New Industrial Strategy for California and the Nation." This report, which was prepared by a 17-member Commission on Industrial Innovation appointed by California Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., is useful to those of us who work on this issue in Washington as it is to the original recipients in California.

Mr. Speaker, rather than attempt to summarize this report and extract what elements I felt were most important, I would like to share the summary of recommendations, along with the list of commission members. I commend the following material to my colleagues:

WINNING TECHNOLOGIES—A NEW INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY FOR CALIFORNIA AND THE NATION

TABLE OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Industrial strategies for innovation

1. The California Commission on Industrial Innovation calls for the United States and California to develop national and state industrial strategies, aimed at accelerating the invention and utilization of winning technologies.

Investment for innovation

2. The United States Congress should pass the Reciprocal Trade and Investment Act of 1982.

3. The President should aggressively negotiate lower trade barriers for high-technology products through the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT).

4. The United States should expand the incremental research and development tax credit.

5. The United States should enact an antitrust exemption for joint research by high-technology companies.

6. California should establish antitrust exemptions for research and development cooperative ventures.

7. The United States should restore budget cuts in research in such critical areas as the National Institutes of Health, the National Science Foundation, and the national laboratories of the Department of Energy and NASA.

8. The United States should move toward the complete elimination of taxation of long-term capital gains. As a first step, the government should eliminate capital gains tax on investments in new companies, while taxing gains from investment in nonproductive investment as ordinary income, as has been legislated in California.

9. The United States should allow corporations, at their option, to write off equipment at the rate at which it becomes obsolete if this would result in faster depreciation than current schedules permit.

10. The United States should create financial free trade zones to attract foreign investment.

11. California should bring its treatment of incentive stock options and employee stock ownership plans into conformity with recent federal changes.

12. The United States should redirect policies and increase support for the Export-Import Bank to assist U.S. businesses in effectively meeting unfair foreign competition.

13. States should enact pension fund flexibility to invest in innovation, as called for in Proposition 6 on the November 1982 ballot in California.

14. The United States should encourage investment in existing U.S.-based growth technologies targeted by government policies of our major industrialized trading partners.

Education and job training for innovation

15. The United States should mobilize national resources to support math, science, computer, engineering and high-technology vocational education, as was done through the National Defense Education Act in the 1950s.

16. University and community college governing boards should raise entrance requirements in math, science and computer studies.

17. School boards should raise standards required for graduation from high school to at least three years of math and two years of science, including at least one semester of computer studies.

18. Private industry should extend support for summer study by students in math, science and computer studies.

19. California should include science and computer studies in statewide or local standard elementary and secondary school achievement tests.

20. State universities should train guidance counsellors to encourage students to take math, science and computer courses, especially women and minorities.

21. California should reorient existing math and science achievement tests to stress problem-solving and not rote computation.

22. The United States and California should match funds with private industry to develop new curricula using new technologies like videos and computers.

23. Post-secondary education should expand the number of course offerings in math, science and computers available to secondary school students.

24. The U.S. Congress should pass legislation offering the same tax benefits for donations of computers to elementary and high schools as now exist for donations to universities.

25. California should promote the development of new computer software to expand computer education for interactive learning.

26. Until computers become more common, California should expose students to computers through mobile vans such as those sponsored by the Industry Education Council of California.

27. California should encourage school districts to form regional high-tech high schools which pool trained teachers, equipment and curricula.

28. School boards should offer teacher income supplements to math, science and computer teachers, based on what such skills are worth in the private sector.

29. Private industry should introduce recognition incentives for superior teachers. Universities should also recognize outstanding teachers.

30. The private sector should offer the use of employees as part-time teachers.

31. Private industry should provide employees to train teachers in math, science, and computer studies, and provide industry sites for hands-on computer training.

32. Universities and State Colleges should increase their commitment to math, science, and computer education.

33. State and federal governments could fund incentives in the form of teacher education scholarships to attract teachers into math, science and computer studies.

34. Private industry could also hire high school math and science teachers during the summer session, as a way to supplement their income and to gain upgrade training in new technologies.

35. School Boards should provide opportunities for all existing teachers to take training supplements in computer-aided education.

36. The State and federal governments should jointly fund inservice retraining for teachers in math and science, especially those with emergency credentials, through math/science computer institutes.

37. The United States and California should increase financial support to Schools of Engineering, Computer Science and related fields, so as to expand their capacity to produce qualified graduates.

38. The United States should not use the immigration laws to restrict the ability of foreign nations to work as engineers for U.S. companies or to serve as engineering faculty.

39. California should encourage the formation of university/industry research parks and expand other joint research efforts like MICRO, already established here, as a means of attracting new scientists and professors to the State.

40. California should encourage universities to revise patent policies to enhance industry cooperation.

41. The United States and state governments should encourage vocational programs to involve as much on-the-job training and employer participation as possible.

42. California should place a high priority on the development of vocational training programs in new and emerging technologies.

43. The private sector should establish Business/Labor councils to review existing programs, develop new ones, and take other actions to promote effective job-training.

44. The private sector should offer industry sites, equipment and employees to serve as faculty to the community colleges for job-training programs.

45. California should make a comprehensive effort to retrain existing teachers for the new skills of the 1980s.

46. The U.S. and California should make special efforts to develop effective job-training programs for displaced workers.

Employee-management productivity for innovation

48. California should establish Tripartite Boards to promote increased worker participation and productivity.

49. California should set up a clearinghouse to provide technical assistance and information to public and private sector efforts to increase workplace productivity.

50. California should encourage the development of employee stock ownership plans, and incentive stock option proposals for both workers and managers.

TRIBUTE TO CAPT. DONALD C. POE

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, on September 24, 1982, friends and colleagues will pay tribute to an outstanding law enforcement officer and community leader, Mr. Donald C. Poe. I would like to take this opportunity to join with those honoring Mr. Poe and commend him to the House of Representatives today.

A lifelong resident of the Inland Empire, Donald C. Poe was born in Loma Linda, Calif. and attended Redlands schools. Upon graduation from Redlands High School, Donald furthered his education at San Bernardino Valley College until joining the U.S. Navy in August 1948.

In February 1953, Mr. Poe was hired as a patrolman for the Redlands Police Department by Chief of Police W. E. Slaughter. He was promoted to sergeant in September 1955 and assigned to the traffic bureau until January 1959. Following a promotion to lieutenant, he was given the responsibility of assisting the architect who designed the present Redlands Police Department building.

Donald Poe was promoted to captain in January 1963. His assignments as captain have been in both the operations and administration divisions where he was responsible for budget, planning, organizational development, investigations, and patrol operations. Since joining the Redlands Police Department, he has worked for five chiefs of police and three acting chiefs and currently works for Chief Robert E. Brickley.

An active participant in community endeavors, Donald Poe is a member of the Redlands Host Lions Club, Redlands Elks Lodge No. 583, American Legion Post 106, the YMCA, and the Redlands Lawn Bowling Club. He has served as president and deputy district director of the Lions Club and is past exalted ruler of the Elks Club where he also served as secretary. His law enforcement organization affiliations have been as president of the Southern California Warrant Officers Association, president of the San Bernardino County Peace Officers Association, and the Redlands Police Benevolent Association. He holds a teaching credential in police science at the community college level.

An active sportsman, Donald's favorite pastimes include bowling, golf, softball, racquetball, and surf fishing. The highlight of his golfing career is a verified hole in one at the Redlands Country Club on July 2, 1963, on the fifth hole.

Mr. Poe and his lovely wife, Cathy, are the parents of 8 children and the grandparents of 13. Mr. and Mrs. Poe reside in the city of Redlands.

Mr. Speaker, it is truly an honor to recognize Mr. Donald Poe for his unswerving dedication to the law enforcement profession. His all-too-often thankless job has provided the security and safety for the residents of Redlands. Mr. Poe will certainly be missed but not forgotten by all those fortunate enough to have worked with him. With great respect I commend Mr. Donald Poe to the House of Representatives.●

SOVIET TARGET: SOUTH AFRICA

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, presented here are two articles written about the Soviet designs for taking over the African Continent by subverting current states and replacing them with Soviet puppets. These articles are based on the testimony of defectors from the Marxist-dominated Southwest African People's Organization and the African National Congress, organizations of terrorists and murderers posturing as political entities.

This testimony, given before the Senate Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, provides concrete reasoning for the United States not pushing for a negotiated settlement for the sake of a settlement in Namibia, but the United States should take the time necessary to insure a settlement directed toward real self-determination in that area. The world has enough Cubas and Nicaraguas already.

[From the Washington Times, Sept. 9, 1982]

SOUTH AFRICA: SOVIET'S CHIEF TARGET

(By Daniel James)

The Soviet Union's effort to capture Namibia through the South West African Peoples Organization (SWAPO) is basically a step toward attaining its central goal in southern Africa: the subversion of the Republic of South Africa.

Its chosen instrument for doing so is the African National Congress, like SWAPO a former nationalist group now Communist-dominated, according to ANC defectors testifying before the Senate Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism.

One defector, Bartholomew Hlapane, was simultaneously a member of the ANC's National Executive Committee while secretly serving on the Central Committee of the South African Communist Party—a role that gave him a rare insight into Soviet machinations in southern Africa.

Hlapane, who had joined the African National Congress in 1948 believing in its goal of achieving racial equality through peaceful, democratic means, was recruited by the South African Communist Party seven years later, persuaded that the SACP would speed up the process.

By 1964, however, he became convinced that the SACP was using the ANC as merely "the first step [toward establishing] a socialist state" in South Africa, and as a means of igniting a violent revolution which betrayed "what we told the people of South Africa," and resigned from both groups.

Today, the ANC is thoroughly Communist-dominated, with seven of its 22 National Executive Committee members, including the deputy secretary general, belonging to the South African Communist Party, Hlapane revealed to the Subcommittee. ANC's president, Oliver Tambo, though not formally a Communist, has embraced "scientific socialism" and gladly accepts Soviet support, both military and other.

"During the period I served in the ANC and S.A. Communist Party," Hlapane further testified, "no major decision could be taken by the ANC without the concurrence and approval of the Central Committee of the S.A. Communist Party. Most major developments were in fact initiated by the Central Committee."

Probably the most significant "development" was the SACP's decision, in 1961, to organize the ANC's military arm, Umkonto We Sizwe—"Spear of the Nation"—with Hlapane's recruiter and veteran Communist, Hoe Slove, assigned to the task. The UWS, Hlapane stated categorically, "received all their funds from the Communist Party of South Africa."

Those funds, in turn, come largely from the Soviet Union, he further testified.

The assistant secretary of state for African affairs, Chester A. Crocker, estimated during subcommittee hearings that the ANC "receives comparable percentages of its military and other support from Communist and other [i.e., Soviet-bloc] sources" to those received by SWAPO: 90 percent military and 60 percent "other" support.

Umkonto We Sizwe troops are trained, according to witnesses who served in them, by Soviet and Cuban instructors. One of them, Ephraim Mfalapitsa, 28, was trained in Angola and East Germany in the use of such Soviet weapons as the AK47, the Makarov, and F1 hand grenades, as well as in "politics including Leninism and Marxism."

A highly pertinent portion of Mfalapitsa's testimony documents the charge that Moscow is behind much of the terrorism in the world. He related that Soviet, Cuban and East German experts trained him in "laying mines on farm roads; attacking farmhouses; ambushing lonely vehicles; and attacking small police stations."

Another ex-member of ANC's military arm, Jeffrey Mtutuzele Bosigo, 23, testified before the Security and Terrorism Subcommittee that he had been picked up by its recruiters while eluding the South African police after having participated in a riot, and promised an opportunity to continue his schooling.

But he was sent instead to an "engineering camp"—a euphemism for a base where sabotage and terrorism are taught—in Angola. Then he was sent to another base, Nova Cantenque, where he and other South African blacks received instruction principally from Cubans.

The South African Communist Party has also acquired considerable influence over ANC "sister organizations"—in the phrase of Sen. Jeremiah Denton, chairman of the subcommittee—such as the South African Indian Congress and the South African Congress of Trade Unions.

Thus the Soviet attempt to subvert South Africa is a many-pronged one, including not only black groups but Asians and labor unions, and not only South Africans but also Namibians, Angolans, Cubans and Marxist elements in Zimbabwe and other African states.

SOVIET INTRUSION IN SOUTHERN AFRICA

(By Daniel James)

(This is the last of a three part series based on an advance copy of testimony from five hearings held by the Senate Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism from March 22 to March 31 of this year. The subcommittee took testimony from 11 witnesses, six of them defectors from the Marxist-dominated Southwest African People's Organization and African National Congress.)

The growing Soviet intrusion in southern Africa extends beyond Angola, Namibia and even (through the African National Congress) South Africa, to other countries in the region, according to witnesses who have testified before the Senate Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism. It extends, in fact, to the whole African continent.

Lt. Adriano Francisco Bomba, a fighter-bomber pilot, defected on July 8, 1981, from his native Mozambique because the ruling Marxist-Leninist party, Frelimo, was running his country into the ground. This was an example, he testified, with an eye to Namibia and southern Africa in general, of "the end result [of] the transformation of a genuine nationalist movement into surrogates of the U.S.S.R. in Africa once such movements come to power."

In 1977, on the verge of completing high school, Bomba and 74 other Mozambican youths "were handed over to the Ministry of Defense" and put on an Aeroflot plane to Moscow. He had been studying to be an engineer, but "they decided that I would become a fighter-bomber pilot to defend the power of [Frelimo]."

Returning to Mozambique some two years later, he found this "deplorable situation": Frelimo had become "a Marxist-Leninist party," had "strangled" the private sector, and had mismanaged the economy into "producing much less than before." In general, "before the independence in Mozambique, the conditions of life were better."

By June of 1981, "it suddenly occurred to me that even though this system was [designed] to bring Mozambique down, I was in fact defending it." Accordingly, "I decided to desert."

While in the Soviet Union, Lt. Bomba saw military trainees from all over Africa. They reflected the growing Soviet military buildup on the continent, particularly in the southern portion, whose exact ramifications are unknown but considered by experts to be vast. The buildup results in extending or consolidating Soviet political influence.

"In Angola and Mozambique," the U.S. Department of State's chief Africa expert, Chester A. Crocker, told the subcommittee, "the number and range of activities of Soviet, Cuban and other foreign Communist advisers and technicians, in the civilian and military domains, has increased, implying concomitant political and economic influence."

A University of Arkansas Africa expert, Peter Vanneman, testified that the Soviet's "basic strength" in SWAPO and the ANC lies within their military wings, "so any instability [in the area] . . . enhances the value of the military wing to these organizations, and therefore strengthens Soviet influence."

Nearly all the independent black states in southeren Africa, as well as the Soviet-dominated independence movements not yet in power, are increasingly dependent on Soviet military aid and equipment, according to Dr. Vanneman. The following chart supplies the latest (but necessarily complete) figures for six of those states:

The number of Soviet-bloc military elements in southern Africa has increased commensurately with the rising supply of military equipment, but exact totals are not known. In the last year for which reasonably accurate figures are available, 1978, the State Dept. has reported at least 41,000 "Communist military personnel" in sub-Saharan Africa, besides 37,000 "Communist country civilian technical experts" throughout the continent. But today, in Angola alone, intelligence officials calculate there are about 29,000 troops and "advisers" just from Cuba; in addition, the East Germans have a relatively substantial presence there.

Moscow has also increased the number and caliber of its diplomats in the region. Thus its embassy staff in Botswana, on South Africa's northern border, has mushroomed to 50 from a handful, while those in Angola and Mozambique total more than 100 each. An example of the quality of Soviet envoys, as well as of the importance Moscow is giving to southern Africa, is Vasily Solodovnikov, ambassador to Zambia until last year, who is recognized as its top Africanist.

The Soviets are generally "improving and developing their policy apparatus" in the region, Vanneman told the subcommittee. Today they boast a "very sophisticated group of people dealing with Africa, and they have a considerable number of organizations staffed with African specialists." Whereas in the 1960s there were almost no Africanists, now they have more than 300.

Typical of the mounting Soviet interest in Africa is the fact that Soviet foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko's son, Anatoly, has been made head of the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences' Africa Institute. Upon taking over the Institute, young Gromyko added six policy specialists to its staff, "transforming it from a predominantly development-oriented think tank to one more concerned with strategic policy."

The Soviets have correspondingly upgraded their intelligence operations in Africa. Thus in the KGB, Crocker told the subcommittee, "one of the largest propaganda sections deals with southern Africa. I think that is extremely significant."

The Soviet's overall coordinator of Africa policy is Boris Ponomarev, head of the Soviet Communist Party's International Department. "He is in frequent contact with the ANC and SWAPO people," Crocker further testified.

What is the Soviet's basic policy, or strategy, in southern Africa,

Although "the Soviet Union does not have a grand design for southern Africa . . . it is, in fact, taking advantage of targets of opportunitity . . . to act counter to Western interests," according to Crocker. "The Soviet Union . . . has a vested interest in keeping the region in turmoil."

Vanneman told the subcommittee that he believes the Soviets are "primarily concerned to enhance their influence in the Indian Ocean," to put pressure on the United States particularly in the Middle East. Thus during the Ethiopian conflict, Cuban troops were flown all the way from Angola across Mozambique to Ethiopia. "So, in other words, what is happening in southern Africa is intimately related to what is happening in the Middle East, and in the oil regions."

Interruptions of our oil and non-fuel strategic mineral supplies from the Middle East and southern Africa has been a basic Soviet objective for many years. As Sen. Jeremiah Denton, the subcommittee chairman, pointed out, nothing less than "The survival of the free world" is thus involved because of our overwhelming dependence upon strategic minerals imports from the region. In his statement opening the subcommittee's five hearings on southern Africa, he quoted Leonid Brezhnev as having summed up Soviet policy in a 1973 Prague, Czechoslovakia speech in these words:

"Our aim is to gain control of the two great treasure houses on which the West depends . . . the energy treasury house of the Persian Gulf and the mineral treasure house of central and southern Africa."

The Soviet military, political and economic intrusion in southern Africa is, in other words, aimed ultimately at the stability of the West—meaning, in the first instance, of the United States.

THE PARABLE OF ENTERPRISE

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, while reading yesterday's Christian Science Monitor I came across an article by William Echikson entitled "The Crisis of France's Breakfast: Morning Croissants or Socialism?" A more universal title for that article would have been "The Parable of Private Enterprise." In any case, this article very aptly demonstrates the virtues of private enterprise as opposed to the evils of government regulation. While this particular case deals with what is happening in France, the underlying principle applies to all governments that seek to regulate private enterprise. Rather than applying a maximum number of work hours per week, apply a minimum, or better yet, make no regulations on the matter at all: Keep private enterprise a private matter. For the interest of my colleagues, I would like to insert this article.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Sept. 8, 1982]

THE CRISIS OF FRANCE'S BREAKFAST: MORNING CROISSANTS OR SOCIALISM?

(By William Echikson)

It is 5:30 a.m. at the bakery on Rue de Babylone in the center of Paris.

Claude Bilnet, the owner, pulls out a rack of golden soft and flaky croissants, ready for the breakfast plate. Despite the early hour and the prospect of 12 more hours on the job, Mr. Bilnet smiles with pride as he looks over the savory rolls.

But turn the subject to France's Socialist President, Francois Mitterrand, and the smile disappears.

"If Mitterrand makes me do that, I won't be able to stay in business," he says.

No more fresh croissants? "No more."

His reaction is typical of France's many artisans, who are angry at Mr. Mitterrand's program of cutting work hours. In February the government decreed that workers are supposed to toil only 39 hours, down from 40. And if things go as planned, they will labor only 35 hours a week in 1985. The idea is to improve the worker's lot and open up new jobs.

But for bakers and other artisans such as chefs and hair stylists, the 39-hour workweek provoked a crisis.

In these fields workweeks traditionally last around 50 hours, and to cut working hours so drastically would cause a wave of bankruptcies in these small businesses, the artisans argued. The baking craft, for example, calls for both boss and worker to put in long days, beginning in the wee hours of the morning. Otherwise there would be no fresh bread for breakfast.

And since most of France's 40,000 "boulangeries" are family-run operations with three to five employees, they are unable to afford additional workers to compensate for the shorter workweek. A study for the National Bakers' Association claimed that if the 39-hour law was applied to bakers, half of the country's "boulangeries" would be forced to close.

As a result, the bakers' workweek became a test of how far Mitterrand was aiming to change France. Could the country do without its morning croissants?

Apparently not. Bosses and workers recently agreed on a 47-hour workweek in bakeries, down from last year's 49-hour maximum. And Mr. Mitterrand appears ready to accept this contract, even though it violates the 39-hour principle.

"There is no other choice," a Labor Ministry spokesman said. "This is the old system of work in France."

So France's artisans will continue to work long weeks—with union agreement. Up to 500,000 workers are affected, according to the Labor Ministry.

For such artisans working overtime is considered necessary to achieve excellence. Cooking gourmet meals in three-star restaurants or styling hair in the modes of fashions simply takes more than 39 hours a week. But is it just pride that makes these artisans willing to forgo the benefits of socialism?

"No, bakers are willing to work so hard because they know they can rise to become an owner," says Francois Guillermer, secretary general of the Paris Bakers' Association. "Individual enterprise is rewarded."

The baker Bilnet, for example, started out as an apprentice baker in Lyon 17 years ago. Now he owns his own bakery in the heart of Paris. He works much more than his employees, up to 80 hours a week, beginning early in the morning.

"If I didn't work so much. I would only make the minimum wage," he says. "But I am the boss and that is a terrific feeling."

He puts the batch of steaming croissants in the counter and opens the bakery for business. For the first hour until his salesgirl arrives, he will tend the register.

An older man enters. "Deux croissants, s'il vous plait," he says.

"Oui, monsieur," Bilnet responds, handing him two delicious-looking rolls. Both men smile.●

CABINET COMMITTEE ON OPPORTUNITIES FOR SPANISH-SPEAKING PEOPLE

HON. JOHN H. ROUSSELOT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to recognize the historic achievement of the Cabinet Committee on Opportunities for Spanish Speaking People, created by Congress in December 1969.

This Cabinet Committee, composed of several members of the President's Cabinet and other high-ranking officials of our Government, opened the door of opportunity to our Spanish-speaking citizens in much the same way archeologists opened the secret passageways in the pyramids in order to gain access to the knowledge of the past.

Spanish-speaking citizens suddenly found some of their own in high-ranking Government positions and with access to a number of Government-run programs ranging from housing and health benefits to economic development.

We are indeed fortunate to have had this committee chaired by two very distinguished Spanish-speaking leaders, both of whom, I might add, are from California—Martin Castillo of Monterey Park, a fighter pilot in World War II; and Henry Ramirez of Pomona, a migrant grape picker. These gentlemen devoted themselves to a task never undertaken in Government before—finding ways of bringing Spanish-speaking people into positions in the Government and participating in the many programs available to all citizens. And, today, the programs they formulated are part of U.S. Government policy.

Although funded by only $1 million annually, the rewards many times exceed the investment, not only in terms of actual benefits, but in terms of pride and accomplishment.

During its 5-year charter, the Cabinet Committee on Opportunities for Spanish Speaking People provided the initial momentum that brought a heretofore excluded minority, whose cultural heritage has so enriched our great Nation, into the mainstream of American life.

To Marty, Henry, and all of you who participated in the Cabinet Committee on Opportunities for Spanish-Speaking People—today we salute you.●

DOWN'S SYDROME

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to my colleagues' attention the following article on Down's Syndrome which recently appeared in the New York Times.

This article is significant for two important reasons. First, it notes the tremendous advances that have occurred in the treatment of Down's Syndrome. And second, that despite this progress, there is still a stigma associated with those who are affected by Down's Syndrome.

It seems to me that it is wrong and unfair for society to treat Down's Syndrome individuals prejudicially when a growing number of these individuals are able to read, write, and function at near-normal levels.

Because studies have shown that one of the most beneficial outcomes of national commissions is to heighten public awareness of an issue and that increased public awareness is the most effective approach to removing the stigma associated with a handicapping condition, such as Down's Syndrome, I have introduced legislation, H.R. 4657, to establish a National Commission on Down's Syndrome.

I urge my colleagues to join with me and 63 other Members of the House of Representatives who have cosigned this legislation, in this effort to improve the quality of life for the 250,000 individuals and their families who are affected by Down's Syndrome.

[From the New York Times, Aug. 31, 1982]

DOWN'S SYNDROME MASKED BY SURGERY

(By Maya Pines)

No matter how well they act, how much they have learned or how close they come to having normal intelligence, children with Down's syndrome always stand out in a crowd because of their recognizable features, which label them "retarded."

Now, a leading Israeli psychologist, Dr. Reuven Feuerstein, advocates a series of relatively minor plastic operations that can make these children less conspicuously different and "more socially acceptable."

Children with Down's syndrome used to be regarded as nearly hopeless by most educators and physicians. But in the last decade, intensive infant stimulation and other training programs have enabled growing numbers of them to read, write and function at nearly normal levels, while more aggressive medical care has prevented some physical problems.

"Many of these youngsters can work up to high levels of functioning," said Dr. Feuerstein, who runs a children's home in Jerusalem as part of the Hadassah-Wizo Canada Research Institute. "Yet they are not accepted by society because of their appearance."

The operations he recommends were begun by two German plasitc surgeons in 1977 after they heard the testimony of a German couple whose daughter had had the first experimental operation nine years earlier, performed by another surgeon, Dr. H. Hoehller.

The parents were so pleased with this operation that they began a national campaing to urge other doctors to do such surgery. Because of the operation, they said, their daughter had been freed from the stigma of Down's syndrome, had been treated normally by other children and adults and had made enormous strides in social development.

The two plastic surgeons, Drs. Gottfried Lemperle and Dorin Radu, have now operated on more than 250 Down's syndrome children between the ages of 3 and 24 at Frankfurt's St. Markus Hospital.

The doctors have generally reduced the size of each child's protruding tongue (both for cosmetic reasons and because this made it easier to speak), brought the ears closer to the head, raised hanging lower lips, altered the axis of the eyelids, raised cheekbones with small implants of silicone, raised the bridge of the nose and, in some cases, put implants into severely receding chins.

Some of the children needed only a few of these operations. Even when all the procedures were required, however, they could be done within an hour and a half, in a single session.

Dr. Feuerstein says the operations leave no visible scars and are no more serious than the plastic operations commonly done to correct other congenital defects, such as cleft palate.

When he saw the German work, he said: "I became convinced. There is practically no risk. It's very cheap. There is no significant trauma. And it gives the children an opportunity to be seen as individuals, rather than just members of a strange and inferior group."

At Dr. Feuerstein's invitation, Dr. Lemperle demonstrated his technique in Israel. Last February, as a pilot study, 11 Israeli children were operated on at the Hadassah Medical Center. They were videotaped extensively before, during and after the operations.

"We want to learn exactly what the operation means to these children and their parents," Dr. Feuerstein said. "We were afraid the children would look in the mirror after the surgery and not recognize themselves. But it didn't happen. Afterward, they have been very happy."

One young man who used to spend his time clowning, as a defense against stigma, rapidly improved his behavior after seeing his new appearance.

Although the surgery cannot make the children look completely normal, Dr. Feuerstein has been so encouraged by the results of the first Israeli operations that he recently visited the United States to spread the word.●

TRIBUTE TO BISHOP PAUL ANDERSON

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, during the August recess, I had the very enjoyable privilege of visiting with Bishop Paul Anderson of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Duluth which covers much of my district in northeastern Minnesota. The occasion was not an entirely happy one in that Bishop Anderson is leaving Duluth after 14 years to serve in a new capacity in South Dakota.

Bishop Anderson is a marvelous, compassionate priest who has been an articulate voice for social justice and for ecumenicism.

In April 1981, nearly 18 months ago, Bishop Anderson and I appeared at a public rally to call for an end of U.S. involvement in El Salvador. The bishop responded with deep feeling to the spirit of Archbishop Romero of San Salvador who had urged the United States to stop supplying the arms which were responsible for the deaths of thousands of Salvadorans.

Bishop Anderson spoke as a religious man, a servant of God's people, a man deeply disturbed by the violence and suffering in El Salvador.

The same humanitarian concern which moved him to speak against outrages in El Salvador has also prompted his very principled, and public, position in support of an end to the nuclear arms race, as well as a most eloquent and moving appeal for passage of the equal rights amendment, expressed in his homily of last Sunday.

As a Congressman, and as one of the bishop's flock in the diocese, it has been a great comfort to me to know that I stand with my bishop in opposition to military aid to El Salvador and in support of the nuclear arms freeze.

Bishop Anderson has not championed these causes as political issues; rather, he has spoken as a man of profound religious convictions who is committed to working to end conflict and social injustice in the world.●

VOLUNTEER FIRE DEPARTMENTS

HON. VIN WEBER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. WEBER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, volunteer fire departments have been saving property and lives in our Nation for decades. These departments serve as fine examples of what can be accomplished through community spirit and volunteerism. Almost a year ago, our President appealed to us to rediscover that spirit of volunteerism that helped make our Nation great. Today I would like to share with my colleagues an example of that spirit flourishing in southwestern Minnesota.

A dinner was held on August 31 in Windom, Minn., a small city with a population of 4,666. The gathering honored four retiring volunteer firemen, who have spent two nights a month for the entire length of their service in order to be prepared for disaster. The department not only provides protection for the city, but also a small village and 10 surrounding townships.

I would like to share with my colleagues the tribute to these men as given by Marion Uhlhorn, a member of the city council. It would be difficult for small communities in rural America to survive, were it not for people who place community service as one of their priorities in life. The city of Windom, Minn., hereby acknowledges that they have been fortunate, indeed, for a total of 114 years service by John S. Paulson, fire chief, 33 years; John Galle, Sr., assistant fire chief, 28 years; Waldine Moede, second assistant fire chief, 32 years; Raymond Sartorius, third assistant fire chief, 21 years; as volunteer firemen.

Not only have they contributed to the city of Windom as firemen, but many of them have served on the junior chamber of commerce, board of chambers of commerce and industrial development, church boards, and as members of a host of various civic organizations that make a small community progressive.

City officials recognize their contribution to the city of Windom as they have always worked closely with the city council. Windom has always had a fire department to be proud of, and this is evidenced by significant improvements over recent years, such as new quarters for firefighting equipment, modern up-to-date firefighting apparatus and trucks, and township fire contracts. No, this was not a 1- or 2-year project. Proper planning and budgeting over approximately 10 years produced the necessary results and at the same time placed no hardship on the taxpayers in the community.

As citizens of Windom, we salute all firemen, past and present, for their resourcefulness, abilities, high regard for life and property, dedication to the job, and unselfishly giving of their time for such a very important community service.●

CITY LIFE AT ITS BEST

HON. NORMAN D. DICKS
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. DICKS. Mr. Speaker, the July 19 issue of Sports Illustrated contains an article entitled "Seattle: City Life at Its Best." This article describes the tremendous changes that have taken place in Seattle over the past 25 years—changes that have made that great city not only the capital of the Pacific Northwest, but, in the article's words, "a paragon and an inspiration." Seattle, like so many of our Nation's urban centers, has experienced substantial population and economic growth throughout the postwar era. The city's ability, through its forward thrust development program, to preserve its beautiful surroundings and cultural heritage while simultaneously coping with that growth is both a striking contrast to many of America's cities and a living tribute to the foresight and dedication of Seattle's citizens and its leaders.

As part of this growth and change, Mr. Speaker, Seattle has also become a major league community. Of all the projects that were undertaken as part of the forward thrust program, we are most proud of the Kingdome, the home of Seattle's professional sports franchises.

The citizens of Seattle committed nearly $70 million to build the Kingdome as a home for Seattle's professional sports franchises. And the citizens of Seattle could not have made that commitment without substantial and reliable assurances that those professional sports teams, if well supported in the Kingdome, would continue to play there. We needed to know that our investments would not be in vain, and that our trust would not be misplaced.

Following the Kingdome's opening in 1976, major league sports flocked to Seattle. Nearly 14 million people have come to the Kingdome to see our Seahawks of the NFL, our Mariners of baseball's American League, our SuperSonics of the NBA, and our Sounders of the NASL. These teams and their stadium have brought tourism and investment to Seattle, have provided our community with tremendous entertainment throughout the year, and have brought us the world championship of basketball, and solid, contending teams in each of the other sports as well. Moreover, despite the dire predictions that the Kingdome would be an economic failure, it has proven to be a highly profitable and well managed facility. Because of Seattle's success at attracting and maintaining professional sports teams, the special taxes levied to pay for the facility have been repealed, and the outlook for the future is excellent.

Because all communities that have professional sports teams—not just Seattle—are entitled to similar assurances, I have cosponsored H.R. 6467, the Major League Sports Community Protection Act of 1982. This bill, introduced by Congressmen DON EDWARDS, HENRY HYDE, and PETE STARK, now has some 150 cosponsors in the House. A companion bill, S. 2784, has broad cosponsorship in the Senate. Both bills will provide sports fans and communities with significant and much-needed protection of the financial and emotional investments they make on behalf of their local teams.

This legislation protects the ability of sports leagues such as the NFL to continue policies that have made NFL expansion to cities like Seattle possible. The bill authorizes leagues to keep teams in communities where the league determines the team can operate successfully. In the context of expansion, this provision will permit the NFL and other sports leagues to determine that expansion teams should operate on a long-term basis in the expansion communities selected by the league. The legislation also protects revenue sharing among the teams of a league, and such revenue sharing in the NFL—for example, the equal division of all network television revenues among the 28 NFL teams—makes it possible for new communities, such as Seattle and its partner expansion team, Tampa Bay, to participate in the NFL on an equal footing with the established teams. In short, if the NFL policies protected by this legislation cannot continue to be pursued by the league, one would have to question whether a community such as Seattle would ever have been chosen as an NFL franchise city—and one will have to question whether future NFL expansion to other cities of similar size can take place.

The need for this legislation is also dramatically illustrated by the events that have taken place over the past 2 years in Oakland, Calif. As in Seattle, the citizens of Oakland turned that community into a major league city by constructing a new multipurpose sports complex and filling it with winning professional sports teams and tens of thousands of loyal fans. No team, including our Seahawks, has ever been as well supported as were the Oakland Raiders. No team has ever been as successful on the field as were the Oakland Raiders. And yet, despite that record of success and support, the Raiders have announced their intention to transfer to Los Angeles over the unanimous opposition of the other clubs in the NFL. That transfer shows a callous disregard for the loyalty of their fans and for the taxpayers who will now have to assume the financial burden of amortizing and maintaining the stadium that they built for the Raiders such a short time ago.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is fair to the fans, to the taxpayers, or to the sports league that has tried to uphold its commitments to Congress and to the community of Oakland. And most of all, I do not want to see similar episodes repeated in Seattle or other communities throughout our Nation. H.R. 6467 would insure that we would not again have to witness the shameless spectacle that has taken place in northern California.

As its sponsors have stressed, H.R. 6467 and S. 2784 are narrow and carefully drafted pieces of legislation. They will in no way affect the interests of players or player unions, and they confer no new broad antitrust immunity on any sports league. They will not affect current television broadcasting practices and will not entitle sports leagues to engage in predatory or discriminatory conduct against competing leagues. H.R. 6467 deserves prompt and favorable consideration by every Member of this Congress, and I look forward to its swift enactment.●

MEXICAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JOHN H. ROUSSELOT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, on the eve of Mexican Independence Day when we join our friend and sister nation to the south in celebration of her hard-won freedom, the largest concentration of Spanish-speaking people in this country prepare for its own celebration out in Los Angeles.

I would like to congratulate the organizing body behind the festivities—Comite Mexicano Civico and Patriotica—for its 51st anniversary from the Comite's founding by Don Rafael de la Celina and for its present activity under the leadership of President Horatio Molina. Because of this committee the rich Mexican heritage and achievements of her heroes have not only been preserved for future generations, but shared with all of Los Angeles.

The Comite's most outstanding accomplishment is the East Los Angeles Patriotic Parade, which over the years has grown from a local affair into an international production—televised in Mexico and South America and attended by over 150,000 Californians. A special committee within the Comite Mexicano Civico and Patriotica, Comisiones Desfile De La Independencia, put this spectacular event together.

I would like to extend the sincerest thanks and gratitude on behalf of the U.S. House of Representatives to Mr. Sal B. Lopez, the director of the committee, for his and the committee's tireless efforts in bringing America the East Los Angeles Patriotic Parade, a beautiful and time-honored tradition. For 22 years, Mr. Lopez has organized the parade, and each year he has witnessed the growth and increased participation which has made it one of the top three parades in southern California. To Mr. Lopez, Mr. Molina, the Comite Mexicano Civico and Patriotica, the nation of Mexico, and all Americans of Mexican descent—viva Mexico.●

ANDREW RICE HONORED BY SOCIETY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

HON. HENRY S. REUSS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, at the Society for International Development's 25th anniversary World Conference in Baltimore this summer, my friend, Dr. Andrew Rice, received the society's first award for service, for his "consistent dedication to creating an international organization of individuals committed to bettering the lives of all people." The citation from the society (SID) noted that "as creator and editor of numerous development publications, as founder of chapters and membership services, and through his outstanding integrity and loyalty to SID, Andrew Rice is a continuing exemplar of international service." I want to tell my colleagues more about this remarkable man.

Andy has spent the last 20 years in devoted service to SID, a worldwide association of individuals and institutions engaged in international development. The goal of SID, in Andy's own words, is "to create a more humane world," through bringing together agencies and individuals of all nationalities to create a world society that is "open, participatory, solidly based in the community yet global in outlook, aware of complexity yet convinced that there exists the intellectual capacity and persuasive power to cope with it."

Andy was born in Madison, Wis., in 1922, and attended Harvard College, where he received a bachelor's degree with honors in Government in January 1943. He then entered the U.S. Army and achieved the rank of first lieutenant. Upon his return to civilian life in 1946, he enrolled in the China regional studies program at the Harvard Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, and received a masters degree in 1948.

Andy came to Washington in 1948, beginning a career in Government service as economics secretary of the Far Eastern Commission in the Department of State, and later as the international housing adviser in the Housing and Home Finance Agency. From 1950 to 1953, he worked on the staff of the Americans for Democratic Action, and then as the executive director of the American Veterans Committee until 1955.

The next few years he spent on Capitol Hill, as my own administrative assistant in 1956, and later as executive assistant to Senator WILLIAM PROXMIRE. In 1958, Andy began studying for his doctorate in political science while teaching courses at the Maxwell

School of Citizenship at Syracuse University. At the same time he served as executive assistant to the dean of the Maxwell School, Harlan Cleveland.

Andy returned from Syracuse to Washington in 1960 as a visiting fellow at the Brookings Institution, while finishing his doctoral dissertation on "building a constituency for the U.S. foreign aid program during the Eisenhower years." He also undertook a special assignment for the Colorado State University Research Foundation as the coauthor of a feasibility study on the Peace Corps, which was published under the title, "New Frontiers for American Youth." It was during this period that Senator Hubert Humphrey and I developed the original legislation establishing the Peace Corps, and Andy's work was enormously helpful in guiding that legislation to enactment under President Kennedy.

From 1961 to 1962, Andy was Special Assistant to Under Secretary of State Chester Bowles, and continued in that position when Under Secretary Bowles was appointed as Special Adviser to the President on African, Asian, and Latin American Affairs. In 1963, he was awarded his doctorate by the Maxwell School.

In addition to Andy's work at SID during the years of 1962 to 1977, he was a member of the Board of the Overseas Development Council and Worldwatch, further demonstrating his commitment to the "emerging global village." On the local level, he was elected president of the Citizens' Association of Cabin John, Md., the community in which he resides.

Upon the occasion of Andy Rice's 20th anniversary with the Society of International Development, and the society's own 25th anniversary, I commend them for their long and tireless efforts toward an international community, and convey my best wishes for success in this most worthy effort.●

CONTRACT SANCTITY

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to guarantee the sanctity of farm product export contracts. Today, many of the world's grain firms are reluctant to enter into contracts with the Soviet Union because they have no assurance that the U.S. Government will allow them to deliver products in excess of the 8 million tons guaranteed by the United States-Soviet grains agreement.

At a time when this Nation is flooded with surplus grain, we simply cannot afford an ambiguous trade policy. Either we are going to do business with the Soviets, or we are not. The fact is that, economically, we have no choice. The Soviets know it.

Farm groups are aware of it, too. In the latest issue of the U.S. Wheat Associates newsletter, Tim Oviatt writes:

The fact remains that the U.S. now relies on the U.S.S.R. more than ever to trim the bulging grain stocks, even though U.S. export grain customers number over 100 countries.

And, in the August 30 edition of Farm Week, the Illinois Farm Bureau newspaper, an emergency program to raise farm income is outlined. Among the proposals listed is one calling on the Government to restore our credibility and reliability as a supplier. According to the Illinois Farm Bureau, we must:

First, establish a new attitude on the part of the administration that there will be no more embargoes or sanctions whether it be of corn or pipeline equipment. There is every evidence to suggest that in every case of an embargo or sanction our Government has inflicted greater loss on U.S. producers that it has on the nation to which the embargo or sanction is directed.

Second, pass legislation to guarantee the sanctity of contracts.

Third, pass legislation to limit the use of an embargo to those cases involving declared war or where both Houses of Congress have authorized such drastic action.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that passage of this legislation is essential to the well-being of the American people. We can no longer afford to let the foreign policy elitists at the White House put decent men and women out of work so that we can maintain the illusion that we are doing something about problems over which we have no control.

Thank you.●

MOUNT OLIVE CHURCH CELEBRATES 75TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, the Mount Olive United Methodist Church near Prince Frederick, Md., is celebrating its 75th anniversary and homecoming this week. The church, built on land purchased from Calvert County in 1906, has already outgrown two buildings and is filling up a third.

Mount Olive has a long, proud history, and is built on a foundation of good people, starting with the seven trustees who bought the land on which the church now stands—Charles Stewart, Louis Morsell, Arthur Sewell, John Scales, Frank Parran, Hezekiah Mason, and Rufus Brooks.

Others, like Benjamin Parran, who served as a local preacher in the absence of an ordained minister, provided spiritual leadership for the church until his death in 1977 at the age of 89.

Mount Olive has produced other success stories, like Dorothy Turner, who is now an ordained minister in the Baptist Church in Baltimore, and who still makes regular trips back to Mount Olive to conduct services.

The church's current pastor, Rev. Andrew Johnson, has been conducting services at Mount Olive for almost 20 years and said the congregation is still growing. Not all of the traditions of the past 75 years have survived. The time-honored outdoor camp meeting, a service held under a large outdoor tent which attracted worshipers from all over the county, is a thing of the past. But new traditions have developed to meet the needs of a changing society. The church now offers adult education programs and helps its members find answers to modern day problems.

One of the Mount Olive members can still remember the early history of the church. She is Florence Estelle Stewart King, who was born on June 12, 1896, and still comes to every service. Florence only misses a service when she is not feeling well or cannot find anyone to take her, and Reverend Johnson tells me that is not very often.

The church's anniversary celebration will be filled with gospel singing and nightly and Sunday services with visiting ministers and their choirs. The final day of celebration, Sunday, will feature a banquet with Rev. Cornelius Carter of the Canaan Baptist Church as the guest speaker.

Other ministers who will speak during the anniversary celebration will be Rev. Joseph Collins, pastor of the Brooks United Methodist Church; Rev. James Brooks of Brandywine; Rev. Howard Kent, pastor of Cooper's/Peter's Charge: Rev. Jeffrey Smith, pastor of Hope Church, and Rev. Carl Hickerson III and members of the St. Mary's larger parish.

Reverend Johnson, who came to Mount Olive from my own St. Mary's County, said Mount Olive was founded to meet the needs of a growing congregation who up to that time had been meeting at the Carroll Methodist Church and at the home of James Sewell for Sunday school.

The present church, finished in 1977 and located off Dares Beach Road, has a seating capacity of about 200 people.

Mr. Speaker, this country was built on leadership inspired by a faith in God. Mount Olive, and churches like it, are a constant reminder of our Nation's heritage. It is only fitting that we pay tribute to the important role the Mount Olive church has played in its community for the past 75 years.●

THE WAR AGAINST DRUNK DRIVING

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues hundreds of Americans that are MADD—Mothers Against Drunk Drivers—and SADD—Students Against Drunk Drivers. These Americans, members of MADD and SADD have joined together for the fight against drunk drivers, the killer of over 26,000 Americans a year. Drunk drivers are the cause of more deaths in the past 2 years than the number of Americans killed in Vietman. On the average, 3 Americans are killed and 80 are injured every hour of every day. Over the past decade one quarter of a million Americans were killed by drunk drivers—a number equal to the entire population of Rochester, N.Y. and one-half the population of my district. These statistics are frightening, especially when so many of the defendants receive minor sentences.

I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues an article from Newsweek magazine outlining the war against drunk drivers and expressing the need for the American people to take a harder attitude toward offenders:

America's tacit acceptance of drinking and driving has the effect of tossing time bombs on the nation's highways. An example was a Georgia man who, after his 13th conviction for driving while drunk, was sentenced to just one year in prison. Thus, he was drunk and on the road again 20 months later when he crashed and killed himself. Or consider the case of William Rowan. Rowan was once sentenced to 45 days in jail, a mild penance for a California driving record that carried six convictions for drunk or reckless driving, two for hit and run. Last March, after leaving a downtown Santa Ana bar, Rowan drove onto a sidewalk, killing four-year-old David Gunderman, who was waiting for the ice-cream man. After hitting the child, Rowan slumped in his seat and lit a cigar. Police measured his blood alcohol content at .27.

Campaigns against drunk driving have always had sobering truths on their side; what they lacked was a real constituency. All that may have changed one spring afternoon in 1980, when 13-year-old Cari Lightner of Fair Oaks, Calif., was struck from behind and killed by a hit-and-run driver as she walked to a church carnival. Cari's mother was stunned to learn that the driver, a 47-year-old man who had two previous drunk-driving convictions and was out on bail on a third arrest, had spent only two days in jail previously and was unlikely to wind up there for killing Cari. Candy Lightner quit her real-estate job and launched Mothers Against Drunk Drivers (MADD), giving the public outcry against drunk driving the constituency it has always needed—the victims.

In the past, says Edward Kunec, a NASA official who joined MADD in Virginia after his 20-year-old son was killed by a drunk driver last summer, "people who had these tragedies closeted themselves and said it was fate or the will of the Lord. Now people are coming out of the closet—and they are angry." In just two years, MADD has grown to 83 chapters in 29 states. Remove Intoxicated Drivers-USA (RID), founded in New York under similarly tragic circumstances, went national last year and now boasts 55 chapters in 29 states. The anger that is the movement's glue has made these organizations aggressively self-righteous and militant. "You can't be too strident," explains RID national coordinator Doris Aiken. "I don't know how you can tell someone nicely that they are incompetent to drive." Aiken warns those who view this campaign as a fad that will soon fade: "The pendulum will not swing back. There is an endless supply of victims."

The legal system often transforms the victims' grief into outrage. Paul Lawler, 15, died five days after a van barreled off a Massachusets highway and into a restaurant entrance, pinning him against the restaurant wall. The drunk at the wheel was on probation for his third drunk-driving conviction. He was sentenced to four and a half years in prison—including the then maximum of two and a half years for vehicular homicide—and is eligible for parole next July, just two years after the accident. "I was under the impression anyone arrested for this kind of thing would have the book thrown at him," says Paul's mother, Carol Lawler, who now heads the Greater Boston Chapter of MADD. "I didn't know vehicular homicide was a misdemeanor."

Mark and Bonnie Schuett turned the death of their four-year-old daughter, Kelly, who was killed as she walked near her home in quiet Ixonia, Wis., into a statewide cause celebre. The driver, a 29-year-old man with a prior drunk-driving arrest, pleaded no contest to driving while intoxicated and was given a suspended five-day jail sentence and fined $284. His license was revoked for a year—but was actually restored after 90 days because he took treatment at an alcohol-abuse center. "This man got away with hitting and killing my child," says Mrs. Schuett. "Her life means more than a $284 fine." As a result of the Schuetts' lobbying effort, a new Wisconsin law went into effect last May that permits the state to suspend the license of anyone arrested for an alcohol-related driving offense—even before a trial. "Maybe we've saved somebody else's life," says Mrs. Schuett. "But I'm still angry."

Guilt: If anger fuels the movement, guilt is its motor oil. Thomas and Dorothy Sexton recall going to court to witness the trial of the man whose blood alcohol content was .26 when he killed the Sextons' 15-year-old son, Tom. They saw a car thief sentenced to two years in jail, while their son's killer—who pleaded guilty to homicide by a motor vehicle—was sentenced to two years' probation and fined $200. "We painfully relate our experience and say, 'If you don't want that to happen to you, let's do something'," says Sexton, a U.S. Department of Agriculture scientist who is now active in Maryland's MADD chapter. "I'm convinced if I had been involved in something like this five years ago, Tom would be alive today."

The movement's approach to the drunk-driving problem is essentially punitive. While legislation varies from state to state, it usually makes driving with .10 blood alcohol content (three beers or glasses of wine or shots of whisky consumed by a 150-pound man in two hours) a crime. In addition, many of the new laws make prison mandatory, if not for the first offense, certainly for the second. They often increase penalties for drivers who refuse the blood alcohol test and require that all convictions—regardless of the court disposition—be listed on a driver's record.

Many states are delighted by the preliminary results of the new laws. In Maryland, drunk-driving arrests by state police have gone up 45 percent and highway fatalities down almost 20 percent since its law went into effect. Maine, which last year began mandatory jail sentences for first-time offenders, has experienced a 47-percent reduction in alcohol-related fatalities. Oregon has had the most experience—its crackdown began in 1971—and the most success. During the '70s, highway fatalities dropped —— percent and Oregon's fatality rate declined 35 percent despite the presence of 46 percent more drivers and 62 percent more vehicles on the road.

Success may be due to more than tough laws. Oregon has coupled its legal effort with a media campaign that urges Oregonians to report drunk drivers to a special telephone hot line. One hot-line spokesman is Donn Durrant, a former logger who had lost his license four times for drunk driving before he drove off the road at 85 mph and broke his neck. Durrant, now a quadriplegic, says in a TV message: "I wish someone had gotten me off the road before I had the accident which drastically changed my life."

Other states are backing their legislation with a variety of programs. South Dakota places highway signs reading, "X marks the spot . . . THINK!" at the almost 600 locations where drivers have lost their lives since 1979. Some states have considered efforts to stigmatize the drunk driver publicly. One Pennsylvania legislator proposed a special red license plate for all drivers convicted of driving while intoxicated—a modern-day scarlet letter. Local police in both Maryland and Massachusetts have gone so far as to use roadblocks, called "sobriety checkpoints," to deter and detect drunk drivers, though the Massachusetts effort has been ruled unconstitutional by a state court. Many states, however, complain that the new laws overtax their increasingly limited resources. Maine was the only state to include in its crackdown legislative package a new tax on liquor, which is expected to produce $2 million to $3 million annually that will be earmarked for treatment and prevention to alcohol problems.

Court Watch: The anti-drunk-driving campaigners are pressuring the courts as well as the legislators. One such group keeps constant watch in North Carolina's Forsyth County District Traffic Court. "People walk up to us and tell us things have changed," says Sandra Nicastro, one of the group's court fixtures. "Lawyers have told their clients, 'I don't think I can get you of this time because that lady's sitting there listening'." Some judges need little ecouragement to get tough. Maine judges have meted out an average jail sentence of eight days to drunk drivers under the state's new laws—four times the permitted minimum. And a Mecklenburg County, N.C., judge may have set a new standard when he sentenced a drunk driver, who had eight prior arrests but had caused no injuries, to three years in jail.

Many safety experts insist crusaders should be focusing on automobiles and highways, not on drivers. H. Laurence Ross, a sociology professor at State University of New York at Buffalo, who has studied crackdowns on drunk driving, says deterrence only works for the short term when the problem is treated as a moral one rather than a safety question. In a new book, he writes: "A vehicle and highway that are safe for an alcohol-influenced driver are also safe for a driver who has a heart attack, who dozes off, who drops a lighted cigarette on his lap, who fails to see a stop sign. . . ."

Others are convinced that the lock-'em-up approach is meaningless unless it's combined with therapy. "I don't think the tougher laws will stop the hard-core alcoholics," says Col. Tom Anderson, director of the state police in Alaska, which has had a mandatory prison law since 1978. "It's a mess," agrees Arthur Snowden II, director of the state's court system. "We're just putting people in high-priced jails . . . just taking them off the street is not going to solve the problem." But Maryland district court Judge David Bates thinks he knows the solution. Bates gives drunk drivers the maximum permissible sentence, then waives it if they are willing to enter an appropriate education or treatment program. While it is hard to measure the success of Bates's approach because probationary sentences weren't included on drivers' records until last year, Bates says only 149 of the 5,697 drivers referred to the program dropped out or had their probation revoked.

But putting drunks behind bars does take them off the road in a way revoking their licenses never did. Many of those convicted in the past simply drove without a license. Others easily obtained licenses in other states: a Federal Highway Administration study reported that Ohio in 1977 had issued 1.3 million more licenses than there were driving-age Ohioans. Clarence Busch, who inadvertently launched MADD when he killed Cari Lightner, moved to Wisconsin last fall and obtained a license within a few days. The National Driver Register, a computerized roster of drivers whose licenses have been suspended, revoked or denied, was established in 1960 to remedy such problems. But states can communicate with it only by mail, and with 84,000 inquiries coming in daily, the system is cumbersome and slow.

'No Questions Asked': Still, there are signs of reform that just a few years ago would have been unimaginable. One is Students Against Drunk Drivers (SADD), which began as a high-school project in suburban Wayland, Mass., and has been replicated already by students in 150 other schools. In Wayland, 900 students signed SADD contracts with their parents, promising to call home at any hour when a sober ride home is not available. In return, parents pledge "to come and get you at any hour, any place, no questions asked and no argument at that time * * *." Montgomery County, Md., had a surprise for students heading to senior year-end festivities. The boys found a note tucked in their rented tuxedos counseling, "Friends don't let friends drive drunk," and providing a hot-line number that provided free rides home. And in rural Truman, Minn., the high school spent $79 for a breath-testing device for its prom after rowdy drunks disrupted last year's festivities. The machine is now kept in the school vault for use during school hours.

Anti-drunk-driving crusaders hope that breath-testing devices will become as much a fixture on the social scene as the shaker and stirrer, and a number of bars and restaurants have installed them. Anthony Ravosa, a defense attorney who has defended many clients against drunk-driving charges, offers a breath test to customers in his South Hadley, Mass., Riverboat Restaurant and provides courtesy rides home to those who flunk it.

Ravosa's gesture may ultimately prove to be more than simply humanitarian. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court says an establishment can be liable for serving too much booze to a customer, and earlier this year it upheld a $50,000 verdict against a Milford tavern that served "six or more" white russians to a customer who was "obviously intoxicated." That customer later drove off the road killing nine-year-old John Cimino.●

RICE FARMERS NEED HELP NOW

HON. JACK BROOKS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 9, 1982

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, we are all well aware of the depressed state of the agricultural sector of our economy. I wish to call special attention to the plight of the rice farmer, which has reached emergency proportions.

Rice farms across the Nation, and especially those in my district located in southeast Texas, are facing problems which they have not been forced to contend with since the great depression. Overproduction in some States and high production costs, coupled with low market prices, diminishing collateral, and increased international competition, have forced rice farmers of several generations to abandon their profession. High interest rates and a stagnant economy have only served to exacerbate the already grim situation. Forty percent of rice farmers will not be able to plant next year, and 50 percent are behind on their loans.

The farm bill, approved by Congress last year, provided the Secretary of Agriculture with discretionary authority to implement base acreage reductions, in the event it should prove necessary. When it became clear that such reductions were to be implemented, I wrote to Secretary Block to urge that he select the most effective and equitable reduction. Unfortunately, the Secretary ignored my strong admonitions and chose to base the reduction on that planted in the previous year, instead of selecting the average acreage of the 1980 and 1981 crops. This decision penalized Texas rice farmers who had reduced their production and instead benefited those States primarily responsible for the current surplus of rice in the market. In the United States the 1981 acreage was some 492,000 acres—17 percent—greater than the 1980 acreage. However, 357,000 acres of that increase may be directly traced to Arkansas—20-percent increase—and Mississippi—40-percent increase—with Texas showing a reduction.

The implication of Secretary Block's actions extend not only to the Texas rice farmer but to the entire support infrastructure that has been built up over the years for handling and shipping the rice produced.

Given the seriousness of the situation, I am today writing to the Farm Credit Association to urge that it encourage the Production Credit Associations (PCA's) chiefly responsible for the financing of the rice farmer to adopt a more realistic approach. Rice farmers currently find their collateral to have diminished by more than 50 percent as a result of declining farm equipment sales, forcing many farmers to carry "uncovered loans." Local PCA's must actively consider the reinstitution of long-term capital expenditures over the realistic life of the equipment, 3 to 5 years, instead of annual depreciation schedules. The rice farmer desperately needs the opportunity to invest in long-term capital expenditures such as combines, tractors, land, and buildings.

I also call on the Congress to explore possible Federal grants, or long-term low interest loans to cover the accumulated carryover deficits from prior operations. We cannot ignore the rice farmer and those involved in agribusinesses such as agricultural chemicals, farm equipment, and agricultural air services.

In conclusion, I intend to again urge the Secretary of Agriculture to exercise his authority to prevent the collapse of rice farming in this country.●

SENATE—Friday, September 10, 1982

(Legislative day of Wednesday, September 8, 1982)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Lord God Almighty, God of Abraham, Isaac, Ishmael, and Israel, Sovereign Lord of history, all nations, and all peoples, release Thy power in the Senate—power that convicts of sin, of selfishness, of greed, of pride, of deceitfulness and dishonesty, of the lust for power, and the abuse of power.

Release Thy grace Lord—grace that forgives and cleanses from all sin, grace that regenerates and renews and recreates, grace that transforms sinners into righteous servants of the Living God.

Release Thy love, Lord—love that dissolves enmity and fear and division, love that warms and illumines and heals, love that unites and strengthens and turns adversaries into brothers and sisters.

Release Thy wisdom, Lord—wisdom that leads to truth and justice and righteousness.

Lord, God Almighty, save us and our Nation from corruption, decay, and disintegration. We pray in the name of the Saviour. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR THE TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the time for the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order and the execution of two special orders there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 11 a.m. in which Senators may speak for not more than 3 minutes each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, this morning, after the recognition of the two leaders, the special orders, and the transaction of routine morning business, it is anticipated that some time this morning we will admit a messenger from the House of Representatives carrying the President's veto message.

There is no agreement to limit debate on that measure, but it will be my hope that we could conclude debate and have a vote on that measure some time at or shortly after noon today. That, of course, must abide circumstances at the moment since there is no limitation on the time for debate.

But I urge Senators who wish to speak on that measure to do so early rather than late.

Mr. President, the Senate will not be in session tomorrow absent extraordinary circumstances that might develop today, and I do not anticipate that.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1982

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 12 noon on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CLOTURE VOTES NEXT WEEK

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I remind Senators that on Monday at 4 p.m. there will be a vote on cloture, as previously ordered and pursuant to a motion filed on yesterday. It is my intention to file another cloture motion today which will produce a vote on Tuesday, and I will negotiate with the distinguished minority leader and others on arranging a convenient time for Senators on that vote.

Mr. President, I believe there is nothing further I need say at this point. I am prepared to yield to the minority leader and to yield the control of my remaining time to him if he wishes.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader. I will accept the time that is unused.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1982—VOTE ON VETO OVERRIDE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, about what time does the majority leader anticipate the vote on the override of the Presidential veto? Is he in a position to say?

Mr. BAKER. I had thought yesterday that it would be at 12 noon. I still hope for that, but since we do not have a time limitation, and apparently will not get one, it could run a little over that, but I urge Senators who wish to speak on this to come to the Chamber and do so soon rather than late.

The way we have arranged the matter this morning, morning business will end at 11 a.m., and I anticipate the message will come in at 11 a.m.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I am prepared on this side to have no more than an hour on the debate with 5 minutes of our time going to Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR., of Virginia, if the other side will yield 5 minutes to him from their time.

Mr. BAKER. All right.

Mr. President, let me explore that on my side. At this particular moment I am not in a position to agree to that, but I will try.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Does the Senator from Virginia wish me to yield him my time now?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I think not.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, we have two Senators on special orders here now.

The order I believe now is for the recognition of the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) on special order. Is that correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from Georgia in the Chamber presently, and it is probably a little earlier than he or the Senator from Illinois had anticipated.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator from Illinois is ready.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois be prepared to proceed now with his special order?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

ORDER REVERSING SEQUENCE OF SPECIAL ORDERS TODAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the special orders be reversed in sequence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR DIXON

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DIXON. Thank you, Mr. President.

(Mr. ABDNOR assumed the chair.)

S. 2890—THE SEVERANCE TAX EQUITY ACT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I am today introducing the Severance Tax Equity Act—legislation that effectively prohibits the States from imposing excessively high severance taxes on coal, oil, or natural gas.

Over the past decade, the United States has seen the price of energy rise dramatically. Energy prices are an increasing burden on American business, and on the average working men and women of this country. High energy prices are especially burdensome during this time of severe economic recession. Increasing numbers of Americans have to worry whether they can afford the gas to commute to work, to look for jobs, or even to heat their homes this winter.

The recession has also had a significant impact on most State and local governments. They are caught in a squeeze between revenue sources that rise slowly, if at all, and ever-increasing needs. The result is an increasing inability to continue providing necessary governmental services.

In my own State of Illinois, for example, the recession has meant that the State's infrastructure continues to deteriorate. Illinois needs over $1 billion more annually than it is now able to raise just to maintain its investment in highways and transit systems. Education needs and social services are increasingly jeopardized.

The revenue sources of eight States, however, seem to be relatively unaffected by current economic conditions. In 1981, Alaska's tax revenue rose by 51.3 percent; New Mexico's by 30.3 percent; Oklahoma's by 24.2 percent; North Dakota's by 21.9 percent; New Jersey's by 21.6 percent; Wyoming's by 19.2 percent; Texas' by 17.9 percent; and Louisiana's by 17.5 percent. Except for New Jersey, which has rapidly growing tax revenues from Atlantic City casinos, these are all States with significant severance tax revenues.

In 1981, State severance tax revenues rose by an astonishing 53 percent.

Think of it. With a revenue resource that rose by 53 percent annually even as the economy was sliding into the depths of a recession, Congress would have no difficulty at all in balancing the budget. The severe budgetary problems that generated the support for a constitutional amendment to balance the budget would disappear.

Severance tax revenues, however, currently accrue solely to the States. Unfortunately, this resource is not available to all States. In fact, over 85 percent of severance tax revenues go to only 8 of the 50 States. For these lucky few, severance tax revenues are a major component of State finances. Fifty one percent of Alaska's revenue comes from severance taxes, while seven other States: Louisiana, Montana, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Texas, and Wyoming derive more than 20 percent of their revenues from this source.

There has been much discussion about whether or how much the burden of severance taxes is shifted to the citizens of States that buy, rather than produce, energy. Economists do not agree on the answer.

Now, I am not an economist, Mr. President. But it seems to me this question of the economic burden that might or might not be created by severance taxes is not exactly the most important one we ought to address.

The most important question before us it whether we are going to treat our natural energy resources as truly national resources, or whether we are going to let them be controlled—and make no mistake about it, the power to tax is the power to control—by States which, through an accident of geography, are the sites of our energy supplies.

I say those natural resources are national resources, and it is clear we are not now treating them that way—not when one State can raise 95 percent of its revenues by various energy taxes, and when nearly all of that energy is consumed in other States; not when citizens of many States pay large annual State income taxes, while those in some severance tax States pay none.

No, the time has come for a national approach to this most vital issue.

Illinois is a major coal producing State. It has no severance tax at the moment. However, evolving market conditions could soon make it very attractive for my State to impose a severance tax on coal.

And coal is not the only resource on which a severance tax can be imposed. Governors in the Great Lakes States have been seriously discussing imposing a severance tax on Great Lakes water that could, in the future, be piped to water-starved western and southwestern parts of our country. I have seen newspaper accounts indicating that the Midwest could be the future "OPEC of water."

I find that idea disturbing, Mr. President. The United States is much more than a collection of 50 States. It is a nation. It cannot and should not let control over what are truly national—not just natural—resources, be decided principally by the individual States.

I believe that States are entitled to tax economic activity within their borders. Our Constitution makes it clear that they have that right. I have no quarrel with the desire of States to impose limited severance taxes to compensate for the impact of energy production activities on the State. However, I do not believe States should be able to impose severance taxes that raise revenues far in excess of the amounts needed to recover those costs.

The bill I am introducing today, therefore, prohibits States from imposing severance taxes on coal, oil, or natural gas except to recover the public costs directly attributable to the energy extraction activities. This legislation does not prohibit States from taxing energy activities in other ways. States would continue to be free to impose income taxes, sales taxes, and other taxes that other businesses pay. Further, this legislation does not affect in any way the State's right to collect royalty income in appropriate situations. However, it will effectively prevent use of the severance tax mechanism to raise revenues for General Government and other unrelated activities.

The bill does not impose a numerical test; it does not attempt to dictate that severance taxes above a particular level are, per se, excessively high. It does establish a standard, a standard that is both flexible and reasonable. It permits States to impose severance taxes to raise amounts sufficient to recover the direct public costs attributable to the energy extraction activity. For example, States would be able to impose severance taxes to recover the costs of necessary highway upgrading or of new sewer lines needed to service the energy extraction facilities.

The amount necessary to recover associated public costs will vary from State to State and make a single national standard inappropriate. The test in the Severance Tax Equity Act will permit States to respond to their own unique circumstances, while insuring that energy activities are not singled out to bear a disproportionate share of the necessary costs of Government and that energy activities are taxed in a nondiscriminatory way.

The "related to public costs" test is not without problems. An inventive State could try to contend that many activities that most reasonable people would believe were unrelated to the energy activity were somehow distantly related and therefore should be covered by the severance tax. Years of litigation could result, as clever States tried to stretch the standard to its limits—and beyond.

Therefore, the bill establishes a presumption that State severance taxes above its own 1978 level, or the 1978 national average, whichever is higher, are not related to the energy activity. A State would have to bear the burden of demonstrating that revenues above the 1978 level, adjusted for inflation, were necessary to cover directly attributable costs; 1978 was chosen because it reflects the level of taxation States felt was necessary before decontrol of oil prices began in 1979.

In my own view, it is possible, and perhaps even likely, that even the 1978 levels could be too high. However, for taxes below the 1978 level, the Federal Government or the party paying the tax would have to prove that the tax was excessive.

I believe, Mr. President, that energy severance taxes in some States have risen to a level that constitutes a burden on interstate commerce. My bill will eliminate that burden, insuring State severance taxes are related to the public costs directly attributable to energy activities.

This legislation addresses the core of the severance tax issue, but does not attempt to address the numerous related issues. For example, it does not impose a Federal severance tax or create or increase any other Federal energy tax.

I believe a strong case can be made for a new Federal energy tax. However, resolution of that important issue can proceed separately from the State severance tax preemption issue. Further, a new Federal tax is likely to be extremely controversial, and could impede action on the State severance tax limitation question.

Mr. President, I realize this proposal is controversial and that there are many that will oppose it, even though it does not call for a new Federal tax. I think it is worth remembering, however, that one of the major reasons the Thirteen Colonies came together to form the United States after the Revolutionary War was to form a customs union, to insure the free and unfettered flow of trade between and among the States-to-be. I think that objective was a sound one, and that it remains sound today.

Unrestricted severance taxes by the States have the potential to undermine the free flow of trade among the States, and to incite regional strife. Uncapped, these taxes work contrary to the interests of the union. We do not have to look very far to see the unfortunate consequences caused by placing State or regional interests above the national interest.

I think it is imperative, therefore, to enact this legislation, and enact it quickly. Our energy resources are part of our national treasure, and their benefits should be shared by the entire Nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2890

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Severance Tax Equity Act of 1982".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds—

(1) the Federal decision to allow the price of domestic crude oil to rise to the world price has unintentionally contributed to fiscal disparities between States, as a few energy-producing States seek to gain the greatest possible economic advantage from their positions as net energy exporters, at the expense of the other States;

(2) severance tax revenues in some States greatly exceed the amount necessary to recover the public costs attributable to the economic activity being taxed; and

(3) excessively high severance taxes constitute a burden on interstate commerce.

(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to impose an effective and reasonable limit on state energy severance taxes on certain minerals.

SEC. 3. LIMITATION ON CERTAIN STATE SEVERANCE TAXES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of State or Federal law, the aggregate revenues from State severance taxes imposed by any State (and any political subdivision thereof) with respect to crude oil, natural gas, or coal transported outside such State in any State fiscal year shall not exceed the costs incurred by the State (and any political subdivision thereof) during such fiscal year which are directly attributable to the production within the State of crude oil, natural gas, or goal, as the case may be.

(b) ENFORCEMENT.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—

(A) ACTION BY ATTORNEY GENERAL.—The Attorney General may bring a civil action against any State (or any political subdivision thereof) which is in violation of subsection (a) in any appropriate district court of the United States.

(B) ACTION BY TAXPAYER.—Any person who has paid a State severance tax which is imposed by a State (or any political subdivision thereof) in violation of subsection (a) may bring a civil action against such State (or political subdivision) in any appropriate district court of the United States.

(2) RELIEF.—The district court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to grant such relief (including injunctive relief) as may be appropriate in any action brought under paragraph (1).

(3) BURDEN OF PROOF.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the burden of proof in any action brought under paragraph (1) shall be upon the petitioner to prove that the aggregate revenue from the State severance tax imposed by the defendant during the State fiscal year exceeds the costs incurred by the defendant during such fiscal year which are directly attributable to the production of crude oil, natural gas, or coal, as the case may be.

(B) RATES IN EXCESS OF 1978 LEVELS.—Upon introduction of evidence in any action brought under paragraph (1) that the rate of the severance tax imposed by the defendant during the State fiscal year exceeds the higher of—

(i) the adjusted 1978 State tax rate for such State for such fiscal year, or

(ii) the adjusted 1978 national average tax rate for such fiscal year, the burden of proof in such action shall be upon the defendant to prove that the aggregate revenue from such severance tax for such fiscal year does not exceed the costs incurred by the defendant during such fiscal year which are directly attributable to the production of crude oil, natural gas, or coal, as the case may be.

(c) ADJUSTED 1978 STATE TAX RATE; ADJUSTED 1978 NATIONAL AVERAGE TAX RATE.—For purposes of this section—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The terms "adjusted 1978 State tax rate" and "adjusted 1978 national average tax rate" mean the 1978 State tax rate, or the 1978 national average tax rate, as the case may be, plus an amount equal to—

(A) such tax rate, multiplied by

(B) the inflation adjustment for the State fiscal year involved.

The amount determined under the preceding sentence shall be rounded to the nearest cent.

(2) 1978 NATIONAL AVERAGE TAX RATES.—The term "1978 national average tax rate" means, with respect to crude oil, natural gas, or coal—

(A) the aggregate amount of revenue from State severance taxes imposed on such natural resource determined under paragraph (5) to have been collected by all States (and all political subdivisions thereof) during State fiscal years ending with, or within, calendar year 1978, divided by

(B) the aggregate quantity of such natural resource determined under paragraph (5) to have been produced from within all States during such fiscal years.

(3) 1978 STATE TAX RATES.—The term "1978 State tax rate" means, with respect to crude oil, natural gas, or coal produced from a State—

(A) the aggregate amount of revenue from State severance taxes imposed on such natural resource determined under paragraph (5) to have been collected by such State (and any political subdivision thereof) for the State fiscal year ending with, or within, calendar year 1978, divided by

(b) the quantity of such natural resource determined under paragraph (5) to have been produced from within such State during such fiscal year.

(4) INFLATION ADJUSTMENT.—The inflation adjustment for any fiscal year is the percentage by which—

(A) the first revision of the implicit price deflator for the gross national product for the third calendar quarter of the calendar year ending with, or within, the State fiscal year preceding such fiscal year, exceeds

(B) such deflator for the calendar quarter ending December 30, 1979.

(5) SECRETARY OF ENERGY DETERMINATIONS.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Not later than 12 months after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Energy shall determine (and publish in the Federal Register) with respect to crude oil, natural gas, and coal—

(i) the amount of State severance taxes collected by each State (and all political subdivisions thereof) during the State fiscal year ending with, or within, calendar year 1978 for each such natural resource, and

(ii) the quantity of each such natural resource produced from within such State during such fiscal year.

(B) CENSUS DATA.—The Secretary of Energy shall base the determinations under this subsection on data which the Director of the Bureau of the Census shall provide, unless the Secretary finds that more appropriate information is available from an agency hearing described in subparagraph (C).

(C) PROCEDURES FOR DETERMINATIONS.—The Secretary of Energy shall make the determinations under this paragraph on the record after an opportunity for an agency hearing under section 554 of title 5, United States Code.

(D) JUDICIAL REVIEW.—

(i) FILING OF PETITION.—At any time before the 60th day after the date on which any determination is published under subparagraph (A), any person may file a petition with the United States Court of Appeals for the circuit in which such person resides, or has his principal place of business, for judicial review of such determination. A copy of the petition shall be transmitted by the clerk of the court to the Secretary of Energy. The Secretary of Energy thereupon shall file in the court the written submissions to, and transcript of, the written or oral proceedings on which the determination was based as provided in section 2112 of title 28, United States Code.

(ii) JURISDICTION.—Upon the filing of the petition referred to in clause (i), the United States Court of Appeals shall have jurisdiction to review the determination in accordance with chapter 7 of title 5, United States Code, and to grant appropriate relief as provided in such chapter.

(iii) APPEALS.—The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals affirming or setting aside, in whole or in part, any such determination shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in section 1254 of title 28, United States Code.

(iv) LIMITATION.—Any determination of the Secretary of Energy under this paragraph shall be subject to judicial review only in accordance with the provisions of this subparagraph.

(6) UNITS OF MEASURE.—The 1978 State tax rate and the 1978 national average tax rate determined under this subsection shall be—

(A) per barrel, in the case of crude oil;

(B) per Mcf, in the case of natural gas; and

(C) per ton, in the case of coal.

(d) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

(1) STATE SEVERANCE TAXES.—The term "State severance tax" means any tax or fee established by any State (or any political subdivision of a State) and levied on, measured by, or otherwise imposed with respect to crude oil, natural gas, or coal produced in such State. Such term does not include any income, sales, property, or any other similar tax or fee if such tax or fee—

(A) applies with respect to a broad range of business activities or types of property, and

(B) does not result in a significantly higher rate of tax or fee than is generally applicable to the other activities or property with respect to which it is imposed.

(2) STATE.—The term "State" includes the District of Columbia.

(3) CRUDE OIL.—The term "crude oil" includes a natural gas liquid recovered from a natural gas well in lease separators or field facilities.

(4) NATURAL GAS.—The term "natural gas" means any product (other than crude oil) or natural gas well; except that such term shall not include any geothermal energy.

(5) COAL.—The term "coal" includes lignite.

(6) BARREL.—The term "barrel" means 42 United States gallons.

(7) MCF.—The term "Mcf" refers to 1,000 cubic feet of natural gas measured at a pressure of 14.73 pounds per square inch (absolute) and a temperature of 60 degrees Fahrenheit.

(8) TON.—The term "ton" means 2,000 pounds.

(e) EFFECTIVE DATES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, the limitation provided by subsection (a) shall take effect 1 year after the date of enactment of this Act.

(2) 2-year period for States in excess of limitation.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subparagraph (B), in the case of any State (or any political subdivision thereof) in which any State severance tax on crude oil natural gas, or coal would otherwise exceed the limit under subsection (a), such limit shall not be applicable with respect to such tax at any time during the 2-year period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(B) EXCEPTION IF TAX IS MODIFIED DURING 2-YEAR PERIOD.—Subparagraph (A) shall cease to apply to any State severance tax if the rate at which the tax is imposed on the date of enactment of this Act is revised by the State or political subdivision involved.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR NUNN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN).

Mr. NUNN. I thank the Chair.

THE CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1982, TITLE IV—HABEAS CORPUS REFORM

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, Senator CHILES and I continue to remind our colleagues of the critical need for reform in the area of habeas corpus proceedings. Judges as well as prosecutors have echoed our concerns, urging rapid and effective change in those laws now governing habeas corpus relief. By virtue of calculated habeas corpus abuse, career criminals secure for themselves years and years of freedom from punishment for their crimes. As a responsible Congress, we must act now to curtail this abuse. We must close those legal loopholes which have been routinely and needlessly available to criminals for far too many years.

Clearly the American concept of criminal justice is violated when a wrongdoer freely and openly admits his guilt to a series of violent crimes yet is allowed to remain unpunished via an endless stream of appeals and habeas corpus petitions. I point out the case of Albert Logan. In 1971, Logan was prosecuted on charges of aggravated assault, armed robbery, and three counts of rape. One of the rape victims was a 76-year-old woman. Upon conviction, he received a life sentence in Fulton Superior Court, Atlanta, Ga. Like hundreds of other criminals, Logan admitted his guilt to a spree of violent crimes. Nevertheless, like hundreds of other criminals, Logan persisted in overburdening the criminal justice system with numerous repetitive petitions for habeas corpus. And finally, like hundreds of other criminals, one of Logan's petitions for habeas corpus relief was eventually granted despite his many admissions of guilt. Logan's petition was granted some 7 years after his conviction, on the grounds that he had not been adequately assisted by counsel when he pled guilty to the charges.

Ironically, Logan's admissions and guilty plea, which he attacked via habeas corpus, were not the government's only evidence against him. His guilt was clearly established, even aside from his own admissions, by the evidence of his own fingerprints which the government secured in two of the rape cases. Moreover, according to the prosecutor, Logan had voluntarily and purposefully pled guilty from the start as a good will gesture, in order to avoid the death penalty. "He was begging to plead guilty to avoid the electric chair," said the prosecutor. Despite the strong independent evidence against him and numerous previous decisions affirming the conviction, Logan eventually obtained habeas corpus relief on the basis of an issue that did not and could not erase the substantial evidence of his guilt in a string of serious and violent crimes.

Few will disagree that crime is a problem which daily threatens the safety and security of the American people. Unfortunately, our criminal laws do not always reflect that consensus of opinion on the problem. We cannot and should not sit idly by while violent criminals like Logan are allowed to continually flaunt our system of criminal justice by the use of legal technicalities. This Congress needs to act promptly and decisively on strong anticrime legislation.

S. 2543, the Crime Control Act of 1982, which has now been awaiting action on the Senate Calendar since May 25, 1982, is one such piece of legislation. In introducing that bill, Senator CHILES and I specifically dealt with the problem of habeas corpus abuse by criminals like Logan. By including a 3-year statute of limitations for habeas relief and assigning greater weight to previous State court determinations of fact, the bill provides a strong first step to restoring some meaningful sense of finality and certainly to our criminal justice system. It presents a needed, well-reasoned, and responsible vehicle for habeas corpus reform. Again, I urge the Senate to act now to consider and pass the anticrime proposals set forth in S. 2543.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business that will not extend past 11 a.m., during which Senators may speak for 3 minutes each.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I seek recognition in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are still in morning business. Each Member has 3 minutes.

Mr. HART. I thank the Chair.

THE PROBLEMS WITH THE DENSE PACK PLAN

Mr. HART. Mr. President, the Reagan administration seems poised to commit this country to an expensive, elaborate, destabilizing and probably unworkable basing scheme for the troubled MX missile—the so-called dense pack plan—that would almost certainly fail to achieve its stated purpose: To provide the United States with a modernized ICBM force able to survive a surprise Soviet missile attack and to respond to such an attack in a timely, proportionate and disciplined manner.

Dense pack, or the closely spaced basing plan as the Air Force prefers to call it, would require an initial deployment of 100 MX missiles, based perhaps 2,000 feet apart, arrayed in rows along an east-west axis. The missile deployments would create a 10- to 12-square mile trapezoid with the smaller of the two planes along the trapezoid's southern periphery. According to administration spokesmen, the detonation of the first few Soviet warheads targeted against the southern-most MX missiles would disable all succeeding warheads through the effects of fratricide—or the heat, blast, and radiation triggered by the first explosions. Before the next wave of Soviet warheads could arrive and explode on target, it is alleged, the surviving MX missiles could be launched against the Soviet Union in retaliation. As the Soviet Union began to develop the capacity to lay down a precisely timed attack and thereby overcome the effects of fratricide, the United States could deploy a ballistic missile defense system adjacent to the MX deployments or build additional decoy silos to complicate Soviet targeting plans, thus further enhancing the survivability of the new ICBM force.

As with so many once-considered but now-discarded plans for MX basing, however, this latest scheme offers no long-term solution to the problem of ICBM vulnerability and suffers from a number of critical shortcomings, both technical and political.

The fratricide effect, which the advocates of dense pack claim would protect the MX from attack, could also be used to insure the destruction of the missiles. For example, the Soviets could set off a series of low-yield warheads at an altitude of 120 miles every 60 seconds for as long as several hours. Any U.S. missile attempting to pass through the distrubed atmosphere above the silos would be destroyed. This initial high altitude attack would, therefore, have the capacity either to disable MX or to prevent our missiles from being launched in the first place. Under this protective shield, the Soviets could detonate, in careful sequence, a number of accurate and very high-yield warheads within several hundred feet of the silos, enabling the phased destruction of all 100 MX missiles within a relatively short period of time.

Even if the technical requirements for launching such an attack now exceed current Soviet capabilities, such may not be the case by the early 1990's. Air Force spokesmen admit that the life expectancy for dense pack could be as short as 5 to 7 years, without the development of a ballistic missile defense system to protect MX or the construction of additional silos, either to deceive the attacker or to complicate this attack plans. With cost extimates for dense pack ranging as high as $25 billion, the administration would be asking the people of this country to pay for what amounts to a short-term or temporary basing scheme for the MX at an annual cost of almost $5 billion.

Should the administration succeed in obtaining congressional authorization for dense pack, pressures will inevitably increase to enhance the long-term survivability of the system through the deployment of a ballistic missile defense network, requiring either the renegotiation or the abrogation of the 1972 ABM Treaty. Should the Soviets construct their own BMD system in response, the way would be opened for a new and extremely destabilizing round in the superpower arms race. The ABM Treaty—perhaps the most important United States-Soviet arms control agreement ever concluded—should not be sacrificed to make room for an MX basing plan of questionable utility. In addition, a Soviet BMD deployment, even if limited in scope, would effectively neutralize the modest strategic offensive forces of the three other nuclear weapons states, all of which are either allied to the United States or supportive of this country's defense policies.

Finally, construction of the 100 new silos for defense pack would probably constitute a violation of both the SALT I and SALT II accords, which explicitly prohibit the building of any additional fixed ICBM launchers, or silos. Administration efforts to portray the encapsulated MX missiles as mobile systems in order to circumvent this prohibition are unlikely to be sanctioned by the Soviets without compensatory U.S. concessions, which may not be in this country's best interests especially if the Soviets chose to mimic U.S. actions. The problem would only be compounded by any U.S. effort to build more than 100 silos, either for more missiles or for purposes of deception.

Since 1976, more than 30 proposals for basing the MX have been thoroughly examined by two administrations. All have been discarded for a variety of technical, political and environmental reasons. No plan has yet been devised which, if implemented, would insure the long-term survivability of the U.S. ICBM force. Despite the claims of its supporters, dense pack looks no more promising. Rather than commit this country to an ill-considered and, by most accounts, unworkable plan for basing the MX on land, this administration should have the political courage to admit that no quick, simple and affordable solution to the problem of ICBM vulnerability currently exists nor is one likely to appear.

This administration must begin active consideration of other ways to guarantee the effectiveness of U.S. strategic forces. One way to advance this objective would be to reduce the importance of land-based missiles in our strategic nuclear posture by shifting a greater proportion of the U.S. nuclear deterrent to our most survivable nuclear weapons platforms, including ballistic missile submarines and standoff bombers equipped with cruise missiles. We may well discover that land-based nuclear systems have outlived their utility and are no longer necessary to safeguard deterrence. A second and equally important way to preserve the deterrent relationship and to reduce the likelihood of nuclear war is to redouble our efforts to negotiate an equitable, comprehensive and verifiable nuclear arms control agreement with the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, I yield the floor. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COHEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee is on his way to the Chamber from the airport. As I indicated on yesterday, I am loath to begin consideration of the veto message until he is here on the floor.

I understand that perhaps two Senators have matters with which they would like to deal as in morning business. I ask unanimous consent that the time for the transaction of routine morning business be extended until not past 11:15 a.m., under the same terms and conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to vote to override the President's veto of the conference report on the supplemental appropriations bill.

This bill contains funding that is vital to programs dealing with education and with employment programs for older Americans. I urge my colleagues to support these programs today, just as they did 3 weeks ago. The need for this funding is just as urgent today as it was then.

Allow me to list the education program funding contained in this supplemental appropriations bill:

Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, that portion of the law that attempts to provide additional aid for the economically disadvantaged children of this Nation—$148 million.

Impact aid—$200,000.

Education for the handicapped—$26.5 million.

Vocational education—$2.5 million.

Pell grants for higher education—$140 million.

Supplemental educational opportunity grants—$77 million.

Title III—$4.8 million.

All of these programs have come under the close scrutiny of members of the Subcommittee on Education, on which I serve as chairman, over the last 18 months. Each of these programs has been determined to be a worthy investment in our Nation's future.

The additional funds contained in the supplemental appropriations bill increases the funding to a level that is more realistic than the levels contained in the continuing resolution for fiscal year 1982, but still below the levels of fiscal year 1981.

In my own State of Vermont, this bill provides additional funds for needy college students; $850,000 in additional SEOG funding for an additional 1,400 students, and $600,000 in additional money for Pell grants for an additional 600 students.

The supplemental appropriations bill also contains an additional $210 million for title V of the Older Americans Act, the senior community services program, which provides job opportunities for older citizens. In my own State of Vermont, the additional funds will provide continuing jobs for 311 older Vermonters. If the veto is sustained, these 311 Vermonters—and thousands of senior citizens across the Nation—will lose their current jobs.

This bill does not bust the budget.

This bill places spending priorities where this Senate thought they should be placed just 3 weeks ago.

This bill is as urgently needed today as it was 3 weeks ago.

I urge my colleagues to override the veto to assure continued necessary funding for these, and other, important programs.

CONDITIONS IN EAST TIMOR REMIND OF NEED FOR PASSAGE OF GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, Mr. DURENBURGER, my good friend and colleague from Minnesota, sent me an article which describes the numerous violations of human rights which have taken place in East Timor since Indonesia annexed the region in 1976. The article was written by the journalist Rod Nordland and published in the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Mr. President, a clear understanding of life in the area has been difficult to obtain, and therefore, this article is especially important because the journalist had the unusual opportunity to visit 8 of 13 districts in East Timor. In that tortured province, he personally witnessed the suffering of many Timorese.

Following Indonesia's takeover in 1976, Timorese opposition to Indonesian rule did not cease. The author reports that Indonesian anti-insurgency policies have resulted in widespread hunger and the loss of civilian lives. Indonesian policies also have disrupted food supplies and uprooted families from their homes. No person may leave his village or the country without official permission. At the time the article was written, the Indonesian Government openly acknowledged its intent to detain thousands of Timorese related to resistance fighters until total and complete surrender by the guerrillas.

According to the journalist, day-to-day survival is difficult for the Timorese. Due to shortages, staple foods, when available, cost twice as much in East Timor as in other parts of Indonesia. The sale of coffee is an important source of income for the Timorese, yet, Indonesian officials impoverish the native people by requiring them to sell their product at very low prices to one company only. They are not even permitted to trade their coffee for other goods in the marketplace.

The Catholic authorities in East Timor estimate that the population now numbers 425,000. According to census figures in 1974, the year Portugal withdrew from East Timor, the population was 650,000. Hunger is prevalent and the sight of a malnourished child is not unusual, however, Indonesia has turned away offers of relief. The journalist quotes one Timorese as saying, "In the heart of the people there will always be resistance. That's why I think the Indonesians are happy to see famine. The Timorese people will always be a problem so, they figure, just eliminate the problem."

According to this account, the Timorese are suffering numerous violations of the civil and human rights. Their terrible plight serves to remind us that the basis and precious right to exist belongs to all racial, religious, and ethnic groups. We know from history that the potential for genocide occurs when fundamental human rights are ignored. Sadly, the potential for genocide still exists in the world today.

Mr. President, since 1967 I have urged the Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention. Today, once again, I should like to press upon my colleagues the need for the United States to join with other nations in officially condemning genocide. Only by ratifying the treaty can the United States feel totally secure in its position as a leader in the area of international human rights.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Nordland's article from the Philadelphia Inquirer be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, May 28, 1982]

UNDER INDONESIA, TIMOR REMAINS A LAND OF MISERY

(By Rod Nordland)

DILI, EAST TIMOR—East Timor, the former Portuguese colony that was forcibly annexed by Indonesia in 1976, is a land beset by widespread malnutrition and hunger. This year's grain harvest was a dismal failure; now, even as many Timorese suffer through longstanding food shortages, they face a new wave of famine, the second in five years.

Adding to the misery of East Timor, the incidence of disease is essentially unchallenged by the province's inadequate medical care; a six-year guerrilla war continues to disrupt the populace, and anti-insurgency measures imposed by a military government have stripped Timorese of their civil rights.

Thousands of people are political prisoners—most of them simply because they are related, often distantly, to a fighter with the guerrilla group known as Fretilin—the Revolutionary Front for Independent East Timor. Hundreds of thousands have been relocated in a policy to depopulate the countryside and deprive the guerrillas of civilian support.

These are some of the conclusions reached during an 11-day tour of the province of East Timor, the first visit by an American journalist in two years and one of the few allowed to an independent outside observer in the six years of Indonesian rule. They are conclusions that are supported by a member of clergymen, civilian officials and aid organizations.

Nevertheless, Indonesian officials hotly contest them all. According to these officials, there was no poor harvest this year, only isolated food shortages; there is no famine, only isolated cases of malnutrition; there are no political prisoners, just a rehabilitation center where the relatives of guerrillas are kept for their own good, the countryside has not been depopulated, it has been "resettled."

"We have nothing to hide in East Timor," Adm. Sudomo of Indonesia's Command for the Restoration of Peace and Order said recently when he issued the invitation to visit the province, which has been a source of international concern since the mid-1970's.

Year after year, the United Nations has condemned as illegal Indonesia's forcible takeover of East Timor and has demanded that it withdraw its troops and allow for self-determination. Portugal itself has refused to acknowledge the annexation, insisting that Fretilin is the appropriate governing power of a free East Timor.

The recent visit included tours by helicopter and jeep of 15 towns and villages in eight of the province's 13 districts. Despite almost perpetual close monitoring by Indonesian military and civilian officials, it was still possible to see obvious signs of large-scale malnutrition and disease, as well as overt oppression.

It also was sometimes possible to meet independently with Timorese in and out of government, with clergy of the Roman Catholic Church in the mostly Catholic province and with average Timorese from many walks of life.

While many of the scores of Timorese interviewed were frankly fearful about talking, dozens did so nonetheless, saying, as one did, "Please tell the world so they can help the Timorese people." At least six of those interviewed, it was learned, were summoned afterward to military intelligence headquarters and interrogated about what they had said, often for many hours.

The picture that emerged was one of a population that widely regards the Indonesians as a foreign occupying force. Even many leaders who once favored annexation by Indonesia have become disenchanted—in some cases openly—with Indonesian rule, or at least with the military officials that represent it here.

The behavior of those military authorities "can only be described as being the behavior of conquerors toward a conquered people," said a petition signed by a pro-Indonesian member of the provincial assembly, Joao Pedro Soares, and sent last year to the central government in Jakarta, Indonesia's capital, appealing for relief. A short time later, Soares and three other East Timorese members of parliament whose names appeared on the petition disappeared, reemerging after a month to swear that it was a fake.

The Indonesian rule has been characterized by fear and marred by accusations of torture and widespread abuse of civilians by soldiers. There are virtually no civil liberties. Peasants are told to whom they must sell their coffee and at what price. No one may leave his village or hometown without permission. Telephone calls and telegrams to places outside East Timor are forbidden. No one may leave the province without special—and rarely granted—permission. That applies as well to the more than 4,000 citizens of other countries who live in the province. According to military police statistics, there are 916 Portuguese nationals and 3,158 Taiwanese nationals on East Timor; many of them have requested and been refused permission to return to their own countries.

The Timorese have already suffered a great deal since the 1974 revolution in Portugal brought to power leftists who initiated a precipitous decolonization of Portuguese holdings around the world. One of those holdings was the eastern half of the island of Timor. (West Timor had been a Dutch colony until joining Indonesia when that country won independence from the Dutch on Dec. 27, 1949.)

In East Timor, the initial struggle for power after decolonization ended when the leftist, pro-independence Fretilin wrested control from two other parties, UDT, or Unity, which wanted to remain a colony of Portugal, and Apodite, a small minority party that favored integration with Indonesia.

Fretilin declared the short-lived Democratic Republic of East Timor on Nov. 28, 1975. A week later, Indonesian paratroopers and marines invaded Dili, and with a few months they had taken over most of East Timor. In July 1976, it was proclaimed Indonesia's 27th province.

But serious fighting with the Fretilin guerrillas did not end, and the years-long disruption interfered with planting. The ultimate result was a major famine that devastated the province between 1978 and 1980, with a great loss of life.

Word of conditions in East Timor leaked out and, although Indonesia initially denied reports of the famine, in 1980 and 1981 the International Committee of the Red Cross and the Catholic Relief Services of the United States were allowed to begin a relief program in the province. It was terminated last year by the Indonesian government which said it was no longer necessary.

How many people died in the fighting and famine before the relief program began may never be known for sure, but based on Indonesia's census figures, there were only 550,000 persons in East Timor in 1980; in 1974, the Portuguese authorities had counted 650,000.

The conclusion that may be drawn from these figures is not as obvious as it appears, because the Portuguese census was a voluntary one. People were asked to go to their local administrative centers to be counted, but many lived far in the mountains and did not make the trip. Under the Indonesian regime, on the other hand, people have been concentrated in towns and resettlement centers, and the 1980 census was a thorough, door-to-door affair.

Nevertheless, Catholic authorities doubt the Indonesian results, and the church's own census puts the current population at 425,000, a loss of 225,000 people from the Portuguese figure.

While still recovering from the terrible famine of the late 1970s, Timorese agriculture was dealt another blow last year, when, just as the planting season was beginning and only a few months after the government had ordered the relief program ended, the Indonesian army launched Operation Security.

Every male in the province age 13 or older was ordered into the mountains to help the army to conduct a giant sweep designed to finish the Fretilin once and for all. The civilians, mostly armed with sticks and farm implements, formed human chains and encircled the rugged mountain fastnesses where the guerrillas were believed to be hiding. Army troops moved ahead of them, theoretically to beat their quarry into this human net.

Many of those caught in the net, however, were civilians who themselves had resisted government attempts to make them leave their homes in the mountains—the traditional dwelling place for Timorese—and move to resettlement centers.

According to the top church authority here, apostolic administrator Msgr. Martinho da Costa Lopes, who is widely known as "the bishop," at least 1,000 civilians perished in the operation, which lasted from two to four months between June and September 1981. In one action alone, he said, 500 civilians were killed at Laclut in Viqueque District.

"Many Timorese were killed including . . . innocent children, pregnant women and defenseless people without any crimes except their willingness to be independent from all oppression," Msgr. da Costa Lopes said in a recent interview here.

The Indonesian government says, officially, that Operation Security was a success and that it reduced the ranks of Fretilin to 300 men, sharing 120 weapons. Privately, however, several officials say there are still as many as 1,200 armed guerrillas at large.

The greatest casualty of Operation Security, in fact, was the 1981-82 corn and rice crop, much of which was not planted before the rainy season began in September because the men of East Timor were with the army in the mountains.

That crop was to have been harvested in March, but it was a disaster, according to Msgr. da Costa Lopes, clergy elsewhere in the province and other independent sources. The international Committee of the Red Cross, which still has one representative on East Timor, stated in a report in March that, according to official figures, the anticipated crop of 40,000 to 60,000 tons of maize and 30,000 to 40,000 tons of rice would not be harvested in 1982 because of bad weather, attacks by rodents and "movement of populations in the second half of 1981 which made planting in some areas, specially in the south insufficient."

According to clergy here, the result has been a famine of near-famine in many parts of the province, particularly in Baucau and Viqueque districts in the east where the continuing fighting between government troops and Fretilin guerrillas has been most severe.

Msgr. da Costa Lopes hestiates to use the term "famine"; he prefers to say that more than half of the population in those districts, where more than 100,000 people live, has "insufficient food to maintain life." In addition, he said, hunger and malnutrition are endemic throughout the country.

"In Viqueque, they begin to eat the sagu [boiled palm pulp], and this is a sign for Timorese that famine is coming," he said.

Other clergymen stated the case more strongly. "If you quote me as saying this, I'll be killed," said one, who was recently in the eastern part of the province. "Famine is always a relative term, and there is hunger and malutrition all over the country, but it's truly a famine in this region" of Baucau and Viqueque.

One of the worst-hit towns in Viqueque, according to Msgr. da costa Lopes, is Uatolari, a mountainside town close to the scene of the heaviest fighting. Not so, said East Timor's vice governor, Franciso Xavier Lopes da Cruz.

"The bishop, you know, he just stays here in Dili, he does't go very often to the mountains," Lopes da Cruz said. "Uatolari, they have a surplus, plenty of corn. The military commander told me he bought 26 million rupiahs [about $41,000] of corn, so how could they be starving in Uatolari?

"The truth is," he added, "no famine here in East Timor—you can see one or two people who don't have enough food, but not a famine."

A prominent Timorese viewed the issue of famine politically. Like many, he was clearly sympathetic to the guerrilla movement: "The Fretilin is a symbol of resistance" to Indonesia, he said. "In the heart of the people there will always be resistance. That's why I think the Indonesians are happy to see famine. The Timorese people will always be a problem so, they figure, just eliminate the problem."

When a party of officials and a reporter descended on Uatolari by helicopter, the grassy public square immediately was crowded with scores of children, standing just at the edge of the rotor wash. Many of them appeared to be severely malnourished, with the classic distended bellies and stick-like limbs that denote long-term, serious hunger.

Or so the reporter thought. Hans Meier-Eybers, the project director for a Catholic Relief Services agricultural recovery program in East Timor, a $5 million, U.S. government-funded program, thought otherwise. Meier-Eybers, a Swiss, surveyed the children critically and said. "They look like healthy kids to me. Sure, they're a little dirty, but that is all."

An Indonesian doctor, S. C. Kurniati, approached and was asked if he thought the children appeared to be malnourished. "You can see for yourself," he said, seeming a bit taken aback by the question: "These children are all malnourished."

In another mountainside town in Viqueque District, Uato Carabao, which was also visited by helicopter, the picture of apparent starvation was the same. Tucked onto a narrow, cloud-covered shelf on the mountain's edge, Uato Carabao also is close to the fighting and, as a result, the town's residents are forbidden to go up the mountain slopes to tend their fields. As the helicopter touched down briefly, people emerged wraithlike from the mist and stared without smiling while the helicopter picked up visiting medical personnel and swooped off again.

Although visits were permitted to the districts of Los Palos and Baucau, reportedly the past and present sites of the heaviest fighting with Fretilin, they were confined to the district capitals. No visits at all were permitted to places like Lufa in Los Palos, and Batumacella, Beguia, Quelicai and Laga in Baucau—where clergymen say widespread starvation exists.

In Baucau, district administrative staff member Sinago, an Indonesian, introduced Sister Osario Saurez, a Timorese nun who is principal of the Catholic primary school there.

She listened as Sinago described what a success Operation Security had been. "Every time we go to a village now," he said, "they are happy to see us."

"Because of the political situation," Sister Saurez said quietly, "because the people had to help the military for the Operation Security, they were not able to plant the fields."

"There is plenty of food here," Sinago said insistently, and a little nervously.

The nun continued to contradict him with a soft-spoken resolve that clearly astonished some of the officials present. "We are very short of food, namely in Baguia, Quelicai and Laga. But even here the food is not sufficient, the health care is not sufficient. Last year it is better, this year it is worse because of Operation Security."

The problem has been complicated, she explained, because much of the population has been resettled in the lowlands, far from the mountainside fields. In Baucau District, for instance, 61,000 of the 74,000 people in the district now live clustered around the town of Baucau proper.

"They can grow enough food there," said Sinago.

"More than 50 percent of the people are short of food," Sister Saurez said.

Evidence of serious food shortages can be found all over the country, not just in the hard-hit areas in the eastern districts. On a trip to Aileu, a mountain district just 30 miles south of the capital of Dili by rough jeep road, malnourished people were a frequent sight along the way.

At a resettlement village called Saburia, just outside the district seat of Aileu, the party, which included half a dozen military and civilian officials as well as a journalist, stopped to see the corrugated tin houses the Indonesian government had built for people resettled there from the mountains.

Saburia lies in a deep mountain valley. The village chief is a Timorese, but his "assistant" is an Indonesian; they and a military intelligence major named Marsidik accompanied the journalist as he interviewed residents.

Bernardo, 56, who lives with his wife and 10-year-old son, sat on the bare dirt floor of his house, which was devoid of possessions of any kind; there was also no sign of food in the house. Asked how the harvest had been, he surveyed the circle of officials and, after a long pause, said, "There is not enough to eat."

The next house was identical, except that nine persons lived in it and that it contained a piece of furniture, a table. Under the table—the coolest place at midday in the tin house—lay a boy sweating and shaking in what his family said was a three-day-old malarial fever. Other children in the household had bloated bellies and emaciated limbs. Thomas Ferreria, the family spokesman, was asked through an interpreter about his family's condition.

"Tell him," Maj. Marsidik warned Ferreria in Indonesian, "that it's OK here."

Ferreria did as he was told.

"So even though the crops are bad, you have enough food for the whole family?" he was asked, in English.

"Tell him you have enough until the next rainy season," said Marsidik in Indonesian.

"We have enough until the next rainy season," Ferreria said.

At the Betora parish church, on the outskirts of Dili, Sister Josephine Bordallo, a Spanish Carmelite nun who has worked here since 1979, single-handedly runs a clinic in which she sees 160 seriously ill people a day, including "many, many cases of malnutrition," she said. Most of the patients come to her clinic because the government-run facilities often have no medicine and no medical personnel.

"Tuberculosis is the most common disease, but hunger is the biggest problem," she said. "They come here and I give them medicine for TB, but then they go home and they have no food in their houses, so how can they get better?"

In the Lahane neighborhood of Dili, where hundreds of families have been forced to live in temporary huts along the steep banks of a mountain stream, severe malnutrition is widespread and apparent. Most of Lahane's residents were moved to Dili from their farms in the surrounding mountains in Dili they have no job skills and little work.

Of 22 Lahane children under the age of 12, whose body weights and measurements were taken on May 9, 18 were proved to be chronically malnourished, according to standards adopted by the World Health Organization.

"If the situation is this bad in Dili," said Msgr. da Costa Lopes, "you can imagine what it's like in Baucau or Los Palos. I've been there—to Laga, Baguia, Los Palos last October. Even at that time there was hunger, and now it is far worse."

East Timor's de facto ruler is an army colonel named A. P. Kalangie. A non-Timorese who holds enormous power despite his modest title as East Timor provincial secretary, he noted in a recent interview that Indonesia had refused an Australian donation of 1,000 tons of corn because Australia had continued to criticize conditions in East Timor, which is only 350 miles off its north coast.

In place of the Australian grain, Col. Kalangie said the Indonesian government is itself sending 1,000 tons of grain to East Timor. "But we won't just give it away," he added. "If you give people something for nothing, they get lazy."

"Yes," agreed Catholic Relief Service's Meier-Eybers, "and soon you have an island of beggars."

"That's what they are always telling me," said a priest in Dili. "We have to stop bringing in food so the people will make it for themselves," but these people are working hard and still they are hungry.

"What I cannot understand is the reluctance of the Indonesian government to allow one independent team to visit East Timor to see the real situation and assess its normality for themselves," said Michael Whiteley of Australian Catholic Relief, which in the past has been active in raising aid money for the Timorese.

"East Timor has enough foreigners who are refereeing us," Col. Kalangie said testily. There are two. Meier-Eybers is one of them, and agreed heartily with Kalangie. The representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross, Cedric Neukomm, is the second. He declined to be interviewed.

"The Red Cross doesn't want to say the truth," said Msgr. da Costa Lopes, "because they are afraid the Indonesian government will throw them out, and they want to stay to provide some help."

"When we were kids," said a man from a Portuguese-Timorese family, "our mothers used to say to us, 'Don't eat so fast, the Indonesians aren't coming.'" It was something the East Timorese long feared.

In December 1975, when the Indonesians finally did come, Col. Kalangie was one of the commanders of the invasion.

He recently contrasted Indonesia's takeover with the current dispute over the Falkland Islands: "The British generals are bad. You don't give a little bit, a little bit, you go all at once. Like what we did here, is all at once—bok!—and then explain to the rest of the world that we are here. That is how to do it, like the Russians in Afghanistan."

Now he is enthusiastic about the government's far-reaching resettlement policy. Since "integration," 150 new resettlement centers have been built and 50 more are planned by the end of this year, he said. To make it easier to control the population and to provide food and medical aid, education and other amenities, people have been moved from the mountains to these resettlement villages, usually in the lowlands, he explained.

"It is the new Indonesian civilization we are bringing," Kalangie said. "And it is not easy to civilize the backward peoples."

While the resettlement scheme may be effective in denying support to the guerrillas, critics say it has serious flaws. There was a good historical reason for the Timorese aversion to the lowlands: Malaria there is virtually epidemic, water supplies are poor and irregular, and the climate is far hotter than that of the highlands.

Still, under Indonesian rule the province's road system is being vastly improved; color television—as Kalangie is fond of pointing out—was introduced here even before it came to Portugal; there are new public works in virtually every large town, public buses now travel the highways and dozens of government schools have been opened.

"In many things, the Indonesians have done very well, far better than the Portuguese," a Timorese who is generally pro-Indonesian said in an interview. "Only in social justice and health have they fallen down." Later he was seized by military intelligence and interrogated for hours about the interview, according to well-informed sources.

"A referendum now would go in favor of Indonesia," said Lucio Engenio da Encarnacao, 55, manager of the Dili Hotel and a Portuguese citizen who has been trying unsuccessfully to get Indonesian government permission to leave "I have to admit that in transportation, education, many areas, the Indonesians did in five years what Portugal didn't do in hundreds of years.

"As for freedom," he concluded, "We never had it under Portugal so we don't miss it now."

"Sure, in Portuguese times, many things were bad," said a former colonial government employee. "But it's not a comparison between Indonesia and Portgual, but between Indonesia and the indpendence we could have had."

"This whole island is just a big prison," said a part-Timorese man who holds Portuguese citizenship and said he wanted to join his family in Australia. According to reliable sources, he is one of 700 Portuguese who have been registered with the Red Cross as would-be emigres. "We are being held hostage here until Portugal recognizes Indonesia's takeover of East Timor." he said.

The people on Atauro Island are hostages of a different sort. Thousands of Timorese are being held on the island, 15 miles north of Dili, and Indonesian authorities have announced their intention of keeping the internees there until every last known Fretilin guerrilla surrenders. Authorities freely acknowledge that the only reason they are being held there is that they are related to known or suspected guerrillas.

Between June and September last year, 3,785 such people—entire families, including young children—were moved to Atauro and left there with no food supplies, according to church sources. Quiet pressure by the International Committee of the Red Cross persuaded the Indonesians to allow the Red Cross to begin an emergency feeding and medical-care program in February.

But by then, according to Indonesian government figures, 176 internees had died in an outbreak of contagious disease. Some think it was cholera; others say it was gastroenteritis. Both are conditions that could have been aggravated by the crowded conditions in what the government calls the "rehabilitation camp."

It consists of 55 plywood and corrugated-tin barracks, each measuring 20 by 60 feet and housing an average of 65 people. For privacy, the inhabitants hang plastic sheets as room dividers.

"It is for their own good, and they like to be here," Col. Kalangie contended during a guided tour of the camp. He said many of the internees had been harassed by guerrilla relatives, or forced to provide them with food, and he asked, "Does this look like a concentration camp to you?"

In Barracks B-2, many of the more than 50 inhabitants were there because they were related to a single Fretilin member, Onrato da Costa; some were only cousins or distant in-laws. Da Costa's sister, Amelia da Costa Fernandes, was asked through an official interpreter how she felt about being imprisoned.

The interpreter repeated the question and Miss da Costa Fernandes, with bowed head and frightened expression, mumbled one or two words.

"She said they are grateful to the government who take care of them so they don't feel they are prisoners, but like others they can live as they want," the interpreter translated.

He was asked to inquire how long she thought her brother would stay in the mountains.

"God knows," she replied, her head still bowed.

Kalangie acknowledged that at least some residents of the camp were not pleased to be there. "You know, east or west, home is best," he said. "But maybe some of those who are in the mountains will feel their family is unhappy so they will come down. It is a positive system."

And if they don't come down, he said, the prisoners of Atauro Island will stay where they are.

The most serious civil-liberties challenge raised in East Timor came last year in the petition of the four assemblymen, who stressed the lack of legal recourse under military authorities.

"Although five years of integration have passed although security has been restored by stages and in a variety of ways although the masses of people have constantly made endless sacrifices," it said, "it is not yet possible to experience the implementation of law and discipline in this young province of East Timor."

The petition cited numerous instances of murder, torture and sexual assault by soldiers and officials against civilians. "These people or groups commit murders without due process or the laws concerning investigation. Feelings of fear are widespread among the people . . . ."

All four of the men who signed the petition now repudiate it as a forgery and say they had nothing to do with it. Msgr. da Costa Lopes said he felt sorry for the men, who he maintained were forced to recant after having been held in solitary confinement on the island of Bali for a month.

The author of the petition is believed to have been Joao Pedro Soares. According to Mulya Lubis, Jakaria, director of the Legal Aid Society, Soares visited the society's offices to seek protection after the petition was filed.

Soares, during a tense interview at his home here, first denied ever having visited Lubis. Then, when a reporter mentioned having seen a photograph Lubis had taken of him during the visit, Soares said, "I might have been in their offices, but I didn't take part in this."

One of the central charges in the petition was confirmed by Manuel Carascalao, a prominent coffee planter. Timor produces some of the world's best coffee, much of it grown on small, individually owned plots that provide a source of cash income for peasant families who otherwise make a subsistence living growing corn, rice or cassava.

After integration with Indonesia, Carascalao said, the military authorities granted a coffee monopoly to a Java-based company, P.T. Denok Hernandez International, and all growers, small and large, were ordered to sell their coffee to Denok, which became the only authorized exporter.

The Denok firm is widely believed to be owned by Maj. Gen. Leonardus "Benny" Murdani, Indonesia's chief of military intelligence and the man in ultimate command of East Timor.

The prices Denok set for the purchase of coffee were absurdly low; currently they are about 25 cents a pound for arabica coffee and 18 cents for robusta, less than half what buyers pay growers in Java and in other places in Indonesia.

Meanwhile, because of food shortages, the price of rice and other staple foods here is twice what it is elsewhere in Indonesia. The result is that a peasant grower cannot purchase a 50-cent pound of rice with the proceeds from a pound of his coffee.

"During the coffee harvest" in June and July, a knowledgeable Timorese said, "there are searches at all the military checkpoints—but they're not looking for guns. They're looking for coffee."

The soldiers make sure the coffee is sold to Denok, and growers are even prohibited from trading or bartering their coffee for basic necessities in local markets.

One evening, a young Timorese man fell quickly into step beside a reporter on Dili's Rua Antonio de Carvalho. "We are not allowed to speak to foreigners," he said. "But I just want to tell you. Before, we had Portuguese colonialism. Now, we have Indonesian colonialism."

When Indonesians began consolidating control in the province, they told everyone that the East Timorese people would be sama sama, which in Indonesian means roughly, "everyone equal." The slogan was less than successful, however, since in Tetum, the chief Timorese dialect, sama sama means "trample, trample."

WEINBERGER VIEW ON NUCLEAR WAR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in mid-August, Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger sent a letter to various newspapers and television stations across the country. The nature of this letter was to spell out the basis for U.S. retaliatory policy and to address what Mr. Weinberger viewed as completely inaccurate and misrepresentative stories about U.S. war-fighting strategies.

For the last 3 months, I have been speaking daily on the floor of the Senate to call the attention of the Senate to the great importance of our acting to support a verifiable negotiated agreement with the Soviet Union to limit the nuclear arms race. Most of the material I have put in the record in that connection has been critical of our foreign policy, and I stand by it. I think that is right. I believe we should and can aggressively pursue a negotiated nuclear arms agreement, and we must do it. I cannot think of any more important action this Government can take.

In view of my series of remarks on defense issues, I thought it is only fair and appropriate that the Secretary's remarks be given broad attention—even though I may not agree with some of them.

Secretary Weinberger forcefully argues that the United States does not endorse the concept of protracted nuclear war, or nuclear "war-fighting." It is the Soviet Union, he says, that is building forces for that purpose.

He explains that the large Soviet buildup of strategic forces requires the United States to have a survivable and enduring response that would "demonstrate that our strategic forces could survive Soviet strikes over an extended period."

The purpose of acquiring a survivable and enduring retaliatory capability is to deter attack. In the absence of such a capability, there might be a temptation for the Soviet Union to use nuclear weapons against the United States or to place ourselves "in the position where the survivability of our deterrent would force the President to choose between using our strategic forces before they were destroyed or surrendering."

Mr. Weinberger notes that this is "an uncomfortable" way to keep the peace. But peace is our policy.

Backing up the Secretary's analysis is a vast amount of information about improvements in the Soviet war-fighting capabilities—their growth in warheads, improvements in accuracy, refiring capability, and various defensive advances.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Aug. 25, 1982]

WEINBERGER VIEW ON NUCLEAR WAR

I am increasingly concerned with news accounts that portray this Administration as planning to wage protracted nuclear war, or seeking to acquire a nuclear "war-fighting" capability. This is completely inaccurate, and these stories misrepresent the Administration's policies to the American public and to our allies and adversaries abroad.

It is the first and foremost goal of this Administration to take every step to ensure that nuclear weapons are never used again, for we do not believe there could be any "winners" in a nuclear war. Our entire strategy aims to deter war of all kinds, but most particularly to deter nuclear war. To accomplish this objective, our forces must be able to respond in a measured and prudent manner to the threat posed by the Soviet Union. That will require the improvements in our strategic forces that the President has proposed. But it does not mean that we endorse the concept of protracted nuclear war, or nuclear "war-fighting." It is the Soviet Union that appears to be building forces for a "protracted" conflict.

The policy of deterrence is difficult for some to grasp because it is based on a paradox. But this is quite simple: to make the cost of nuclear war much higher than any possible benefit. If the Soviets know in advance that a nuclear attack on the United States would bring swift nuclear retaliation, they would never attack in the first place. They would be "deterred" from ever beginning a nuclear war.

There is nothing new about our policy. Since the awful age of nuclear weapons began, the United States has sought to prevent nuclear war through a policy of deterrence. This policy has been approved, through the political processes of the democratic nations it protects, since at least 1950. More important, it works. It has worked in the face of major international tensions involving the great powers, and it has worked in the face of war itself.

But, for deterrence to continue to be successful in the future, we must take steps to offset the Soviet military buildup. If we do not modernize our arsenal now, as the Soviets have been doing for more than 20 years, we will, within a few years, no longer have the ability to retaliate. The Soviet Union would then be in a position to threaten or actually to attack us with the knowledge that we would be incapable of responding. We have seen in Poland, in Afghanistan, in Eastern Europe and elsewhere that the Soviet Union does not hesitate to take advantage of a weaker adversary. We cannot allow the Soviet Union to think it could begin a nuclear war with us and win.

This is not just idle speculation. The Soviet Union has engaged in a frenzied military buildup, in spite of their economic difficulties. They have continued to build greater numbers of nuclear weapons far beyond those necessary for deterrence. They now have over 5,000 nuclear warheads on ICBMs, compared to about 2,000 only five years ago. They have modified the design of these weapons and their launchers so that many of their land-based missiles are now more accurate, more survivable and more powerful than our own. They have also developed a refiring capability that will allow them to reload their delivery systems several times. They have elaborate plans for civil defense and air defense against any retaliation we might attempt. And finally, their writings and military doctrine emphasize a nuclear war-fighting scenario. Whatever they claim their intentions to be, the fact remains that they are designing their weapons in such a way and in sufficient numbers to indicate to us that they think they could begin, and win, a nuclear war.

In the face of all this, it is my responsibility and duty as secretary of defense to make every effort to modernize our nuclear forces in such a way that the United States retains the capability to deter the Soviet Union from ever beginning a nuclear war. We must take the steps necessary to match the Soviet Union's greatly improved nuclear capability.

That is exactly why we must have a capability for a survivable and enduring response—to demonstrate that our strategic forces could survive Soviet strikes over an extended period. Thus we believe we could deter any attack. Otherwise we would be tempting them to employ nuclear weapons or try to blackmail us. In short, we cannot afford to place ourselves in the position where the survivability of our deterrent would force the President to choose between using our strategic forces before they were destroyed or surrendering.

Those who object to a policy that would strengthen our deterrent, then, would force us into a more dangerous, hair-triggered posture. Forces that must be used in the very first instant of an enemy attack are not the tools of a prudent strategy. A posture that encourages Soviet nuclear adventurism is not the basis of an effective deterrent. Our entire strategic program, including the development of a response capability that has been so maligned in the press recently, has been developed with the express intention of assuring that nuclear war will never be fought.

I know that this doctrine of deterrence is a difficult paradox to understand. It is an uncomfortable way to keep the peace. We understand deterrence and accept the fact that we must do much more in order to continue to keep the peace. It is my fervent hope that all can understand and accept this so that we can avoid the sort of sensationalist treatment of every mention of the word "nuclear" that only serves to distort our policy and to frighten people all over the world. Our policy is peace, and we deeply believe that the best and surest road to peace is to secure and maintain an effective and credible deterrent.

The purpose of U.S. policy remains to prevent aggression through an effective policy of deterrence—the very goal which prompted the formation of the North Atlantic Alliance, an alliance which is as vital today as it was the day it was formed.

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see a messenger from the House of Representatives seeking admission to the Chamber, and I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

The following message from the House of Representatives was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks:

The House of Representatives having proceeded to reconsider the bill (H.R. 6863) entitled "An Act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, and for other purposes", returned by the President of the United States with his objections, to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, it was

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, this, of course, is the veto message. There is no time limitation on debate. However, it is hoped that debate will be prompt and that the Senate can vote on this measure sometime within the next hour.

Mr. President, I will have a statement to make a little later on the subject, but for the moment I yield the floor.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1982—VETO

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the President's veto message on H.R. 6863, which the clerk will read, and it will be spread in full upon the Journal. Pursuant to article I, section 7 of the Constitution, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Veto message on H.R. 6863, entitled "An Act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, and for other purposes."

The Senate proceeded to reconsider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. HATFIELD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I rise today with ambivalence of emotion and purpose. This is the first time since my party has assumed control of the U.S. Senate and I have acted on this floor as the chairman of the Appropriations Committee that I have had to take the floor in opposition to my President. But, Mr. President, this is a matter of conscience that one cannot avoid. I would much rather be here in the role that I have been in the past to support my President even at times when I found it very difficult to do so because of my own priorities of appropriation resources being applied to various and sundry programs that are incorporated in appropriations bills.

Mr. President, I have swallowed hard many times. I have literally held my nose on occasion in order to be a part of the majority party and to be a responsible majority and to demonstrate the capability of the majority to govern.

I know this is not unique to myself, and probably most of my colleagues have had similar experiences at times in their political lives. But again I reiterate, Mr. President, there comes a time in a person's life where conscience and principal transcend all of the affections and loyalties of party and to one's President, and one has to take a step which separates from that kind of relationship and team effort that has been so prevalent on this floor in the short period of time that this party has been in control.

I do not attempt this morning to speak on behalf of any member of the Appropriations Committee. Each person will speak on his own behalf. I do not attempt here this morning to say that this, what I say, is a consensus of the Appropriations Committee. I speak only as an individual who cannot avoid the role of leadership that I have as chairman of the committee.

Mr. President, I do though rise to strongly urge the Senate to override the veto of the supplemental appropriation bill. This measure provides a total of $14.5 billion in budget authority. That is $1.7 billion less that the President requested for the programs and activities covered by this measure. Let me repeat that: This bill provides spending in an amount of $1.7 billion, almost $2 billion, less than the President requested.

By no account, no responsible account, can this bill be considered a budget buster, as it has been characterized by the bean counters at OMB. I can only believe that the President acted on very poor, unsound advice when he vetoed this measure since it is so obviously in accord with our joint effort to reduce spending and narrow the deficits.

This measure is also well within the budget ceilings for fiscal year 1982 established by Congress in its action on the budget resolution. With the enactment of this bill we will still be below those ceilings by $8.1 billion in budget authority and $1.1 billion in budget outlays below the ceilings. I emphasize below the ceilings. I believe that is one reason why my good friend and colleague, the chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator DOMENICI, has indicated his sympathy and his understanding on this position that I take this morning, for we all know that, as chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator DOMINICI well knows that this is not a budget-busting bill or he would be in opposition to it if it were.

So by no yardstick could this be considered a budget-busting bill. Mr. President, this is simply not true. Nor is there any truth to the charge that his bill somehow deprives the Defense Department of necessary funds. The President requested $7.7 billion for defense, and Congress appropriated in this measure $5.7 billion, and that in addition to $204.6 billion already enacted into law this year.

So the amount denied in this supplemental appropriation request represents only 1 percent of the total appropriated this year for defense.

Congress denied these defense funds request for good and sufficient reasons. Most of the money requested was for procurement and operations, programs which are more properly considered in conjunction with the fiscal year 1983 defense bill, and the reductions do not have any impact on defense readiness. I am quite sure Senator STEVENS, who is the subcommittee chairman handling the defense appropriation bill, would not have recommended we make these reductions if he had thought or any member of his committee had thought they would have detrimentally affected our national defense.

In the same regard it is certainly worth noting that Defense Secretary Weinberger recommended to the President that the supplemental appropriation be signed, Secretary Weinberger recommending this to the President. So if this measure does not bust the budget, the President's or the Congress' budget, and if it does not short-change defense what is all the furor about? Congress decided to add some $900 million above the President's request for certain programs. Congress provided funding for older Americans, compensatory education for the disadvantaged, education for the handicapped, student financial aid, child immunization, mental health research, and special assistance to developing institutions, among others.

In other domestic programs Congress cut $140 million below the President's request. So the net addition in these areas is $760 million in budget authority.

In outlays, the increases for domestic programs will amount to no more than $92 million, which is merely an asterisk in the context of a $115 billion deficit.

Mr. President, it is incredible that, as we now clearly identify the true issues surrounding this vote, we find that the questions are not what they used to be. The President himself recently stated that he did not realize that this bill contained funds for jobs for older Americans. He said it was an oversight and that he supports this program. It is becoming apparent that the whole foundation for the President's veto was an oversight.

Mr. President, the question is not budget busting. Obviously, the President's request would not bust the budget and the bill is nearly $2 billion below his request. The question is an institutional one. The President's advisers seek to eliminate certain programs and they will recommend he veto any bill that contains those programs, even if the bill in total is substantially below the President's budget request, as it is.

The President may later claim an oversight, but we cannot, and should not, use this as an excuse. The question is simple and straightforward: Will the Congress, which passed this measure by substantial majorities, kowtow to David Stockman in his singleminded desire to eliminate programs of great value and importance to the people of this Nation, or will the Congress assert its own priorities and prerogatives and responsibilities? I hope for our sakes and for the good of the Nation that each Member here will examine his conscience and her conscience and will vote to override this veto.

In no way, in my own mind and heart, does this have any impact on my continued admiration, respect, support, and commitment to work with the President to see his economic program succeed and to help him in every way possible in every issue that he sends up here, as I have in the past. But I close by saying, again, in conscience I cannot support the President of the United States on this veto. And I believe that in review and I believe that in retrospect the President himself must have some serious question about the propriety of that veto when he acknowledged the oversight of the older Americans.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I congratulate my good friend, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the manager of the bill, on the statement he just made. I concur wholeheartedly in what he has said.

I think the first issue that we have to meet on this bill is that it is not a budget buster—not a budget buster in any way, shape, or form. It cuts either $2 billion or $1.4 billion, depending on whether you take the revision that the administration proposed, below, underneath, less than what the President requested.

Talk about George Orwell. Calling this a budget buster, I suppose, if we presented a $10 billion or $5 billion bill, instead of a $14.6 billion bill, they would have considered that an even worse budget buster. It is ridiculous. Ridiculous. How in the world can you have something that can be called a budget buster or big spending bill when it is less than what the President requests?

Now, I have the greatest respect for the Washington Post. I think it is a fine newpaper; one of the finest in the country. But, at the same time, they had a headline—I suppose it is hard when you are a headline writer and have to write it. It was in this morning's Post. I do not have the headline with me at the moment. But it was something like: "The House Overrides President's Veto of $14 Billion Spending Bill."

I am sure that most people reading the paper got the impression that the President was trying to hold down spending. Not at all. There is no way, if we fail to override, that we are going to come in with a bill below that unless we refuse to give the President what he requests, with more emphasis.

Mr. President, I think we set exactly the right priorities here. We have a modest cut in guns and a modest increase in butter. But let me point out what the modest cut in guns amounts to.

As my good friend from Oregon has pointed out, the Secretary of Defense, Caspar Weinberger—and nobody can call Caspar Weinberger weak on defense or a dove or somebody who puts a low priority on defense spending—wrote to Mr. Stockman on the 16th of August. I have a copy of the letter, which I will put in the RECORD but let me just read the first paragraph. He said:

I am soliciting your support for expeditious signature by the President of the FY 1982 Pay Supplemental Bill, following completed congressional action.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Secretary Weinberger's letter to Mr. Stockman be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, August 16, 1982.

Hon. DAVID A. STOCKMAN,
Director, Office of Management and Budget, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DAVE: I am soliciting your support for expeditious signature by the President of the FY 1982 Pay Supplemental Bill, following completed Cogressional action.

The Department of Defense will legally exhaust all appropriated funds for a military payroll approximately Wednesday, August 18. The amounts required for pay increases have been apportioned on a deficiency basis since October 1, 1981. By law, we can neither obligate nor expend additional funds in the absence of the signed Supplemental Bill. The Department simply will not be able to meet the military payroll after August 18, and our military personnel will experience a payless payday on August 30, while the Congress is in recess.

While the Supplemental Bill includes language agreed to by both the House and Senate that would retroactively authorize obligations for military pay in anticipation of its enactment, the provision is inoperative until it becomes law.

The Constitution prohibits expenditure of funds that have not been appropriated by the Congress, and the Antideficiency Act, Section 3679 of the Revised Statutes, prohibits obligations in excess of those amounts appropriated. Neither my General Counsel nor I know of any further flexibilities at this time that would enable the Department to meet the military payroll requirements.

Every possible action should be taken to avoid hardships of this type to our uniformed personnel. I urge you to support expeditious signature of the FY 1982 Supplemental Bill.

Sincerely,

CASPAR WEINBERGER.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, when the Secretary of Defense, who is our expert on defense, says to go ahead and sign the bill, it seems to me it does not make much sense for us to argue that it does not provide enough for defense. He is the expert. If it did not provide enough for defense, obviously he would have urged a veto instead of urging the President to sign the bill.

Mr. President, I would also like to point out that the Congress fulfilled its role as a separate but coequal branch of the Federal Government by recasting the President's priorities and cutting his proposed budget in the process.

Both Houses supported this congressional initiative overwhelmingly. The House approved the conference report on the supplemental bill by a vote of 348 to 67. I recall very well when we acted on this bill. There was no rollcall vote, but we had a hotline out in which we asked every Democratic Senator whether he wanted a rollcall, whether he had any reason to object. And nobody spoke up. I understand the same kind of opportunity was given to Republican Senators and at that time nobody indicated any opposition.

Mr. President, I think all of us have respect for the President of the United States. He has a very difficult job. He has done some things extremely well. But, in this particular case, Mr. President, that veto does seem to be a serious mistake and it seems to this Senator that we should certainly override it.

Let me just spend a minute or two more indicating what is at stake here. Mr. President, we do cut the defense budget by $2.141 billion below the request of the administration, we cut foreign aid by $110 million, and we cut the pay raise by $109 million, for a total cut of about $2.358 billion.

Now, we add on certain domestic programs here. Community service for older Americans—that is one in which the President has relented somewhat. That will provide 55,000 jobs in this country, and the jobs are at a very, very low wage, for older Americans—Green Thumb, for example—jobs that older Americans, who are otherwise on welfare, will have an opportunity to have the dignity of a job at low pay doing constructive work. And these programs have been enthusiastically supported by everybody who has had any opportunity to see them in action.

Compensatory education for the disadvantaged, $148 million. Again, a very modest, mild reduction from the reduction that the President put in. In other words, we would not reduce it as much.

Student financial assistance, $217 million. In that case, Mr. President, the Office of Management and Budget recommended a substantial cut, a cut of 17 percent. We simply ameliorated that cut in 1981 and make a cut of 10 percent. Of course, if you allow for inflation, it could be closer to 15 or 20 percent. We still make a cut, but we restore a modest part of that student financial assistance mainly in the Pell grant program.

The other part of the program I would call attention to is handicapped education, $26 million. I think all of us realize that, regardless of whether we have a Republican administration or a Democratic administration, whether it is conservative or liberal, almost every American realizes we have an obligation to our handicapped citizens. There is no way that they can take care of themselves.

I do not know how anybody who has someone come into his office or goes out in his State and talks to people who are handicapped can turn his back on them. Other programs, I think, you could make a strong case that we have to cut them strongly. But a restoration of $26 million for handicapped children, it seems to me, simply shows that we do not have, as the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives said yesterday, a heart of stone. $26 million for handicapped children, it seems to me that represents the kind of thing that we are trying to do here in a very limited, modest way.

As the chairman of the Appropriations Committee has said so well, this is not, not, not a budget buster. It is below the President; less than.

I hope we keep that in mind.

An economy vote is a vote to override in this case. It is hard to grasp that because usually that is not the case, particularly with the reputation the President has made. But in this case it is. I hope somehow we can get that across to the rest of the Members of this body so that we can act expeditiously on this measure.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR., addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I rise to support President Reagan's veto of the $14 billion supplemental appropriation bill.

I think it is important that we understand just what the President proposes. The President proposes that the total will be reduced by $900 million. He does not advocate an increase in defense expenditures. I say again, he does not advocate an increase in defense expenditures. He seeks to reduce the total by $900 million.

In a statement yesterday from Utah, I suppose, or maybe Kansas, President Reagan in commenting on the House action yesterday in overriding the veto said the big spenders won.

Frankly, I am not surprised that a Democratic-dominated House of Representatives voted to override the President's veto of an appropriation bill. But I would be astonished and indeed alarmed if the Republican-dominated Senate were to vote to override the President's veto of a bill which adds tremendously to the spending of Government.

It has been correctly pointed out by the Appropriations Committee that the total figure in this bill is less than the President originally recommended. That does not mean it is not a budget-busting bill. The President has seen the light. He is not asking for these additions in defense that he asked for previously. He wants the defense totals left as they are in this bill, but he wants the total of the bill reduced by $900 million. I think that is reasonable. We have too much spending.

Much is made of the fact that the bill now before the Senate is below the recently adopted congressional budget ceiling.

Well, that does not impress me one bit. The figure adopted by the Senate and the House of Representatives in the budget resolution is, in my judgment, an irresponsible figure. I did not vote for that resolution for that reason. So the fact that it is below the budget ceiling is totally meaningless when one considers whether or not there is too much spending.

The President is trying to get spending under control, and the President is one of the few who is making a determined effort to get spending under control. That being the case, I want to support that endeavor.

It is not pleasant to vote against some of the appropriations that are in this proposal, but I think in looking at it on balance the appropriate vote on this measure is to vote to sustain the President's position. Congress then can bring in a new bill, $900 million less than the present bill, and the President would presumably sign such legislation.

I want to applaud the President for this veto, and express the hope that he will continue to veto money bills coming out of the Congress. Congress has proved itself irresponsible in the past. The Congress has adopted a budget resolution this year which provides for spending which will mean that for 3 consecutive years, and maybe longer, budget deficits will exceed $100 billion.

The Congressional Budget Office last week submitted figures showing that for the upcoming fiscal year, 1983, the deficit will be $155 billion.

Can this Nation sustain itself with 3 years of budget deficits exceeding $100 billion?

I recognize, and I have been in public life for several years, that it is much easier to vote for spending than it is to vote to reduce spending.

I recognize the political pressures being exerted by pressure groups to include these items and other items, various different items, in these appropriations bills.

But somewhere along the way this Government, this Congress, the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate, have to be willing to say, "No."

President Reagan has shown courage, I think, in vetoing the supplemental appropriation bill. The supplemental appropriation is just what the name implies. It is an additional appropriation for the fiscal year which will end 20 days from today. We have already passed appropriations bills and this is on top of all of those.

I would just be astonished and disappointed if this Republican-dominated Senate is unwilling to sustain President Reagan's veto of a money bill of this magnitude. What he seeks is, I say again, not an increase in defense spending, as has been alleged on the floor of the Senate. He seeks to reduce the total by $900 million. He does not seek to add any additional funds for defense.

I shall support his veto. I think it is justified. I think he was correct in his assertion yesterday that in the House of Representatives the big spenders won. I hope the big spenders will not win today.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, the issue before the U.S. Senate is one of priorities. As much as the President of the United States would like to talk about spending, that is not the issue before the Senate. The objection that the President has is that Congress does not necessarily share his priorities.

We have a constitutional right, we have a constitutional authority, we have a constitutional responsibility to establish, as elected officials and representatives of constituencies, the same constituencies as the President of the United States, in our collective judgment what we believe the priorities of this country ought to be.

What this bill represents is a set of priorities which the President does not agree with. That is the issue. That is what the vote is about.

The President essentially wants to suggest, in 1982, as he did in 1981, that the only one, the only individual in this Government who has the right or the authority or the responsibility to set the priorities of this country is the President of the United States. If you agree with "patriotism" and if you agree with his view of the world, all the good things that he suggests that represents, then you have no choice but to support his priorities.

It is absolutely false to say, as he did yesterday, that the big spenders won. That is not the issue. He knows it is not the issue. This is not what this bill is all about. The distinguished floor managers have stated what this bill is about. It is about what the priorities of this country ought to be.

The Senator from Virginia is absolutely right to talk about the budget deficits and the problems this country faces. He is absolutely right when he points them out to be the single most serious problem our economy faces. But these deficits are the result of the economic program that was passed last year, pure and simple, not congressional spending, not a Democratically controlled House. They are the result of the passage of a set of priorities that include the biggest defense buildup in the history of this country.

How the President of the United States or his supporters can talk about Government spending and exclude the Department of Defense, I do not know. The President avowedly seeks to take a proportion of the budget that represented 24 percent of the Federal spending when he took office and drive it to 40 percent of Federal spending in 5 years and exclude it when he talks about Government spending. That is one of the reasons we have the deficits we have.

We shall never be able to get and keep interest rates down so long as we have that irresponsible Government spending that goes exclusively across the river to the Pentagon.

That is what this bill is about, Mr. President. It is not about spending, it is about priorities.

I think it is not accidental that the House overrode that veto on a bipartisan basis. That was not a partisan vote. We can talk about a democratically controlled House as long as we want to, but I quote the House Republican leader, Mr. MICHEL, who said the following thing:

> The principal reason we lost was that you cannot make a good argument that Congress was busting the budget. You couldn't make a good agrument on the numbers. Maybe for the long haul, the administration could learn something from this.

That is not TIP O'NEILL, that is Mr. ROBERT MICHEL, the House minority leader.

Mr. President, I think it is incumbent on all of us and I think it is incumbent on the American people to understand that this is not an issue of who the big spenders are. Nobody is more concerned about spending than the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin. He has spoken out on that issue as much as the Senator from Virginia or anyone else in this Chamber. He is here today stating his position as a fiscal conservative and a responsible Member of this body that this is not a budget-busting bill.

The President can adjust weekly what he thinks ought to be the budget numbers. He seems more inclined to do that all the time. But this is not a bill that busts the budget that was accepted by this Congress and, to my knowledge, approved by the administration.

I think what the Senate ought to do is send a message to the President that we are way beyond waste, fraud, and abuse. The phrase that dominated the political lexicon for 2 years or more in this country—waste, fraud, and abuse—is no longer heard anymore. Even this President does not talk about waste, fraud, and abuse except when his administration sets up a special unit to monitor defense contractors. I think that is one of the smartest things this administration has done.

If we are going to see waste, fraud, and abuse in the 1980's, it is going to happen in the Department of Defense. So we had better get ready for it.

I hope the Senate will send a message to the President and reaffirm to the American people that there is another set of priorities in this country than just those that flow from the oval office. I think that is what this issue is all about and I hope my colleagues will vote to override the veto.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I think that a lot of things have been said on the floor in the debate that is underway now and by people in the executive branch and by individuals after the vote in the House. Much has been said that the vote yesterday in the House was a bipartisan vote. Let me point out to my colleagues, Mr. President, that the decision coming out of the White House was a split decision. Many of the more prominent members of the President's own Cabinet, according to press reports, urged the President to sign this bill. Those individuals are not budget busters, any more than the chairman of our committee, the Senator from Oregon, or the ranking Democratic member, the Senator from Wisconsin, or the Senator from North Dakota are budget busters. This was a close call in the President's own family.

He called me last night and we talked for some time on the telephone. I said, "Mr. President, I totally agree with what you are trying to do, cut down Government deficits. But," I said, "I think you have been given horrible advice when you were advised to veto this bill."

I think we ought to point out again and again and yet again the fact that this bill does not exceed the President's budget. It does reorder some priorities, but after all, under the Constitution as I studied it some years ago in school, is that not what Congress is supposed to be, a coequal branch, to take a look at priorities and set those priorities for the Nation?

A remark was made a moment ago that one of our colleagues hoped the President would continue to veto money bills. That might be good politics, but it is lousy government. The subcommittee I am responsible for of the Appropriations Committee happens to fund a number of different agencies. One of them is the Coast Guard. It is not a parochial issue with me. There is no Coast Guard search and rescue station in the whole State of North Dakota, which I am privileged to represent. I think that is obvious to everybody. But there are a number of Coast Guard stations that are extremely important to this Nation's defense and its people's safety.

The Commandant of the Coast Guard was in my office yesterday afternoon about 4 o'clock. He said that he is going to have to start laying off employees of the Coast Guard within a week if this bill is not successfully preserved by a vote to override on the floor of the Senate this afternoon.

Anybody who believes that we can go back to the House of Representatives and quickly get a replacement through for this supplemental so that these layoffs, at tremendous cost to the Government, at tremendous cost to the services extended to the people of this country, anyone who belives we can pass a successor to the supplemental that patches everything up and leaves off just a few of the articles the President objects to has to believe in the tooth fairy. It is not going to be done.

(Mr. EAST assumed the chair.)

Mr. HATFIELD. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ANDREWS. I am glad to yield to my distinguished chairman.

Mr. HATFIELD. I am glad that the distinguished Senator, the chairman of our Transportation Subcommittee, has brought this point forward, because the House does not plan to do any business until next Wednesday. Therefore, we are facing not only general overall Government furloughs by Wednesday, but we are facing, more particularly, military furloughs—no pay for the military.

Mr. ANDREWS. That is absolutely right.

Mr. HATFIELD. Therefore, those who are of the opinion that, somehow, we should sustain the veto at this moment and then send us back to the drafting board within the timeframe that we have to operate—should know—it is simply not possible. A vote to support the veto at this point means layoffs.

We might as well face up to that issue right this morning. There is no other way to avoid it, because a redraft of the supplemental will have to originate in the House of Representatives. They are not in session today because of Representative Benjamin's funeral. My understanding is that their business calendar will begin on Wednesday. That, as the Senator from North Dakota has pointed out, is not possible for the appropriations process to bring forth a revision of a supplemental bill.

It is more than a matter of priorities. It is more than a matter of supporting or not supporting the President at this point. It is now a question of how the general functions of Government will be impacted by next Wednesday. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I appreciate the comments from my distinguished chairman. I totally agree with him. I would like to point out some other things in this bill that are important, programs that need to have continuity. I have had calls from people in my State, as the Senator has had calls from people in his State, and from friends in other States about ongoing programs. If this veto is not overriden this afternoon, individuals in a whole host of different agencies will begin laying off personnel. As the chairman of the committee pointed out, we are not going to come to the rescue. There is no Paul Revere that is going to run through this Chamber later on this evening and pass some substitute that can keep those programs going.

I remember almost a year ago when we had a continuing resolution, hour after hour after hour of negotiations with our colleagues from the other body. We agreed upon a figure in that continuing resolution. The President's people were in that room. They signed off on it, we thought. The next morning we had a veto because Mr. Stockman looked in his mirror and saw the other side of it and came up with a whole host of new figures. Frankly, I am getting darned sick and tired of Stockman and his mirror act. He is not serving the President well. He is not serving the Congress well. He is not serving the Nation well.

Mr. President, a moment ago the chairman of the Appropriations Committee pointed out that this is an institutional question. It is an institutional question, but it is more than that. It is a question of orderly process. When we watched the charade of the veto of the continuing resolution almost a year ago, over $400 or $500 million, we witnessed a cost to the taxpayers of this country in lost time of Federal employees discharged, and then brought back and paid for not working, that far outbalanced the purported savings in the action of the veto and the waiting for the reenactment of the continuing resolution.

All the figures that I have access to in the subcommittee over which I have jurisdiction, and other figures from other subcommittees in the Appropriations Committee, indicate that the cost would be far higher, if the President were to get another supplemental appropriations bill that did in fact whittle out the $700 million he is objecting to. We would find an even greater cost in lost employment, lost time, and lost service to the Government. This simply does not make sense from a fiscal standpoint.

We also ought to point out, Mr. President, that in this bill we have a number of items that are time-sensitive. In addition to Coast Guard and FAA operations we have interstate transfer funds which are necessary in a number of States to build badly needed highways. We have $112.5 million in this bill for these interstate transfer projects that I understand the administration objects to.

I have in my hand a request from the President of the United States to put $150 million into our regular bill, which is to be marked up next week, for the very same function. If we wait another several months, given the weather in the various States, it is going to cost more money in getting these projects under contract, more money that is going to impact on the pocketbooks of the taxpayers.

So let me once again, Mr. President, urge my colleagues to recognize the true facts of this issue: One, this was not a unanimous call even in the President's own family, his Cabinet. Two, there are a number of programs that will be in jeopardy if this veto is not overridden. Three, the loss of time through this political charade will have more cost impact on the taxpayers than any savings we can possible recognize from it. Finally, Mr. President, let me point out again that if we are going to have an orderly appropriations process, the only way we are going to move some of our separate appropriations bills is to override this veto so we do in fact have time to pass the regular bills in such fields as defense, transportation, and hopefully in health and human services. We do not want to go the continuing resolution road once again.

That is the best way to save money, Mr. President. That is the best way to serve the people of this country. I hope that my colleagues will join me in voting to override this veto because they are interested in saving Federal funds, because they are interested in a balanced government, and because they are interested in an orderly process in Government.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I intend to vote to sustain the veto on the supplemental appropriations bill that is being considered today.

My primary reason for supporting the President's veto is because first, the President is correct. This bill is overbudgeted, and the problem with our budget and the economy is that the Government is spending too much money.

Second, the Congress has unfortunately increased the use of its habit to spend more of the taxpayers' money by funding programs under the supplemental appropriations bills. Originally, supplemental appropriations bills were used to finance emergency spending measures that could not have otherwise been planned for in the normal appropriations process. Now these bills are used to get around the budget process, and quite logically, hold up the Congress near the end of every year.

These bills are now a fixture in the appropriations process. These expenditures could have been funded within the normal appropriations process if we wanted to make an attempt to put an end to the shell game that currently exists in the budget process.

Third, funding for title I educational programs is included in this bill. The funding levels for the various States should logically be determined by the legislated formula based in the latest census data. Unfortunately logic has not prevailed on the process of allocating funds. Funding for title I education programs is being determined by a formula based in the 1970 census data—not the 1980 census data which is the most current and accurate data available. As a result of this action, 13 States in the Union, one of which is Idaho, are going to receive fewer funds than they rightfully deserve. For example Idaho will be $1,010,000 short in funds that they rightfully deserve under title I funding.

Why did we go to the trouble of taking the census if we are not going to use the data? The census indicated that my State is poorer now than in 1970 and it is a State whose population has more greatly expanded than others States in the Union. Consequently according to the formulas that we have approved here, my State should receive a proportionate share of the funds, relative to its needs.

This has not happened. My State along with 12 others is being shortchanged. We will be sending money to States whose populations have decreased and are more affluent. We will be sending money to States to fund educational programs to students who are no longer there. I am hopeful that this matter can be corrected either here in Congress or, if not, by the judicial process.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will not approve this measure. We are spending too much money, and we are spending that money, for the most part, on programs that contribute absolutely nothing to the economic health of our economy.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I strongly urge my colleagues to join the House of Representatives in overriding the President's veto of the supplemental appropriations bill.

There are solid grounds for the Senate to override this veto. But one of the most important reasons is that the President's action was more of a public relations veto than a substantive veto, and was used by the administration as a diversionary tactic to draw attention away from their support last month of the large tax increase bill.

But those are not valid reasons for the many Senators and Representatives who supported this bill a month ago to switch their positions and oppose it now.

The Senate and the House worked hard on this legislation to fashion a compromise acceptable to both Congress and the administration. At the time, we felt that we succeeded; we brought the bill in at a level nearly $2 billion below the President's request, and it was passed by Congress with overwhelming bipartisan support.

Many of the major provisions in this legislation are needed to continue vital programs:

The bill contains essential funds for the older Americans community service employment program—widely recognized as one of the most effective Federal programs for elderly citizens. That program, which provides funds for 54,000 senior aides, will be in jeopardy if we fail to override the veto.

The bill contains appropriations for Pell grants for college aid to low-income students, to assure that money is available for the full $1,800 grant per student. In Massachusetts, 40,000 students will have their aid cut if these funds are denied.

The bill contains aid for hard-pressed local schools to educate the disadvantaged and the handicapped.

It also provides $10 million to help pregnant adolescents and their families.

Finally, it contains funds to avoid the needless and wasteful disruption of the Government which is likely to result if this veto is sustained.

The President characterizes these provisions as "wasteful and unnecessary spending." I call them essential to meeting our obligation to the elderly, the young, the handicapped, and the disadvantaged.

The President's justification for vetoing this bill is transparently false. He calls it a budget buster, yet the total spending in the bill is 11 percent less than the $16 billion requested by the President. The plain truth is that the President does not want to provide adequate funds for the elderly, for the handicapped, and for education, yet he has no such qualms about billions more for defense and for military aid.

The issues before us today are the same issues that have occupied us for nearly 2 years—the fundamental issues of fairness and priorities.

The President has persistently opposed bill after bill to fund vital human service programs for millions of our citizens. Yet he has consistently refused to moderate the massive increases in his defense budget—which will double to nearly $370 billion over the next 5 years. Just last month the President repudiated his previous acceptance of the carefully crafted compromise in the congressional budget resolution that would reduce the defense increase by a modest 3 percent—from 15 percent to 12 percent.

Of course we must have adequate funds for defense. At the same time, we must carefully scrutinize all defense spending, just as we have examined each domestic program. Much of the defense funding the President seeks is for new, nonurgent programs. Some is for activities that have not even been authorized by Congress. A supplemental appropriations bill is no place to make such important decisions.

In sum, there is growing acceptance by Congress of the need to trim military spending if we are to succeed in balancing the budget and restore economic prosperity. This bill is by no means perfect, but it is a fair and reasonable effort by Congress to recognize the realities of the Federal budget, and it deserves to be enacted into law.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, the President of the United States has the right to exercise vetoes, and certainly that is a part of his duties under the Constitution.

I should like to try to raise the level of debate on matters of this importance in the Congress of the United States.

I was quite amazed to sit here for the last hour or hour and a half and hear some of the arguments that were advanced for overriding the Presidential veto, most of which I agree with, and some of the most amazing reasons why we should sustain the Presidential veto.

Most of those arguments, so far as the latter action was concerned, had to do with "if you vote for this, you are a big spender." The record of this Senator from Nebraska is such that no one could challenge me as being a big spender.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that when we continue to endorse, without thinking, the statements that are made by the President of the United States, if we continue to jump through the hoop every time the President of the United States calls "wolf!" as if he expects all his Little Red Riding Hoods to jump through the hoop once again, then we are not discharging our duties.

The level of debate and the reasons for our action here must be more important than simply mimicking or mouthing the words of the President of the United States when he says that the big spenders won in the House of Representatives yesterday.

I heard a statement on the floor this morning, by one of my colleagues for whom I have the highest respect, that the big spenders in the Democratic House prevailed yesterday, when we all know that was a true bipartisan effort.

There are many reasons why we should override the Presidential veto. I am going to mention only one.

The farmers of the United States today are in dire distress. Time and time again, we hear from this administration that we are going to work our way out of the depression—the depression, Mr. President—that we are seeing in grain sales today by promoting overseas sales of grain. I simply point out that in this bill that the President veto is $500 million which is specifically designed to enhance the sales of American grain overseas.

We must not continue to be misled by a myth. We should vote our conscience on this issue. So far as I can ascertain, no reason has been advanced on the floor of the U.S. Senate today to support the President in this matter, other than supporting the President in this matter. In the opinion of this Senator, that is not a valid argument.

I urge my colleagues to override the Presidential veto.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I speak this afternoon primarily to commend the thoughtfulness and the character of the distinguished Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. No individual during the course of this Congress has worked with more diligence or more effect to cause a better, a more conservative, and a more reasonable fiscal policy to be the reality of the United States.

When the Senator from Oregon led off debate on this subject, he pointed out that this proposal which is before us today does not bust the budget; that, in fact, it is more than $1 billion less than the request from the President for the subjects contained within it. The Senator from Oregon is entirely correct.

The Senator from Oregon also pointed out that this proposal is below the authority contained in the budget resolution for fiscal year 1982. He is correct in that respect as well.

The Senator from Oregon said with some regret that the President and the White House, in dealing with this proposal on the basis of its being irresponsible spending, were not treating with this in an appropriate fashion.

The issue here is not the total amount of spending contained in this bill. The issue here is the set of priorities for distribution of the various spending programs within the supplemental appropriations bill.

In fact, of course, the distribution which Congress has wrought in this bill is far closer to the views not only of the minority but also of the majority party in the Budget Committee and in the Appropriations Committee than is the alternative proposal which is made by the administration.

It is because this bill is consistent with the budget resolution for fiscal 1982, it is because this resolution is consistent with the priorities for spending which Congress, itself, in its wisdom, has determined, and it is because this is both a conservative and a responsible supplemental budget that I join the chairman of the Appropriations Committee—and, I believe, the chairman of the Budget Committee as well—in believing that the veto should be overridden.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his kind remarks, and I appreciate his support on this issue.

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, I wish to point out my reasons for voting to override the President's veto on the supplemental appropriations.

Let me begin by expressing my respect for the President's arguments in vetoing this legislation. This country is blessed with a leader who is finally turning around the total deterioration that our military has suffered over the last 10 years. I recognize his concern that we continue the momentum of our overall defense improvements.

However, a large portion of the administration's request for supplemental defense appropriations went far beyond any justifiable request for extra last-minute funding. What we in Congress approved were additional funds associated with uncontrollable cost increases, such as underfunded pay entitlements, inflation adjustments, et cetera. The requests for new start funding and funding to expand existing programs remain beyond the scope of this legislation and should not even be included in this bill.

The funding levels provided in the supplemental are more than adequate to keep our defense programs on track and our military people fully paid. In fact, Secretary Weinberger urged the President not to veto the bill.

If we do not succeed in overriding this veto, the impact on the military of the President's veto being sustained could be exactly the opposite of that intended by the administration. There is some question about the legality of using withholding accounts to pay the September 15 paychecks of our military and civilian personnel. If this fallback method cannot be implemented, there will be widespread morale problems in the services. The gradual improvement in recruiting and retention rates that we have struggled to reach will be dealt a serious blow if payments on September 15 are delayed.

I lay the blame for the present supplemental funding crisis squarely in the laps of those defense advisers who recommended bypassing congressional oversight in attempting to start new programs and expand others. There seems to be a disturbing trend of arrogance cropping up in the dealings of some members of the Department of Defense with Congress and its budget and oversight process. We have provided for vast increases in many defense programs and much of what we receive in return are requests for more funding to cover further cost growth.

It is time we sent a signal to the Department of Defense and the defense industry in this country that those of us who are 100 percent supporters of a strong defense are also 100 percent supporters of a strong economy. Congress has the responsibility for national security but it also has the economic obligation to use prudent man financial practices in appropriating funds. We have procedures for budgeting programs and these procedures must and will be respected.

This supplemental appropriations is nearly $2 billion less than the administration's budget request. I support a congressional override of the President's veto.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I shall be brief in what I have to say and it can be compressed within a very short compass.

I wish to make two points:

First is that a great deal of attention has been drawn to the social programs which are provided for to very limited extent in this bill.

Might it be clear, and I was very pleased to hear the statement just made by my good friend, Senator JEPSEN, that $5 billion in this program is for the Commodity Credit Corporation? Anyone in this Chamber who represents a State which looks to agricultural support programs has an elemental interest to support the bill that the Senate passed and the override which the distinguished chairman has proposed. Certainly they do if they expect continued support of such programs from those of us who have little direct interest in them.

I emphasize that. The $5 billion is for farmers, and we are prepared to vote for it regardless of the number farmers in our State. But are we to do so with the expectation that those who benefit will not join us? Or that those who do not approve will somehow suggest the expenditures, the outlays, and authority were directed to our own interests and not more generally to those of the Nation?

Mr. President, there is in addition some money in this measure for established programs to help the aged, the handicapped, and those in college, not large sums, relatively small, given our budget, but very much in order.

One of the items to which a fair amount of attention has been called is the $211 million for title V of the Older Americans Act. Title V is a well understood, well performing program that hires older persons to do work for older persons. It is an established, proven, sensible program.

The President vetoed this bill, which includes this measure. In his veto message he said, "I do not take this step lightly."

He would have had us think he was fully cognizant of all the bill's provisions as well as arguments which led him to reject the views of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and such other views as were presented in favor of the bill.

No. He said the bill is not acceptable and there was much talk about big spenders.

Yet this morning we learned something that verges on the astounding. Judy Woodruff of NBC news interviewed the President and she described the exchange.

She said, "Despite this tough talk from the President he acknowledged that he had agreed at the last minute to restore funding for jobs for the elderly poor, a program he professed not to know had been affected by his veto."

Then Miss Woodruff quotes the President as saying, "This one slipped by me. I happen to believe in that program, and I have, and I gave them my word that I was." And then with that well-known clarity, that direct and forthright concision of statement and precision of view he drifted off into another subject.

"This one slipped by me."

It is not a very long or complicated bill.

The social programs about which the President expressed such dismay and concern are three: Title V. of the Older Americans Act; the Education of The Handicapped Act; and the Higher Education Act. There are only three. They slipped by him and now he wishes he had not done it.

So I say support the President and override the veto.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, this administration never ceases to amaze. President Reagan's veto of the supplemental appropriations bill is shortsighted, self-contradictory, and wrong. The House and Senate sent him a supplemental appropriations bill that was almost $2 billion under the President's request. This bill clearly does not bust the budget; let me repeat—this bill clearly does not bust the budget. Since it provides funds for his cherished Caribbean Basin Initiative, Secretary of State Schultz recommended that the President sign it. Since it provides money to pay the Armed Forces of the United States and omits nothing urgently needed by the Defense Department, Secretary of Defense Weinberger recommended that he sign it. The majority leader of the Senate, the chairman of the Budget Committee, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee all urged the President to sign it.

You would think that, with all this high-powered, Repulican advice the President would either sign the bill or have extraordinary good reasons not to. What are his reasons? The President of the United States vetoed this bill because it had too much money for the poor, the children and the aged and too little for defense. Let me repeat: This bill, $2 billion under his request, was vetoed because it contained too much money for the poor, the children and the aged, and too little for defense.

Now what programs for the poor and aged did the President object to? They were student grants for the poor, $217 million; community service jobs for the elderly, $211 million; and educational help for poor children, $148 million.

People who live in New Jersey like Americans in every other State need the funds included in this bill. Let me read to you a letter I received from Oxford, N.J., which highlights the plight of many families who are striving to give their children a better life by sending them to college. The father, who is on social security disability, writes that although his two college age children qualify for student assistance, there is currently no money in the programs to help them. He writes:

DEAR SENATOR BRADLEY: Again I am writing to you in concern of my sons, who will be attending East Stroudsburg State College again this fall.

They were eligible for SEOG and National Direct Student Loan which the Federal government gives to the Colleges, but there was no money to be given out to them. To me, this is discriminating. Why wasn't East Stroudsburg State given enough money for SEO Grant and ND student loans. Who needs it more than my two boys? They can't even buy clothing, or anything with their social security checks, because they have to use 100% for college. Are they to live off of my social security check? . . .

The President stinks in my estimation, he only cares for the rich.

My sons will be forever paying back under guaranteed student loan at 9 percent or whatever. Are they to give up college, one is a sophomore and the other a senior?

I can only say my family and I don't have to worry about hell, we are in it right now. I only want to know why they were eligible for SEO Grant and NDS Loan and there is no money. I am very bitter and so are my two sons. I can only say no wonder the young go wrong. How can they survive if no one cares? . . .

The supplemental budget bill which we passed and the President vetoed would allow students such as these to complete their education. Young people in New Jersey would receive $4.2 million in Pell grants and $2.3 million in SEOG funds. In addition, our elementary and secondary school students would receive $17 million in educational assistance. They deserve that chance.

That is not all. The President also denies an important chance to thousands of older Americans who are contributing valuable service to their communities. Fifty-four thousand people are facing the loss of dignified work and income needed for basic survival as a result of this veto. One individual from Newark, N.J. makes the point very succinctly. She writes:

Dear Senator: I have been a widow for 7 years. I am a senior citizen. I am employed by the Senior Aid Employment program to give home care for the less fortunate senior citizens of America. Without this program I do not know if I can make it. Also the older Americans who depend on this program for their home care and Medical attention. Please try to help me.

Another writes from Long Branch:

Dear Sir: I am not worried about losing my job. I am worried about my clients. They really depend on me. Most of them are shut-ins. Most of them have no family, nobody they can depend upon. They have no car, and everybody today is so involved in their own personal life that they can't be bothered helping other people.

Some of the things I do for them are running errands, grocery-shopping, buying clothes for them, cooking, writing letters—doing whatever is needed. I don't stand on ceremony. If they are sick, I stay with them. When they go to the hospital, I visit them. I try to encourage them. Sometimes they haven't got the will to live. Having somebody that they know to come by helps them. They look forward to it. Sometimes I pick up prescriptions for them. I even pick-up foodstamps for my clients. Whenever I am told to go, I go and find out what's needed.

I hope that program won't be cut because these are all poor people and they cannot afford to have outside help to help them. They just have their monthly checks and every penny is rationed—they haven't even enough money to see them through. They can't afford to pay for outside help.

I am asking you to do all you can to save the Title V Employment Program for Senior Citizens. The people I work for need all the help they can get.

This supplemental budget would also provide funding for the Federal supplemental benefits program providing 6 to 10 weeks of benefits for unemployed workers.

Let us compare the urgency of these programs that the President did not want with funds the President is upset that he did not get. Congress chose to deny Defense Department funds for housekeeping items and the initial payment for new weapons systems planned for next year. There is absolutely no reason why these items could not be funded next year. Clearly they are not worth disrupting Government services. And I do not think a credible case can be made that they are more urgent than the thousands of students who cannot go to college next week because programs are not adequately funded. Nor are those defense funds more urgently needed than the money to keep thousands of older Americans from being thrown out of work.

What is left to say? There was no reason to veto this bill: it does not bust the budget; it provides funds needed by the children, the aged, the poor, and the unemployed; the funds omitted from the defense portion are neither urgent nor controversial. Mr. President, we all want a strong defense. We can have a strong defense without cutting educational opportunities for our children or employment opportunities for the elderly. This veto is shortsighted, self-contradictory, and wrong. This bill should become law. The veto should be overridden.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today in support of H.R. 6863, the supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1982.

It is not easy for me to make this statement, but I think the most important matter is that when we are finished today, the American people understand what has transpired.

I regret that there are some who would like to make this a major issue in terms of fiscal austerity. There are some who would want to be self-fulfilling prophets and indicate that if this bill becomes law we have in some way shattered the restraint we have shown around here, and in some way fractured the discipline we have shown toward reduced deficits.

It bothers me that some think that is the case. If I was not concerned about it I probably would not even speak. But I am convinced that there are many who do understand, those who recognize our drive for fiscal responsibility. I am convinced they understand this measure for what it is.

This bill has little relevancy to austerity or to meeting budgets or to bringing the deficit trend lines down. The problem is that our President—and this Senator has the utmost respect for him, and I have been on his team on almost every issue, and together we have worked out many difficult problems—has been led to believe that this bill is a budget buster, that somehow this will send a signal that we will not support him when he really needs our support, when it is important for the country.

So I want to make the point right up front. If the budget is busted by the upcoming continuing resolution, if individual appropriation bills that come down for fiscal 1983 do not meet that budget, this Senator will be here voting "no" for the President, and I will be here voting against overriding a veto if he vetoes them.

So I want to make that clear right up front. And I want to say for those who look at our budget for fiscal 1983 and note the progress we have made thus far with a tax bill, and with real restraint on entitlements: You do not have to have any fear that this Senator and, I believe, this institution, are going to indeed follow those actions with similar restraint on appropriations. I do not think that is the issue at all today. That has nothing whatsoever to do with the issue before us today on this bill.

This bill, H.R. 6863, provides $9.2 billion in budget authority and $7.5 billion in outlays for supplemental appropriations in fiscal 1982. The President in his request asked for new spending of $10.7 billion in budget authority and $8.9 billion in outlays. In short, this bill will reduce the deficit that may have occurred under the President's request by $1.4 billion. I think this is a critical point. This is a bill which, in fact, will produce a smaller deficit than the budget requested by the President.

Mr. President, this bill can be enacted and Federal spending for fiscal 1982 will still be below the ceilings of the congressional budget resolution by $8.1 billion in budget authority and $1.1 billion in outlays. So this is well within the limits Congress has set for itself.

I also would like to remind my colleagues that the vast bulk of the spending provided for in this bill fulfills the congressional commitment for pay raises granted last October to military and civilian public servants. This is a commitment Congress has made and should keep. In the bill before us, $6.1 billion in budget authority and $5.9 billion in outlays will be used for these commitments. Much of the rest will be used to keep vital agencies of Government functioning.

I ask unanimous consent that a summary chart setting forth these calculations be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

H.R. 6863, FISCAL YEAR 1982 SUPPLEMENTAL

Mr. DOMENICI. In the final analysis, the controversy over this measure is not a controversy over fiscal austerity. As I said before, this bill will yield smaller deficits than if Congress had merely approved the President's request. This controversy involves rather the relationship between the executive branch and the legislative on policy matters. Who shall have the final say on what I would call fine tuning of priorities among Federal programs?

My judgment is that such a question should not be answered, and will not be answered, on this measure. It is claimed by many that the question is whether we should add another $1.8 billion for defense in this measure and remove a little more than $585 million in certain domestic programs. To me the choice is not really that simple at all. Most of the defense money the President requested and that Congress did not include would not have spent out in fiscal 1982. Most of the money added for domestic programs will not spend out in fiscal 1982. The final level of spending in defense and nondefense for the next year has yet to be decided. It is not being decided here. It will be decided in subsequent fiscal 1983 appropriation bills or in a continuing resolution. This 1982 supplemental bill is not going to determine those levels.

As I said in my opening remarks, I intend to support the spending policies for fiscal 1983 that the first budget resolution calls for and which were endorsed by the President. These policies are clearly set out in the first budget resolution, and we will all understand, both the White House and Congress, when we exceed them.

Approval of the bill before us today in no way prejudices our ability to increase defense spending and hold down domestic spending in later years.

Some of the objections to the $585 million increase above the President for some programs may be justified. However, I believe we do need to maintain funding for the working elderly, which is about $211 million of the $585 million, and we should be sure of our ground before we excise funds for the handicapped and students, which are also part of this measure.

I would again repeat the final word on funding levels for these programs will be made later in the fiscal 1983 appropriation process. This measure will not, and I repeat will not, make these final decisions.

In conclusion, to clear away all the deadwood in this debate, I say simply that I cannot object to this measure on the levels of spending it contains. It is clearly within the targets we have set. It will produce a smaller deficit than the President's request would produce. And it is not the final word on defense or nondefense spending priorities.

In the final analysis I cannot justify disrupting vital operations of Government or failing to keep commitments we made to our military and civilian personnel because of a narrow dispute over a relatively small amount of money for several domestic programs, some of which even the President has conceded need to be funded.

Therefore, Mr. President, I will support the override.

Mr. MOYNIHAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, in the briefest comment I would like to congratulate my friend, the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, the Senator from New Mexico, for the courage he summoned to make what cannot have been an easy statement, given his exceptional and central record of support for the President's programs in this Chamber.

Mr. DOMENICI. May I thank the Senator from New York, Mr. President?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I appreciate that.

I would like to make one comment about the final observation the chairman made about the treatment of military personnel.

Mr. President, I would dare to suggest that from time immemorial the first principle of prudent government is to pay the army, and there is something unseemly about our present circumstances. We are paying the Armed Forces from the moneys we withheld from their pay for income tax purposes or social security. I have written the Comptroller General to ask what the authority for that is and to inquire about interest payments being lost by the social security trust funds because social security tax payments from the Defense Department are not arriving in the Treasury, where these moneys are put into Government securities and bear interest.

But much more important, Mr. President, there is a question of seemly and orderly government. Congress provided the funds to pay the armed services, and with almost casual indifference the President vetoes and says, "Pay it out of the money we have taken out of their paychecks."

What happens if we do not pass another bill? Why should we not simply go forward, as we had, with the business of government? If the administration does not understand it, surely we do. And a vote to override would allow us immediately to turn to serious matters which the chairman of the Appropriations Committee wants to bring to this floor. Thirteen appropriations bills, the last month of the year and not one passed.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. Who seeks time?

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from New Mexico, the chairman of the Budget Committee.

Mr. President, it is no great secret that I have been a consistent supporter of President Reagan's economic goals, helping him achieve both tax and budget cuts. I have, however, disagreed on occasion with the specifics of his program and the emphasis of where the budget ax must fall. It is for this reason I will vote to override the President's veto of an urgent supplemental appropriations bill that is, in fact, less than his original request.

I simply cannot agree with those who characterize this bill as a "budget buster" because it is $1.5 billion less than the President wanted. Of the total $14.2 billion appropriation called for in this bill, 85 percent is mandatory costs such as military pay and health and retirement benefits. This money simply must be appropriated to insure that the Federal Government meets its obligations.

Debate has centered around whether all of the remaining 15 percent should be funneled into new weapon systems and foreign aid or whether some portion should be allocated to social programs that have already experienced sharp budget cuts. As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee I am very familiar with both sides of this debate. Frankly, I do not believe that we can further reduce the funds targeted for worthwhile senior citizen and education programs without causing tremendous hardship on those who are less fortunate. If this veto is sustained, many elderly citizens in New Hampshire will find themselves without jobs come October. The elderly jobs program allows many of our senior citizens to continue a productive and independent lifestyle while enhancing the services available in our communities. I do not believe it fair to reward them for their dedication and many contributions by taking away their jobs.

Similarly, I do not believe it fair to restrict programs for the handicapped which enable the disadvantaged children to live normal and productive lives and save taxpayers millions of dollars in future welfare costs. In addition, we have already tightened the eligibility and drastically reduced the student aid programs. Additional reductions will prevent many bright and deserving young people from continuing their education.

On the other hand, we have, over the past 2 years, embarked upon a sustained modernization of our Armed Forces and significantly increased defense spending to respond to a growing number of threats to our national security. I have supported funding for programs which I believe improve our Nation's defense posture at acceptable cost. I am not certain, however, that the Defense Department can efficiently absorb additional funding and embark on new projects without creating an environment for undue waste and mismanagement.

Finally, I would warn against interpreting this vote as an indication of the President's support in Congress. Given the fact that this bill is less than the President's original request and falls within the framework of his recovery program it will not inhibit our ability to reach his economic goals. Those of us who vote to override his veto do so simply because we happen to disagree with the administration's decision to further cut education and jobs programs in favor of sending more money to the Defense Department. I continue to be a strong backer of the President and he will be able to count on my future support.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will just take a minute or two. I wish to first commend the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and the others, particularly the Senator from Oregon, Senator HATFIELD. I think I found myself in agreement with the distinguished Senator from Oregon on nearly every occasion this year.

I do not suggest that we are busting the budget, but I do not want to bust the President, either. The President was in the State of Kansas yesterday. We were flying in a helicopter between Manhattan and Topeka. I do not suggest the door was open or anything like that, but the President wanted to know if I wanted to help him on this bill. [Laughter.] And I thought about it and I figured I would.

So I wanted to make that statement because I really believe, and I say this having been there and having witnessed the outstanding or tremendous ovation the President received from about 15,000 or 16,000 college students and others in the State of Kansas from both parties when he talked about leadership and when he discussed the need to curtail Federal spending, when he discussed the need to curtail the growth of government, when he discussed the need of such things as school prayer and other things. I must confess, I was maybe not surprised but certainly encouraged by the support the President had.

I cannot quarrel with the chairman of the Budget Committee or the chairman of the Appropriations Committee because I am not an expert in these matters. It may not bust the budget. It may, in fact, be below the budget. But it does, I think, put, again, the question of who is providing the leadership.

I do not suggest the President ought to dictate to the Congress, dictate to any committee, or dictate to any Senator. But right now we are on the verge, I believe, of coming out of a recession. We are on the threshold of recovery. And, whether we like it or not, perception means a great deal. And there is a perception in this land right now that things are getting better. There is a perception in this land right now that we have a real strong, firm leader in the White House. And I think I can say for the thousands of young men and women who were in the audience yesterday at Kansas State University that they believe that this President is providing that leadership.

I suggest that we will boil it down however we want. I know there are strong feelings and I know that those who toiled with this effort may disagree. But President Reagan has a great reservoir of strength in America. In my view, this would not seriously undercut that leadership by it would at least cause a pause and people might wonder if, in fact, the President had been weakened.

Having seen what the perception does in certain areas and having been with the President yesterday and having heard him make very strong statements about the economy, I can only say to my colleagues on both sides of the aisle: Do not underestimate the strength of President Reagan. The strength is there. It is with Democrats, with Republicans, with Independents, with young people, with college students, and with people all across this land. He has indicated that we should sustain the veto and that is what I hope we can do.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, I will cast my vote today to override the President's veto of the supplemental appropriations bill. I do so because it contains essential and necessary elements for the well-being of this country. In agreement with me is Governor Allen I. Olson, Governor of the State of North Dakota. I ask unanimous consent that a telegram I received from him today be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TELEGRAM FROM HON. ALLEN I. OLSON, GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA, TO HON. QUENTIN N. BURDICK, U.S. SENATOR FROM NORTH DAKOTA

As you know, I strongly support President Reagan's efforts to balance the budget and reduce federal spending. However, the supplemental appropriations act contains funding for a number of items which are extremely important to North Dakota including employment of older Americans, low-income student loans, mineral leasing audits, funding for general and recreational roads and bridges in North Dakota.

While I support the concept of fiscal restraint embodied in the President's veto, I urge that you vote to sustain the legislation and override the veto as being in the best interest of North Dakota under the circumstances.

I believe the situation we find ourselves in with this budget and the President's veto underscores the need for serious consideration of giving line item veto power to the President. Neither you nor the President should be faced with the "all or nothing" decisions on vital budget issues.

Sincerely,

ALLEN I. OLSON,
Governor of North Dakota.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I want to urge my colleagues to vote to override the President's veto of the supplemental appropriation bill for fiscal year 1982.

The President has called this bill a budget buster. This is a catchy phrase which the President has used repeatedly over the past 18 months to characterize legislation which he finds objectionable. The problem in this case, however, is that the phrase just does not match up with the facts.

Let us take a minute to look at the actual numbers. The President proposed $16.3 billion in new spending for fiscal year 1982. The Congress approved $14.6 billion. In other words, Congress voted to spend $1.7 billion less than the President requested. It is true that we are only 2 years away from 1984, but that is not enough of a reason for the administration to engage in blatant doublespeak that less is more. Alliteration may be fine for slogans, but it is not an adequate replacement for the plain and simple facts.

The controversy about this supplemental appropriation bill is not really, then, about busting the budget. It is about priorities. It is about spending $210 million more for community service employment for older Americans when the administration asked to spend nothing more. It is about spending $217 million more for financial assistance to college students when the administration sought to spend nothing more. It is about adding $6 million for child immunization to make up for earlier Federal cuts and a 12-percent increase in the cost of some vaccines when the administration is willing to risk having the immunization program's effectiveness reduced. It is about spending $26.5 million more for education for the handicapped when the administration sought to spend nothing more.

And it is about spending $1.9 billion less than the administration requested for military spending. In reviewing the President's military spending requests, the Appropriations Committee found that they were a departure from normal practices involving new starts and program shifts that did not meet the criteria for supplemental funding.

In vetoing the bill, the President has, thus, put the wish list of the Pentagon ahead of the needs of average Americans. It is just another example of the administration's blind side when it comes to reviewing what the Pentagon wants to spend. The least we can ask from an administration which is so determined to choose guns over butter is that the President take a moment to look for military fat. Last year, David Stockman testified that "There is so much waste in the Defense Department it has taken us longer to figure out." Well, we are still waiting. The President's insistence that the supplemental appropriation bill is a budget buster and his refusal to recognize the budgetary impact of the military spending cuts suggest that unless he is sent a message, we will be waiting for a long time to come. I believe that it is essential for the Congress to override his veto as one way of sending that message.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the supplemental appropriations bill that is before us today is a responsible piece of legislation that should have been signed into law. Members of Congress from both parties recognized this when the bill passed the House by a 5-to-1 margin and passed the Senate with no dissenting votes.

Why would the President veto a bill that received substantial support in the Congress? In his veto message, the President explained that the veto was necessary to keep the deficits down. Yet, a comparison of the President's initial request and the supplemental passed by the Congress shows that the Congress was more fiscally responsible than the President. This bill appropriates $1.4 billion less than the President requested for fiscal year 1982. Furthermore, according to the Congressional Budget Office, the bill is $3.2 billion under the spending ceiling set by the Congress last spring.

The President's misleading description of this bill does nothing to enhance the public's understanding of the issues involved. His attempt to gain political advantage by criticizing a bill that comes in under both his and the Congress budgets only undermines efforts to forge a bipartisan consensus to deal with economic problems.

The real reason for the President's veto is not the overall level of spending but the mix of spending on domestic and defense spending. The supplemental bill reduced the President's defense request by nearly $2 billion and increased funds for domestic programs by $600 million. Even this increase in domestic spending does not do damage to the fiscal year 1982 budget deficit, because the outlays resulting from these appropriations are actually lower than the President requested for domestic programs.

This tradeoff, slightly more for domestic programs and a smaller increase in defense, is very reasonable. The $2 billion reduction from the President's request still leaves us with a $30 billion increase over 1981. This reduction in the rate of increase in defense spending is a modest one, particularly in view of the higher domestic funding that it allows.

I am particularly disappointed with the President's opposition to the $210 million contained in the bill for the senior community service employment program. This funding would continue the 54,200 part-time jobs currently in effect for low-income persons aged 55 and over. Of this total, some 340 positions are in my State of Maine. The jobs under this program not only result in the delivery of direct services to other senior citizens, but they provide an opportunity for the elderly to have meaningful work and most importantly, a source of income. If that income is denied, many of these senior workers will be forced to go on welfare, a result which is surely as undesirable as it is unfair.

Just 2 days ago, I met in Lewiston, Maine, with a group of senior citizens who will be severely affected if this veto is not overridden. One of them is an example of human fortitude. Rita Roy is 59. She is blind and partially disabled, but she is intelligent and alert. She does not qualify for social security, and was ineligible or otherwise unable to get funding from other assistance programs. She did not want to go on welfare. The senior community service employment program gave her a job in April 1980. Her only income is the $67 a week she earns from working 20 hours a week, at the minimum wage, from that job. Although the pay is not high, it has given her a sense of fulfillment, pride and dignity in earning her own way.

and she gets by on her $67 a week income. Now that job is in jeopardy. If it is abolished she will have no alternative but to apply for welfare. There will be no savings of public funds, and our society, as well as Rita Roy, will be the losers as a result.

The supplemental appropriations bill also contains funding for several important education programs. First, it has $148 million for disadvantaged students. This amount would be awarded to local school districts as supplemental grants under chapter I of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981 in order to prevent them from a partial loss of their allocation close to the start of the school year. There is also $26.5 million for three categorical programs aiding in the education of handicapped children. Finally, there is additional money for the Pell grant program and the supplemental educational opportunity grant program, two worthwhile programs providing financial aid to college students. The spending in the education category can make the difference for needy students who cannot meet the full cost of attending college and for the disadvantaged and handicapped who need a helping hand in obtaining a proper education.

The legislation further includes $112 million for grants to the States for medicaid payments. It is essential to point out that this amount is substantally below the administration's initial request of $552 million, a figure later reduced to $342 million.

The purpose of this extra funding is to pay outstanding medicaid claims for prior years. While the Appropriations Committees will deal with the issue again in connection with the 1982 appropriations bill, this additional amount will nonetheless make a contribution to elimination of the backlog of claims which currently exist under the medicaid program.

The supplemental appropriations bill also contains funds vitally needed by our Coast Guard. Without the $114 million which the vetoed bill contained for the service, there is the real possibility that the Coast Guard's 5,000 civilian employees may have to be furloughed later this month and that military personnel may be forced to work without pay.

There will be other serious ramifications for the Coast Guard. Day to day operations will have to be curtailed. Operations relating to law enforcement, military readiness, and aids to navigation will have to be reduced. In addition, there is likely to be a delay in signing important and necessary procurement contracts.

The bill retains $150 million in loan guarantees under the Economic Development Administration, to carry out the intent of Congress that the program be fully implemented. The administration sought to limit EDA's loan guarantee program to $45 million this year, despite a $150 million authorization by Congress and worsening economic conditions that make the need for the program even greater.

The confrontation sought by the President on this bill reflects a rigid adherence to budget priorities that are not in the best interests of the nation.

This, combined with the misleading characterization of the supplemental bill, will only create more difficulties in constructing bipartisan solutions to our budget problems. I urge my colleagues to vote to override the Presidents' veto of this worthwhile bill.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, when I received word that the President had vetoed the supplemental appropriations bill, I took a copy of that bill and went back over it, line by line. That kind of review is the surest way to dispel any suggestion that this bill is a budget buster. It is a fair and reasonable bill, and I intend to vote to override the veto this afternoon.

I have cast some tough votes over the past 2 years to sustain the President's vetoes when Congress approved legislation that did violate budget ceilings. But we are not dealing with that kind of legislation today. This bill is well within the budget. In fact, it is a whopping $1.8 billion below the President's own spending request. Equally important, the Senate was able to achieve these savings and still provide supplemental funding to some very important programs. It accomplished that feat by making a fair trade-off between demands for higher defense spending and the legitimate needs of other programs that have a more immediate impact on human needs.

The bill provides $2.1 billion less than the President requested for defense—less than a 1-percent reduction in military spending. At the same time, it provides approximately $900 million more than he requested for a variety of social programs, including education for the handicapped, the Older Americans Act, and student financial assistance. The net savings—in the order of $1.8 billion—will go to lower the Federal deficit, and put more downward pressure on interest rates.

It cannot be fairly argued that this fails to meet legitimate defense needs. Even with these minimal reductions, the 1982 defense budget will be the highest in peacetime history. Providing the kind of additional funding sought by the President through a 1982 supplemental appropriation would require the Senate to exceed budget limits for defense, something we simply cannot do. If necessary, many of these same defense programs can receive additional funding under the fiscal year 1983 continuing resolution, which will be before the Senate in just a few weeks. This short delay is a small price to pay for maintaining the integrity of the congressional budget process.

If, on the other hand, the Senate sustains the President's veto, some very important programs are likely to lose some or all of their supplemental funding. For example:

The community service employment program in the Older Americans Act stands to lose up to $211 million. This could mean the loss of more than 1,000 jobs in Minnesota alone through elimination of successful programs like Green Thumb.

Student financial assistance programs (Pell grants and SEOG's) stand to lose $217 million.

In education funding, $26 million for the handicapped will be subject to elimination.

In funding for interstate highways, $112.5 million would also be threatened; a sum that includes more than $10 million in funding for long-delayed highway projects in Minneapolis, St. Paul, and Duluth, Minn.

There are, of course, many more examples.

I would be the first Senator to take the floor in defense of the President's position if this bill did exceed budget ceilings. But the simple fact is that it does not. It represents a rare opportunity to save about $1.8 billion above and beyond the President's original request. The real issue here is not whether we should exceed budget limits, but whether we should force the defense budget to bear a fair share of the burden necessary to cut back a Federal deficit well in excess of $100 billion. And as strongly as I support the President's effort to improve the quality of our defense capability, I think we all need to recognize the reality that we will never be able to gain control of Federal spending until all aspects of the budget, including military spending, carry a fair share of the burden.

The trade-off made in the bill between dollars for defense and dollars for human needs is a sound trade-off. And whether we approve or disapprove of that trade-off is the real issue posed by the override vote.

This is the first time I have ever broken with the administration on a veto involving spending legislation. But I believe there are compelling reasons to override this veto, and I urge all of my colleagues to join in that effort.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise in support of an override of the President's veto of H.R. 6863, the fiscal year 1982 supplemental appropriations bill. It was my sincerest hope that the President would heed the advice of those in Congress and those within his inner circle of advisers who urged him to sign this appropriations measure; however, such was not the case.

I do not take this position in support of an override lightly, but rather, my stand results from a thorough review of the facts of the situation. As one committed to the President's program of reducing Federal deficits and lowering interest rates, I firmly believe that this bill represents a sound balance of prudent fiscal management with the true needs of the people in this Nation.

The fact is that the President had requested $15.6 billion in spending in this supplemental appropriations bill. I and my colleagues on the Senate and House Appropriations Committees worked many hours in an effort to develop a bill. The result was a measure which contains $14.2 billion in spending. Consequently, this bill is not a budget buster, but rather comes under that level requested by the President by some $1.4 billion. It is therefore precisely because I am committed to the President's program of fiscal economy that I am supporting the override of this veto.

More importantly, however, this bill recognizes that it is the province of the Congress to set the priorities within the given budget ceilings. This supplemental appropriations bill contains funding for programs which are essential to the students, older Americans, and handicapped of this Nation as well as necessary moneys which will improve the badly deteriorating infrastructure of this country. The Congress simply cannot allow these people programs to suffer because of this veto.

All across the Nation, students are returning to the classrooms this week. The action we take today could very well make the difference for thousands of students who hope to attend both independent and public colleges and universities. In my own State of New York, 130,000 students depend upon Pell grants, and more than 44,000 students receive supplemental educational opportunity grant aid. This bill contains $217 for these two programs which assist families in meeting the rising costs of tuition.

Just this week, the University of Wisconsin concluded in a study that Federal aid is indeed directed at needy students, and that without such aid students would not be able to attend school. Moreover, an editorial in yesterday's New York Times reports a disturbing fact; that is, the percentage of students from poor and middle-class families is falling at private independent colleges and universities. The funds in this measure will help prevent the exacerbation of this caste system in education.

In the area of elementary education, we have provided $148 million for title I of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act. Many States, including New York State, have been shortchanged because of the Secretary of Education's use of the 1970 rather than the 1980 census in distributing title I funds. As any colleagues know, title I is a program which assists local school districts educate the economically disadvantaged. It is a program which has proven to work. My own State of New York has experienced a 22-percent increase in the number of poverty-level children from 1970 to 1980 and therefore stands to loose $31 million from the use of the 1970 census. The funding which we have placed in the supplemental will help restore to States the title I funding which they truly need and deserve.

The supplemental appropriations bill contains $210.6 million for title V of the Older American Act. Over 54,000 older Americans are gainfully employed by this program which has been reauthorized by the Congress for an additional 3 years and which has the overwhelming support of this body. The many State offices for the aging and national contractor organizations which operate the title V programs have already begun to send closedown notices to individuals employed under this program, and quite frankly, these older Americans are frightened. They are frightened that they will lose their productive employment and be forced onto the welfare rolls. We in the Congress cannot allow this to happen.

There are other important programs which are included in this bill such as funding for the handicapped. In addition to over $26 million for programs under the Education for All Handicapped Children Act, some $9 million is included for the special institutions which serve the deaf, hearing impaired, and the blind. As an advisory board member of the National Technical Institute for the Deaf in Rochester, N.Y., I can unequivocally state that the funds in this measure for NTID and the other special institutions are dollars well spent. Our economy realizes a return of $11 for every $1 spent in the rehabilitation of the average graduate from NTID. Upon retirement the average graduate will have repaid the Federal Government over 400 percent of the cost of his education and will have saved the Government over 300 percent more by not being on welfare. These funds are crucial if these institutions are to meet the challenges of the future.

Mr. President, for all of these reasons, I will vote to override the veto and urge my colleagues to do the same.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, last month, I supported the conference report on H.R. 6863. As I said at that time, I believe we are making progress at holding down spending and for that reason I supported the bill. It was the best we could do at that time and get passage in both Houses of Congress.

Now that the bill has been vetoed, I feel we have an opportunity to further restrain spending. By voting to sustain the President's veto we can come forth with another bill saving the taxpayers of this country several more hundreds of millions of dollars.

This is consistent with my philosophy that we should never pass up an opportunity to cut the growth in Government or to lift the burden of taxation from out citizens. The President's veto gives us that fresh opportunity. I believe with a little more work we can come up with an even better piece of legislation.

Certainly there are many fine programs with money at stake in this bill. It is unfortunate that they are hostages to the fate of this bill. I support many of these programs and will work to see that they continue to receive funding in the appropriations bill that will be drafted after we sustain the President's veto.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the issue before the Senate today is whether or not to override the President's veto of H.R. 6863, the supplemental appropriations bill. It is clear what the President wants us to do. I watched him comment on the House override of his veto on one of the network television news shows. The essence of his comment was that "the big spenders won."

I have an enormous amount of respect for the President, but I have to confess that his comment leaves me somewhat confused. I can only conclude that his definition of big spender is somewhat different than mine.

Congress passed a bill that is $1.8 billion below what the President requested. I voted for that bill. I continue to support it. I do not understand, however, how voting for less spending than the President requests makes me and the rest of the Senators and Representatives that support the bill "big spenders."

The bill is clearly not a budget buster. Even using OMB figures, the bill is at least $1.4 billion below the President's request, and it is within the guidelines of the budget resolution that Congress approved last year.

As I see it, the issue is not "big spending." Rather, it is what programs should funds be spent for, and who should decide how they are spent.

The President wants to spend about $2.1 billion more for defense than provided in this bill, and he wants to spend about $900 million less for domestic programs than Congress included. The President also wants to spend more for foreign aid and certain other programs than is in the supplemental appropriations bill.

Let me make it clear at the outset that I support a strong national defense. I have voted for increases in military spending. I believe that increases are necessary. However, the extra money the President wants is mostly for housekeeping items, and for beginning early spending on weapons programs planned for next year.

But, let us look at some nondefense programs. Without the funds included in this bill, over 55,000 jobs for the elderly will be lost—elderly people in this country who would otherwise probably be on welfare. Without the funds provided in this bill, several hundred thousand young Americans will not be able to begin college this year. Without the funds provided in this bill, education for the handicapped and unemployment programs will be hurt.

Mr. President, I believe we must reduce Federal spending if we are ever to begin to control the deficits that are crippling our economy. I have supported, and will continue to support, appropriate measures to reduce spending on domestic programs. I believe the necessary sacrifices must be shared, however.

The current deep recession has left the social safety net in shreds, and I am very disappointed to see the President resisting the very modest efforts of the Congress to try to repair some of the damage.

Sound programs are funded in this bill without busting the budget. Providing funds for these few domestic programs will not hurt the Defense budget. National security will not be jeopardized. Not one plane, not one tank, will be lost.

I regret that the President's veto had to come to us in this form. Because the President's only choice was to either veto the entire bill or to sign it, payrolls at the Defense Department and a number of other agencies have been jeopardized. Programs not in controversy have had their funding interrupted. This situation again points out the need for a Presidential item veto power. It has worked in the States and will work at the Federal level. I have introduced a constitutional amendment to give the President item veto authority, and the veto battles we have fought this year eloquently attest to the need for the amendment.

Mr. President, I want to conclude by noting that Congress has given the President almost everything he has asked for. Our Constitution, however, gives the power of the purse to the Congress. Senators and Representatives are elected to exercise their judgment, not merely to rubberstamp every Presidential proposal.

I urge my colleagues, therefore, to exercise that judgment. This bill was strongly supported when it was first considered on the Senate floor and deserves continued support. It is not a budget buster; it is $1.8 billion below the President's request. I hope the Senate, therefore, will join the House and override the veto.

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, it is time that we recognize that the President's position on this supplemental appropriations bill is, at best, misguided. This bill is not a budget buster, as the President calls it. This is a disagreement about priorities between the President and the Congress. The President wants more spending for defense, and he wants to cut other Federal activities to pay for it. This bill cuts defense spending about $1 billion below the President's request, and I believe that this is the reason for his veto.

That must be the reason because, as I said, this bill is not a budget buster. It is below the President's own requested appropriation level. It is well within our own congressional budget. It is not a bill to fund new or unnecessary Federal programs. It is a responsible bill to continue the vital functions of government. Its passage is necessary just to meet our payroll.

Let us look at some numbers for a minute.

If this bill is passed, there will still be $1.3 billion in spending authority left under the congressional budget. And this is the tightest Federal budget this country has ever seen.

This bill actually cuts the President's requested spending by $1.4 billion. He asked for spending totaling $8.9 billion—but in this bill Congress would provide only $7.5 billion.

The President often talks about the need to cut domestic spending—and this bill cuts domestic spending by $400 million below the President's request. And it does so without harm to services for older Americans or the disadvantaged and handicapped.

Mr. President, in this bill the Congress has cut the President's request for spending for domestic programs by $400 million. It has cut his request for defense and foreign affairs by almost $1.1 billion. Yet the President calls this a budget buster.

I intend to vote to override this veto in order to keep essential Government functions operating, as well as to save money.●

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise to urge our colleagues to join the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Senator HATFIELD, in voting to override the President's veto of the Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1982.

The President vetoed this bill because the mix between social and defense programs was unacceptable. That he called it a "budget buster" is an insult to the intelligence of the American people. This bill is $1.7 billion "below" the budget request. It is well within the budget resolutions. It is "not" a "budget buster."

It is the aged, the disadvantaged youth, the handicapped, and the college students who will benefit from the excess which the President has accused us of exercising.

The President exercised his constitutional authority in returning the bill to Congress without his signature. Let us now cast a vote for the weak and underprivileged. Let us stand up and exercise our constitutional prerogative and vote to override that veto.●

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today to support the veto override of H.R. 6863, the 1982 supplemental appropriations bill.

I commend the House of Representatives for their veto override yesterday, and I hope that my colleagues will follow suit here today.

If we do not override the veto of H.R. 6863, we will be turning our backs on the elderly, the students, the handicapped, the farmers, and the men and women or our country who serve in our Armed Forces.

If H.R. 6863 does not pass, 54,000 elderly Americans will no longer be able to participate in the title V senior employment program. Eleven hundred Tennesseans now participating in this program will be denied their minimum wage jobs in helping out with home health, day care, meals on wheels, and other community service programs.

And the human impact of these funding reductions will be incalculable.

Take the case of Jamie Roberts, for example, in Covington, Tenn.

Jamie Roberts makes $250 a month, her only income, by driving a community van for the title V program so that the elderly of Tipton County can get into town to buy their groceries and medicine. She also helps deliver daily meals to the elderly confined at home.

Now what is going to happen in Tipton County if funding for the title V program is discontinued?

Well, first of all Jamie Roberts will be thrown out of a productive job. She will be denied the opportunity to help out the the elderly of Tipton County. She will be thrown on the unemployment lines and at age 60 she is unlikely to get another job. And she will suffer an income loss of $63 a month.

Just imagine that. The Federal Government cannot afford $63 a month to have Jamie Roberts help her fellow citizens in Tipton County live a better life.

And do you know what else will happen? Well, many of the elderly people that Jamie Roberts serves in her title V van will have to be institutionalized. They will not be able to live in the security and comfort of their own homes, knowing that Jamie Roberts can help bring them meals or help them get into town to get their prescriptions. And when these elderly individuals are institutionalized, Tipton County taxes are going to go up by one-half million dollars.

Now that is a false economy if I have ever seen one.

And when Jamie Roberts loses her title V job, she will not be the only one. Eleven hundred other Tennesseans will also lose their jobs. The quality of life all over Tennessee will suffer when these good and caring individuals are thrown on to the State's already growing unemployment lines.

But the elderly are not the only ones who will suffer if we do not override the veto of H.R. 6863.

Without the $217 million contained in this supplemental appropriations bill, more than 1 million students will have their Pell grants reduced, and 128,000 students nationwide will be unable to receive supplemental educational opportunity grants.

In Tennessee, this means that about 30,000 young Tennesseans will suffer immediate reductions in their Pell grants. And 2,100 Tennesseans would lose the opportunity to receive supplemental educational opportunity grants.

At a time when we need good education for our younger generation to help rebuild America, we see an administration saying that we can not afford the investment. Another false economy, my friends.

And many, many others in Tennessee and the Nation will be severely hurt if the veto of H.R. 6863 is not overriden.

Farmers are going to wonder when we are going to get around to appropriating the $5 billion for the Commodity Credit Corporation in order to fund much-needed farm price supports.

Our military personnel will wonder when we are going to fund the 14 percent pay raise that the Congress authorized last year. Without timely enactment of H.R. 6863, our military personnel will see the value of their service to this country diminished by the administration's political stance on this measure.

And finally I would point out that a vote to override the veto of H.R. 6863 will, indeed, be a vote for fiscal austerity since the administration's original supplemental funding request was about $2 billion more than the funds now appropriated by H.R. 6863.

These are all good and sufficient reasons to vote to override the veto of H.R. 6863.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise to urge my colleagues to vote to pass the supplemental appropriations bill, over the veto of the President.

Mr. President, not long ago, we voted by a substantial majority to approve the same bill now under consideration, believing that it is a fair and balanced piece of legislation which appropriates money for essential domestic and military programs. It is still a fair and balanced compromised bill which should clearly be enacted into law.

The President vetoed the bill claiming that it was a budget-buster. The fact-of-the-matter is that the bill appropriates $1.9 billion less than was requested by the President. It appears that the President vetoed the bill because it appropriates $2 billion less for defense, and $918 million more for education and social programs than was requested by him.

In essence, the President is defying the clear wishes of Congress and demanding that Congress defer to his spending priorities, which continually seek massive increases in defense spending at the expense of education and social programs.

Mr. President, the vetoed supplemental appropriations bill includes funding for worthy domestic programs which merit the support not only of the Congress but of the President himself. The bill appropriates $211 million for community service employment for older Americans, $217 million for financial aid to low-income college students, $148 million for grants to local schools to help educate disadvantaged students, and approximately $20 million for advances to the unemployment trust fund to provide funds for unemployment compensation benefits recently authorized by Congress in the tax bill.

Mr. President, let us here in this august body follow the lead of the House, and notify President Reagan that we will not put up with a politically motivated veto when the orderly operation of the Federal Government is at stake and when critical domestic programs are being sacrificed. We must send a clear message to the White House that we do not intend to relinquish our constitutional responsibility with respect to the formulation of national policies which will affect the direction of the economy and the lives of millions of Americans.

I am voting to override the President's veto, and urge my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle to do likewise, and thus reaffirm the integrity of Congress as an independent branch of our Government.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I am joining many of my colleagues in voting to override the President's veto of this supplemental appropriations bill.

I, like others in this Chamber, feel it is ridiculous to call this bill a "budget-buster" when this bill is actually almost $2 billion below the supplemental request made by the President. The President's problem with this bill is that it provides more funds for domestic programs than the President requested.

Mr. President, it is clear that the President, with this veto, attempts to continue his efforts to shift our national spending priorities away from vital domestic programs into a massive and unprecedented peacetime military buildup. This important measure contains needed funds for community services employment for older Americans, funding for the medicaid programs which provides essential health care for low-income Americans, vital funding for education programs including money for disadvantaged and handicapped students as well as low-income college students. In addition, this bill contains funds for States to administer the Federal supplemental benefit (FSB) program providing additional unemployment compensation for individuals unable to find work which is so critical to my State of Michigan.

I urge all of my colleagues to join me in voting to override the President's veto.

●Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I support the override of the veto of this supplemental spending bill for a variety of reasons. First, I must point out that although the President vetoed this supplemental bill, he realizes the importance of passage of supplemental legislation. In fact, it became increasingly clear over the last couple of weeks that there was broad agreement in the House, the Senate, and the White House that certain programs had to be funded in order to maintain continuity and to avoid unnecessary hardship and management crisis.

I, of course, remain concerned about the need for stringent budgetary restrictions. The economy demands it. And in reflecting upon those concerns, I weighed the consequences of sustaining the veto and the possible impact it might have on the Nation and the State of Iowa. It was my judgment that the nature of the supplemental bill gave little justification to placing these spending measures in jeopardy, particularly when the total amount was $1.4 billion below what the President himself requested, and since the total was well within the budget targets set in the first budget resolution. Furthermore, the House will not be back in session until next Wednesday which would leave an insufficient amount of time for the Congress to act in time to avoid unnecessary confusion.

Mr. President, there is a more fundamental reason why I support this supplemental bill at this time. I have long been concerned about sending the right signals to the public that we in Congress are embarked on a steady and consistent course. It has become evident within the past few weeks that this Congress, with the support of the White House, has taken the necessary steps to get budget deficits under control. The Congress and the White House came to an agreement on a budget resolution and a tax bill which set the economy in a direction of recovery. That budget resolution contained supplemental funding in excess of the amount in this bill.

I cannot, then, see what good would come from holding up this bill when the resulting confusion would cause precisely the opposite of what we are trying to accomplish here. On the basis of minute differences on this bill, we would be in danger of once again sending the wrong signals to the Nation's markets, that Congress and the White House cannot act in concert. What the markets need to know right now is that a unified Federal Government in Washington is moving in a constant, determined direction. Without that assurance, markets will simply mirror our lack of determination, and economic recovery will be delayed.●

SENIOR COMMUNITY SERVICE EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, there are many reasons to override the President's veto of this supplemental appropriations measure. I want to stress just one of the many. Failure to override would mean the termination of the older Americans' senior community service employment program—a result which will be disastrous for millions of older Americans for whom this program means the difference between self-sufficiency and destitution.

The President's veto means that 55,000 low-income elderly workers will lose their jobs and many of them will be thrown onto the welfare rolls. The impact of this veto, however, goes far beyond those who hold these part-time jobs. Over half of the senior aides participating in the program are providing services to less-able-bodied elderly individuals. These senior workers provide the backbone of programs providing nutrition, health, and other services to home-bound elderly individuals. Without these services, many of older Americans would be forced to leave their homes and their communities and move into institutional care.

Mr. President, terminating this program is absolutely senseless. It is far better to provide work opportunities that allow low-income older Americans to remain self-sufficient and contributing members of their communities, rather than force them into welfare dependency. This is an effective, cost-savings program.

EDUCATIONAL PROGRAMS

The educational programs contained in the supplemental appropriations bill are equally critical.

The Congress worked long and hard, Mr. President, to maintain its faith with the vast majority of Americans who want sound educational programs, elementary through postsecondary. This bill provides, I believe, the absolute minimum required to keep disadvantaged and handicapped education programs, and Pell grant college assistance programs from deteriorating further.

Mr. President, the educational future of well over 1 million Americans as well as the well-being of millions of older Americans rides on what the Senate does here today.

Let us not break faith with the young and the old.

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I will vote to override the President's veto of H.R. 6863, the supplemental appropriations bill, and I urge my colleagues to do likewise.

H.R. 6863 is a fiscally responsible effort to adjust funding for vital Government functions.

In fact, it is $1.8 billion less than the President requested. In this legislation Congress has reduced supplemental spending by more than 10 percent below the administration's request.

The issue does not center on the amount of Government spending or "budget busting." To say that it does works violence on the facts. It is rather a question of priorities.

As the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee said yesterday: The question is not "how much." It is "what for." The issue is do we need more for military hardware and foreign aid or more for the needs of the American people. Congress has made it clear that it believes the latter. I concur.

The fact is that almost every Member of Congress who has supported this bill has done so in the spirit of compromise. There are items in this bill that each of us would prefer be left out. There are items in this bill that each of us would prefer be expanded. But the legislation before us best approaches our reasonable collective judgment on the country's immediate needs.

The veto message says that the bill provides an unacceptable total of $918 million in domestic spending and yet falls more than $2 billion short of that required for defense supplementals.

Let us put that in context. We have already appropriated $200 billion for defense this year and the Department of Defense will have an estimated unexpended balance of $142 billion at the end of this year. Reducing the President's request by $2 billion for defense will merely reduce that unexpended balance by less than 2 percent. Even the President's own budgetary champion, OMB Director David Stockman, concedes that there is 10 times that much waste lurking in the corridors of the Pentagon.

In contrast, the domestic programs included in this bill are those that have suffered deep cuts. Supplemental funding will not reinstate full funding but it will allow these programs to continue to assist individual Americans and their families for the remainder of the year.

A vote to override will, for example, preserve funding for community service employment for older Americans. Authorized under title V of the Older Americans Act, this program has singlehandedly improved the lives and economic welfare of thousands of senior citizens throughout the country by providing them with part-time community service jobs. Such jobs range from assisting the teachers of handicapped youngsters to counseling fellow senior citizens on tax matters. As a result of title V, social, health, welfare, and educational services in communities across the Nation have been dramatically upgraded.

In addition to being one of our most successful programs, title V has proven itself to be one of our most efficient. Very little money is spent on administrative costs. Moreover, title V employees have earned the reputation of being some of the most conscientious and productive workers around. Employers have nothing but the highest praise for their title V employees.

In short, Mr. President, this country cannot afford to lose this superb program. Appropriating the funding for title V is a vote for the needs of senior employees and the communities they so well serve.

It is also essential that we assure the $10 million appropriation for mental health research contained in this bill. That money will preserve long-term studies to help us find new ways to detect and treat millions of Americans suffering from mental illnesses. Some of this money will be spent on studies of specific areas of the brain which do not function properly in cases of mental illness, in the hopes of correcting such malfunctions some day. Studies of ways to combine treatments which take both environmental and biological factors into account will also be funded by this appropriation. Furthermore, studies of mental health problems affecting children will likewise be continued under this bill. Such research is too important to neglect.

A vote to override will also make the difference for almost 3 million college students who want to obtain the skills and training they and their communities need.

The bill contains $217 million for student financial assistance. That amount, which the President objects to, is less that 2 percent of the bill as a whole. And yet almost 3 million of America's neediest college students will receive the awards they have been anticipating and need to further their education.

The $140 million for Pell grants in this bill will go overwhelmingly to students from disadvantaged families, 47 percent of those students receiving Pell awards are from families whose incomes are below $12,000 per year. Because the Pell program was cut this year, those with greatest eligibility are being affected.

The reason is that the Department of Education uses a two-stage process when forced to reduce Pell awards. In the first step, they "hold harmless" the poorest students and cut those somewhat better off. In the second stage, they cut all Pell awards. Without the funding in this supplemental, stage two of the cuts will take effect. The very neediest students are those who will suffer.

The remaining funds for student financial assistance will go to the supplemental educational opportunity grants program. Those funds were included by an amendment I introduced on the Senate floor and which the Senate adopted without dissent. That amendment also provides aid for the very neediest students. This year the SEOG program was cut 25 percent. Students at schools with large numbers of disadvantaged classmates are suffering greater cuts because a 25 percent loss means a loss of "fair-share" money those students received in the past. The program holds harmless the 1979 allotments for each school and then distributes additional funds to schools and students where the need is greatest. Again, the hold-harmless level was not met and schools did not receive even the minimum they had believed they could expect. Poorer schools lost that guarantee and the extra boost we had given them in the past. Some of these schools, with many disadvantaged young people, sustained cuts of 60 percent, or even 70 percent.

The funding in the bill for these students does not restore that fair-share money, nor reinstate last year's funding levels. But it does allow the statutory guarantee to be met. It allows students to receive what they were promised by law 2 years ago and an estimated 150,000 will be able to stay in school as a result of the $77 million for this item.

In addition, the veto message objects to $148 million for chapter I of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act, formerly title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. That $148 million is a one-time appropriation to allow school districts to have some idea what funds will be available for compensatory education for disadvantaged children.

A dispute over the estimated number of poor children in each district has tied up services for those children. The Department of Education and several States are locked in a court fight over whether to use 1970 or 1980 census data in allocating title I funds. The $148 million in this bill would allow the program to continue on its course without waiting for a final outcome of this dispute. The $148 million—0.1 percent of a $14.6 billion bill—would allow optimal census data to be used on a county basis, school districts to plan services for the year, and children to receive those services uninterrupted and unabated by Federal district court battles.

These programs are not wasteful. They are investments in the strength, knowledge, and future of our young people. They mean improving the skills and knowledge of those children and students whose skills and knowledge we shall all need in the coming years. To place these programs at jeopardy because of the small percentage of funding they represent, and yet chastise us for including only half a billion for defense, is a gross distortion of reality and national priorities.

In summary, Mr. President, Congress has acted reasonably and responsibly in fashioning this supplemental appropriations legislation. We have managed to reduce spending vis-a-vis the President's request without sacrificing vital services that are essential to the well-being of this Nation. Overriding this veto in not a partisan move. It is a requirement of the national interest.●

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I rise to urge my colleagues to vote in favor of overriding the President's veto of this appropriations bill. It has already been pointed out that, contrary to what the President has stated, this bill does not bust the budget. It is, in fact $1.4 billion below the amount requested by the President for supplemental appropriations. I emphasize again that the total amount of this bill is well below the total amount sought by the President. It is therefore clear that when the rhetoric is stripped away, the President's disagreement with this bill must relate to program priorities rather than the overall level of spending.

The failure to pass this measure will result in great hardship for a number of Federal agencies and many important domestic programs, either forcing them to sharply reduce services or, in some cases, shut down altogether. The President's veto of this bill has confronted our Nation with the prospect of massive and unwarranted Federal employee furloughs and the interruption or termination of important services such as title V, the senior community service employment program.

The Internal Revenue Service has already gone through one disruptive and expensive shutdown exercise. Emergency meetings were held to develop detailed shutdown procedures. Notices of furlough were prepared and delivered to 19,000 Internal Revenue employees. Normally dedicated and efficient employees, who bring in $20 of revenue to each $1 expended in salaries and other costs, were faced with imminent layoffs. In the end, furloughs were averted by last minute congressional approval of a reprograming request. Another 19,000 mailgrams were sent, at great expense, to cancel the already scheduled shutdown. Although the immediate crisis was defused, the atmosphere of uncertainty and misinformation has seriously affected the morale and productivity of one of the Government's most cost effective operations.

If a supplemental is not enacted this week, the pointless, wasteful and demoralizing exercise that the IRS has just gone through is set to be repeated on a much larger scale at agencies throughout the Government. The IRS itself anticipates laying off 90,000 employees on Monday, September 13. If no supplemental is enacted by Wednesday furlough notices will go out to 22,000 NASA employees, 100,000 workers at HHS, and 5,000 employees at the GAO.

It is impossible to calculate either the immediate cost or the long-lasting effect of such massive confusion and disruption in these important agencies. It is clear, however, that these recurring episodes are interfering with the ability of agencies to carry out their missions and to provide important services. I can also report that Federal employees are tired of being the political football in disputes over appropriations bills. The strain upon family financies of having their paychecks held hostage time and time again, in addition to the continuous assault on them in other areas, is severely eroding the motivation of Federal employees. For decent and fair treatment of these employers and for the responsible and orderly conduct of government that they vote to override the veto.

This supplemental bill that the President vetoed contains nearly $211 million in funding for the title V senior community service employment program in order to keep in operating through the current program year, which ends on June 30, 1983. The senior aides program provides part-time employment nationwide for 54,200 older men and women to use their skills, experience, and energies to provide needed services to the citizens of their communities; 1,100 jobs are currently provided in my own State of Maryland through the National Council of Senior Citizens, Green Thumb, and the Maryland State Office on Aging to older Americans who have an annual income of under $4,000. The State stands to lose $4 million in funding for these jobs at a time when unemployment and poverty among older Americans is reaching record-breaking levels. Unemployment for persons age 55 or older reached 797,000 in July, the second highest mark ever recorded for older Americans. Over 1 million elderly Americans have been thrown into poverty over the past 3 years. The wages earned by senior aides—which average only $3.50 an hour—have helped to keep some older Americans financially independent and off of public assistance.

The title V program also provides significant benefits to the communities in which senior aides work. Thousands of homebound elderly being served by title V workers would otherwise be unnecessarily institutionalized at a much higher cost to the Government. Similarly, senior aides in child and adult day care centers enable family members to get off public assistance and return to gainful employment. Senior aides are also involved in transportation for senior citizens and escorts for the blind, and also help at understaffed Federal agencies, such as the Internal Revenue Service where they assist in providing tax information for older Americans. A layoff of senior aides would result in serious problems for these and many other programs for older Americans, which rely on the valuable manpower that the title V program provides.

The senior aides program has worked extraordinarily well for our Nation, older Americans, and the communities they serve. Its administrative expenses have been kept at rock bottom, with practically every dollar expended going directly to benefit older workers. This is a proven and cost-effective program and I therefore urge my colleague to join in overriding the President's veto of the supplemental appropriation so that this effective program can continue.

● Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, I rise in support of this vote to override the President's veto of this important supplemental appropriations bill for 1982.

I have long supported the goal of employment of all those Americans who are physically able to work. In this respect, I have consistently supported the senior community service employment program for the low-income elderly of our Nation who are physically able and quite willing to work. I know that I am not alone in my wholehearted support for this senior jobs program.

Successful passage of Senate Resolution 340, in July of this year, clearly put the Senate on record, by a vote of 89 to 6, in full support of title V of the Older Americans Act, the senior jobs program. Title V provides low-income elderly the opportunity to work and preserve a sense of self-worth and self-dignity. The senior community service employment program has been very successful in placing seniors in jobs throughout the rural areas of my State of Nebraska.

The supplemental appropriations bill contains funding for education programs which I strongly support such as education for the handicapped, compensatory education for disadvantaged children, and vocational education, as well as financial assistance for needy students and certain higher education programs.

This bill provides $5 billion for additional borrowing authority for the Commodity Credit Corporation. These additional funds are essential to meet price support commitments of the agency and to make deficiency payments which may be needed to compensate producers who participate in reserve and acreage diversion programs up to established target prices for wheat, corn, and other feed grains and cotton.

This bill also earmarks $500 million for export credit loans. Increasing our exports, especially of grain, is of top priority as we harvest another record crop of wheat and corn.

Denial of these additional capital funds would seriously disrupt the operations of the CCC and would stop programs to help farmers through the most serious economic crisis since the 1930's.

Also included in the funding measure are necessary funds for the North Omaha Freeway project, which I have supported since I was the mayor of Omaha. The North Omaha Freeway project has been in the works since 1955, and has the support of every mayor of Omaha since that year. This Congress saw fit to appropriate $2 million to begin the project last year and this bill provides an additional $4 million to continue the North Omaha Freeway.

While this supplemental appropriations bill for 1982 contains $14.2 billion, it is $1.9 billion under the President's overall spending request. For these reasons and my strong convictions for adequate funding of social programs, I am voting today to override the veto of the President on the supplemental appropriations bill.●

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I will be very brief. I will be followed by the majority leader and I hope that we can then vote.

The distinguished Senator from Kansas has rightly said that the President has a great reservoir of strength. But, Mr. President, there is a greater reservoir of strength that lies with the American people who are going to be directly affected by this vote.

Mr. President, this bill is not a "budget buster" as the President has called it. It is $1.9 billion under the administration's budget request and it spends $110 million less for foreign aid than was requested by the administration. It does adjust the priorities. And the Senate, as an independent branch of Government, along with the House, has not only the right but the duty and the responsibility to take such action and to readjust priorities.

This legislation provided help for the elderly in the community services jobs program. It provides help for the handicapped. It provides help for the disadvantaged. It provides help for those students in middle- and low-income families who need money with which to go to college.

Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will assert its independence of the White House. The other house has done so on yesterday. This legislation was put together in a bipartisan fashion. It has been supported on both sides of the aisle in both houses.

We have heard the distinguished Senator, who is chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. HATFIELD, and we have heard the distinguished Senator, who is chairman of the Budget Committee, Mr. DOMENICI, who have spoken out in support of the bill and in support of an override of the President's veto.

So, Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will take a stand today for the elderly, for the disadvantaged, for the handicapped, and do not forget that there is money in this bill to pay for the administration of the unemployment compensation program. It is my hope that the Senate will take a stand, assert its independence, use its own good conscience, use its own mind and heart and vote to override the President's veto, vote to save $1.9 billion, vote for spending less money for foreign aid and more money at home.

Mr. President, this supplemental appropriations bill provides necessary funds for many programs and projects which are important to the people of the Nation and West Virginia in particular. This bill includes language which would assure that the administration continue work on the Tug Fork flood control project in the manner and at the pace intended by Congress. This bill also provides funds for jobs for older Americans, for education for the handicapped, and for student loans. Funds are also included for reclamation of abandoned mine lands and for a program to demonstrate technology which may permit the controlled burnout of coal mine fires. The supplemental appropriations bill also includes language which would stop the administration from eliminating certain programs including coal research and development in the Department of Energy, and other language which would require the Department of Defense to burn American coal at U.S. bases in Europe. Mr. President, I am pleased to have sponsored these amendments to this supplemental appropriations bill, and I urge my colleagues to join the 301 Members of the House of Representatives who voted yesterday to support this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I will not be long because I do not think it takes very long to identify the prime reason why we should sustain the judgment of the President of the United States on this measure.

Other speakers have referred to the independence of the Senate, the legislative prerogative, the prerogatives of the Appropriations Committee or the Budget Committee or other committees of the Congress. I respect those things.

But, Mr. President, I would like to speak of the partnership that exists between the Congress of the United States, two great political parties, and the President of the United States. And that is really what is at issue.

Will we continue that partnership? Will we go forward together in a sustained and historic effort to recapture control of our fiscal and economic destiny, or will we end that at the first opportunity on the first money bill that occurs after our victories on the budget resolution, on the tax bill, and on so many other successes, that that partnership between the President and the bipartisan Congress has produced these past 2 years?

Mr. President, this is not the time to end that partnership. And that is the real crux of the problem. I have sat here, Mr. President, during the continuation of this debate and I have heard learned and scholarly and appropriate remarks about the internal mechanisms of this bill and how it does or does not break the budget, how it does or does not fit within the budget resolution.

I am reminded of a statement by a great 19th century painter and photographer who once said that photography describes everything but it explains nothing.

Mr. President, it is that way so often in this Chamber. So often we are beguiled by the cloistered and protected atmosphere in this Chamber that we forget the true perspective of the national understanding of the image that we protect.

The country will not understand nor care for very long about whether a particular item was vetoed in a previous appropriation bill or included within a budget resolution.

The country will respond to the preception of what we do here, of how the press reports, that we continued and sustained the partnership, going forward together in this effort, this historic effort, to reestablish fiscal integrity in the governmental affairs of the United States, or whether we took the first opportunity to end it.

I can just see our friends now, Mr. President, in the money markets around the world, in New York, San Francisco, in Texas, and California. I can just see them now. If we override this veto, I can see what they are going to say. "We were persuaded for a while that you were going to do that, that you really meant it, that you were going to get your affairs in order and your budget under control. We believed you. And the interest rates have tumbled and the stock market has prospered."

But do you know what they are going to say if we override this veto? They are going to say, "Well, really, we knew they did not mean it. They only had to wait until they got the first appropriation bill to show that they were only trying to fool us one more time."

Mr. President, let us not do that. Let us not fool them at all. Let us sustain the veto of the President of the United States.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote. Vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objection of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding? The yeas and nays are mandatory under the Constitution. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I would urge that the clerk repeat the names as the votes are cast so that everyone can hear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will do that.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE), the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. SCHMITT), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER), and the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) are necessarily absent.

On this vote, the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) is paired with the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. SCHMITT) and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS).

If present and voting, the Senator from Texas would vote "nay" and the Senator from New Mexico would vote "yea," and the Senator from Mississippi would vote "yea."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS) would vote "yea."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 60, nays 30, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if we could have order in the Senate, I ask the Chair to state the pending business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator suspend?

The Senate will be in order. The visitors in the galleries are asked to be in order as well.

The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Chair please state for the benefit of the Senate now the pending business?

TEMPORARY INCREASE IN THE PUBLIC DEBT LIMIT

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the unfinished business.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 520) to provide for a temporary increase in the public debt limit.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we do not have many days left in this session and that we have an order down which prohibits the offering of a motion to table against the bill or any amendment to this bill, which ought to provide an opportunity for free debate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the majority leader is entitled to be heard. There is entirely too much confusion in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). The minority leader is correct.

The Senate will be in order. Will all Senators please retire to the cloakrooms to carry on conversations and the remaining Senators please take their seats so the distinguished majority leader may be heard?

The majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I was about to say that there can be no tabling motion today or Monday prior to the cloture vote on Monday. Therefore, I urge Members who have debate they wish to contribute to the record on the pending amendment, which I believe is the Baucus amendment, or any of the other amendments that are in the tree of amendments now before the Senate, to do so now because at some point we are going to have to finish this bill. There will be another cloture vote at 4 p.m. on Monday against the Helms second degree amendment. It is my intention to proceed with other cloture votes from time to time as that may appear desirable and as it may appear promising of a final result in this matter.

Mr. President, while I have promised for more than 1½ years that we were going to have a free-standing debate on the social issues, I have not promised that it would go on forever; at some point we are going to have to end this, and we are going to have to take up the debt limit. I encourage Senators to come to the floor and engage in a full and fair and perhaps even a spirited debate on these very important issues.

Mr. President, I expect the Senate to be in for a while yet today. I will now yield the floor.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CITIZEN CRIME PREVENTION WORKS

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, today I should like to recognize and pay tribute to an innovative and unique organization. The National Association to Town Watch (NATW) is a nonprofit nationwide network of citizen crime watch groups and local law enforcement agencies. Its founder and executive director, Mr. Matt A. Peskin of Wynnewood, Pa., established the organization early in 1981 in an effort to unite the thousands of citizen volunteers who are assisting their local police in organized crime watch-type programs. Mr. Peskin saw the need for a nationwide association through which local groups could share valuable crime prevention information and programs. By March of last year, the National Association of Town Watch had become a reality. Today, the organization has grown to include member groups in 22 States across the country and has even attracted membership from Provinces in Canada.

There are several important characteristics I should like to relate about the organization. First, its members are only those who are affiliated with and working in cooperation with their local police. They are not vigilante groups. Rather, they are concerned citizens who have taken time to be trained and to work with the law enforcement agency in their particular community. Second, and perhaps most important, the organization has come a long way without a major source of funding. Through hard work, membership fees and small contributions NATW has been able to grow.

Mr. President, I believe it is important that limited Federal support be available to local crime prevention programs, which have proven to be effective and worthwhile. It is my belief that the volunteer anticrime spirit can be enhanced if limited Federal resources and technical assistance are available. It is for this reason that Senator SPECTER and I introduced our Justice Assistance Act of 1982 (S. 2411), so that successful crime fighting programs can be continued.

The National Association of Town Watch just recently introduced and implemented a new dimension to the crime watch campaign that I strongly endorse. The program is called letter carrier watch and incorporates the voluntary services of local letter carriers to serve as additional eyes and ears while on their daily routes. The program is targeted at helping police combat the steadily growing number of daytime burglaries. Letter carriers are a valuable addition to an area's crime watch team for the following reasons: They know the neighborhoods quite well, their hours coincide with the time most day burglaries are committed, and many carriers are already adept at spotting suspicious activity. The suburban Philadelphia area, and five other pilot areas across the country, kicked off programs in their areas in May. Carriers attended awareness sessions conducted by crime prevention officers and the various components of the letter carrier watch were discussed. One of the major items outlined was safety. Carriers were instructed never to get physically involved in any suspicious circumstances—only to telephone the local police.

The program certainly has generated a great deal of public support. The program also makes a great deal of sense. There is no real cost involved and at the very least, it will serve as a deterrent to potential daytime criminals.

The carriers, the police, the community, and the media strongly support this program and I believe this to be an excellent crime prevention proposal. I urge every Member of the Senate to lend their support for expansion of the letter carrier watch program nationally.

I take my hat off to the National Association of Town Watch and to Mr. Peskin for showing us that the spirit is alive and well in communities across America. These citizens' groups and law enforcement agencies are fighting to keep their homes, their families, and their neighborhoods safe. Their efforts are paying off because they are working together.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article about this fine group that appeared in the New York Times on August 30, 1982, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANTICRIME PATROLS GROW IN NUMBER AND EFFECT

(By William Robbins)

ARDMORE, PA., August 29.—Citizens' crime-watching groups, scattered and isolated 10 years ago, have now enlisted more than five million members and are gaining recognition from the police and other experts as a highly effective force against crime.

Often operating with direct channels to police departments, the groups patrol their neighborhoods in radio-equipped cars, walk their blocks and scan their apartment complexes, reporting what they see and hear but rarely confronting criminals. Increasingly they are organized on a national basis.

"They give us more eyes and ears—that's the big thing," said George W. Rush, a patrolman who responded to a citizen-patrol call here in Lower Merion Township, a section of the Philadelphia area's Main Line.

"Wherever the watches do a good job, you find that they cut crime quite a bit," said Ferris Lucas, executive director of the National Sheriffs Association, which began organizing groups nationwide about 10 years ago. The units it sponsors are called Neighborhood Watches.

Some groups note, however, that their vigilance has diverted crime to neighboring areas.

Across the nation, the movement has brought together people like Annette Pough, 75 years old, who takes her turn for "a terribly boring three hours," calling regularly from her car to "Blue Knight Base," a volunteer stationed at Lower Merion's police headquarters, and Matt Peskin, a 28-year-old real estate broker, who last year started a new national association as an outgrowth of his patrols here.

No nationwide totals are available to prove that the neighborhood groups have reduced crime, but a check of several cities and neighborhoods with citizen patrols produced sometimes dramatic figures, ranging from 50 percent reductions in burglaries in some blocks of Manhattan's Lenox Hill section to a 34 percent reduction here in Lower Merion Township.

RESIDENTS SAY THEY FEEL SAFER

Just as important, some say, is a new sense of security brought to neighborhoods once gripped by fear.

"One thing that makes it worthwhile is that the people in the community feel safer," said Capt. Louis Sbrocchi of the New York City Police Department's Office of Community Affairs.

"The program has given the residents in my area a new sense of self-reliance and determination," said Kathy Hoard, a member of Detroit's Neighborhood Watch, an organization with groups on 4,000 of the city's 12,000 residential blocks. "Neighborhood Watch has helped us stabilize and feel more secure. Without it, we would consider moving."

"The fears were spreading all over the country," said Curtis Langley, director of Norfolk State University's National Center for Community Anti-Crime Programs. "People were afraid to stay home and afraid to leave, and many of them have simply got tired of it. People are getting involved because they know the problem is not going to go away, and it's never going to be completely solved by the police alone."

The community groups apparently have a long way to go to wipe out widespread fears of crime. According to a recent Gallup Poll, 48 percent of Americans are afraid to walk alone at night in some areas in their immediate neighborhoods, although 17 percent say their communities have some kind of organized volunteer anticrime program.

The organizations are almost as varied as their names. In New York City, with one of the largest efforts operating under the Police Department's Civilian Participation Program, about 150,000 members take in groups ranging from various types of motor patrols to its most numerous segment, the Blockwatchers.

The Blockwatchers, about 70,000 strong, are trained at precinct houses to watch, listen and report accurately. As with other civilian crime patrols, they are advised never to try to detain a suspect.

MOTOR PATROLS MORE ACTIVE

But the advice is not always followed by some of the mobile patrols, which include groups called civilian observation patrols, civilian radio motor patrols, and civilian amateur radio patrols, the last a network of ham radio operators. Those involved range from drivers of buses, taxis and trucks to motorists patrolling in their own cars.

"We tell them to try not to get directly involved, but some of these guys get so fed up they get carried away," said James Gillen Jr., president of Minute Men, a New York taxi company that is one of the program's most active participants.

When one of his drivers, Jimmy Martin of Brooklyn, saw a woman being abducted last year, he radioed the police and then drove the abductor's car off the road just as the police arrived. Another driver, John Espada of Queens, tackled and held a suspect for the police after seeing a woman attacked.

New York's citizen crime watches are in addition to the uniformed Guardian Angels, widely known for their subway patrols, and the Auxiliary Police, numbering about 7,300, who wear police uniforms but are not authorized to make arrests.

EFFECT SEEN IN BROOKLYN

New York officials offer no overall figures on the crime watch programs' effectiveness, but scattered reports are available. After a program began in the Midwood section of Brooklyn, for example, reports showed a 17 percent decline in crime over all, while burglaries dropped 34 percent.

In other areas across the country, claims of program effectiveness include a 12 percent drop in major crimes for Detroit since its Neighborhood Watch was started in 1976, a 15 percent drop in the crime rate of Park Ridge, Ill., a 40 percent decline in burglaries in Morton Grove, Ill., 20 percent fewer burglaries in Winter Park, Fla., and 30 percent fewer in Gloucester City, N.J.

In Cherry Hill, N.J., the burglary rate fell by 33 percent after citizens organized a crime watch, but neighboring areas felt the sting of the diverted criminals. In self-defense, Haddonfield started its own crime watch program.

In Chicago, where block watchers are known as Beat Representatives, Deputy Superintendent Ira Harris of the Police Department's Bureau of Community Services, said that "2,715 arrests in 1981 were directly attributable" to the group's program.

PATROLS IN MIAMI AREA SCHOOLS

And in Dade County, Fla., whose 175,000-members Citizens Crime Watch has extended its operations into the schools, Janet Gemmill, the anticrime patrol's president, said there had been a 50 percent drop in drug sales at the North Miami Senior High School.

Lieut. Joseph Daly of Lower Merion said the publicity about the recent murders of Courtlandt S. Gross, retired chairman of the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, his wife and their housekeeper have tended to mask a continuing drop in the township's crime rate. He cited figures showing a 43 percent decline in burglaries in the last five months.

In some instances, however, patrols and neighborhood watches have led to unforeseen results. In Park Ridge, for example, one patrol reported "suspicious characters" in a car near a service station. When the police arrived they flushed out Federal agents in a stakeout.

Scattered crime watch organizations have been in existence for many years but the first nationwide organizational effort began a decade ago when the National Sheriffs Association began promoting Neighborhood Watch groups and, aided by funds from the now-defunct Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, began circulating literature to community groups.

Neighborhood Watches sponsored by the sheriffs now operate in about 2,500 communities.

NEW GROUP BEGAN LAST YEAR

One of the latest national organizational effort was started a little over a year ago by Mr. Peskin shortly after he joined Lower Merion's Community Watch. His National Association of Town Watch now has 450 member groups in 23 states.

Mr. Peskin, who said he started his association with savings of $5,000 and is seeking foundation funds to keep going, estimates that "between five and 10 million" members now belong to crime watch groups in about 20,000 communities.

In most areas, Mr. Peskin said, one of the biggest problems is boredom, which often reduces participation by patrollers on summer weekends, when they are needed most.

Mrs. Pough, his fellow patroller, agreed that "it's terribly boring," but recalled a policeman's response when she complained after a patrol that "nothing happened."

"You just don't know what you might have prevented from happening," he said.

DALLA CHIESA ASSASSINATION

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I know that all of us read with shock the weekend news stories of the assassination of Gen. Carlos Alberto Dalla Chiesa in Sicily.

Most Americans, probably paid little attention to these events—one more murder, one more act of terrorism in a far-off land. But this murder will have significant reverberations here in the United States. First, Americans should not forget that General Dalla Chiesa was the Italian general who had directed the successful effort to control terrorism in that country and was responsible for the daring rescue of our own General Dozier. Second, and of even more significance to us here in the United States, the government had assigned to General Dalla Chiesa a new chore, in part at the behest of people like myself and other American officials, an attack on the Sicilian Mafia and in particular its role as primary financier and organizing force for Southwest Asian heroin directed at the United States.

As I pointed out in a report to the Senate in 1980 after the majority leader and I led a delegation to the Mediterannean, the problem was bound to worsen, and indeed now has worsened, because of our inability to control the Sicilian Mafia. Indeed, it is now safe to say that the increase in robberies and burglaries we are now witnessing in the United States, especially on the east coast, is a direct result of our failure to control the importation of Southwest Asian heroin into the United States.

The reason I say that is that these heroin addicts need a lot of money and they get the money by robbing us on the street and burglarizing us in the home. There is a direct correlation between the inflow of that heroin and the increase in those two crimes.

Certainly the most alarming aspect of the Dalla Chiesa assassination is the profound discouragement it has engendered among the Italian people in their effort to control the Mafia.

They recognize that the general and his immediate predecessors were undertaking the first serious effort to control the Mafia since World War II. I say "immediate predecessors," because since late 1979 there have been almost 200 gangland slayings in Sicily including judges, prosecutors, and other law enforcement officers pursuing the Mafia. In fact, General Dalla Chiesa was undertaking a new strategy that we have been attempting here in this country against organized crime; that is, the seizure of the financial assets of the organization. Reportedly General Dalla Chiesa was beginning to make real progress in that effort. Perhaps this cost the general and his young wife their lives. Unfortunately, commentators in Italy are now expressing the view that you "can't beat the Mafia."

I hope that this discouragement does not become debilitating because I firmly believe that a national commitment on the part of their Government with unswerving commitment in terms of manpower and resources from the United States can control the lawlessness in Sicily which has a direct impact upon the United States. The swift action in appointing the general's successor and granting him broad powers is encouraging. I might point out, however, that the lawlessness that the Italian Government faces in Sicily is really no different other than in degree than the lawlessness that the Turkish Government faces with the Kurds on the Iran border, or the Pakistani Government with the Pathans on the northwest provinces of Pakistan or the various insurgent groups, like the Shan United Army in the hinterlands of the Golden Triangle of Southeast Asia. All are beyond the control of central governments, all depend on the revenues from illicit heroin trafficking for their sustenance and in every case that heroin trafficking is directed at the United States where it results in pain and suffering for the addicts and the victims of crime committed by those addicts to support their habits.

Yet this administration, indeed I must say even the past administrations of Presidents Carter and Ford, has no meaningful international diplomatic strategy for tackling this problem. Indeed, notwithstanding the urgency, there is no one official in this or any earlier administration with authority to forge and then implement such a strategy. Still this administration has not been willing to duplicate elsewhere in the United States what it has done in south Florida. We are still cutting resources in the Federal law enforcement agencies and narcotics treatment programs that cope with this scourge every day.

Mr. President, we are in serious trouble in this country in terms of the extent to which organized crime and international drug trafficking is affecting even legitimate institutions, and unless we have at the highest level, the Cabinet level, someone responsible for first setting out a strategy and then implementing the strategy to deal with international drug trafficking, we are going to continue the way we are now.

In some instances the CIA does not speak to the FBI, the FBI does not speak to the DEA, the Drug Enforcement Agency, and the Internal Revenue Services likes to keep their hands off even though there is a need to get them involved in dealing with the assets of these criminal organizations.

All in all, we have an $80 billion business in America, making it the 10th largest American corporation, exceeding the sales, for example, of the IBM Corp., and it happens to be called drug trafficking. That is how much money is generated every year just in the United States of America.

We are yet to develop a strategy. We are still having difficulty convincing this administration as we did the last Democratic administration that there is a need to make this a priority as high as our defense priority, as high as any other priority in this country.

There is much more to say, but I will not take the time of my colleagues and the Chair at this point other than to say this is not a problem that is going to go away. It is not a problem we can address without spending time and money and until we equip the police agencies in America with the same degree of financial assistance and technical infrastructure that the crime organizations have we cannot expect them to be able to do their job.

We do not have to change the Constitution, the fourth, the fifth, and the eighth amendments, in order to make a dent in organized crime. We have to target resources and be willing to do it.

We spend in the United States of America on the Federal level less than $3 billion a year for every aspect of our law enforcement process, and we spend over $255 billion a year on defense.

I think we need to spend a great deal of money on defense, but I am not sure that I make a distinction between whether or not my mother is shot and killed in a parking lot while she is shopping and whether or not she is killed as a consequence of a Cuban invasion or a Russian invasion. She is still dead, and the fact of the matter is a lot of people are dying, a lot of people are being murdered, a lot of people are being victimized, and it is having an effect on the very way in which we conduct our lives.

We have a whole new multibillion dollar industry in America. It is called locks, bars, gates, guard dogs, and private security fences. It has been spawned as a consequence of inability of Government to deal adequately with the problem of crime, and until we begin to do it, until we begin to allocate the resources for it, we are not going to make a change.

Those who suggest the easy answers, whether it be capital punishment or the Miranda rule or the fourth amendment of search and seizure, that is not going to get the job done. We have to make the commitment, spend the time and the money. We are not doing it.

I thank the Chair for its consideration. As the Senate knows, Senators have heard a lot about this subject from me over the past 5 years. I am here for at least 2 additional years, and the Senate is going to hear a lot more. We must make some progress on this issue.

Hopefully the Dalla Chiesa assassination will refocus attention on the need for a more meaningful response by our Government to this problem.

Mr. President, in that hope, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a number of newspaper articles on the assassination and excerpts from my trip report to the Mediterranean in 1980.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GUNMEN IN SICILY KILL HIGH ITALIAN POLICE

(By Henry Kamm)

ROME, September 3.—Gen. Carlos Alberto Dalla Chiesa, one of Italy's highest ranking police officials, was assassinated by gunmen tonight in the center of Palermo, Sicily. His wife and a police escort were also slain.

General Dalla Chiesa of the Carabinieri, the national police force under military command, had been named to the political post of prefect of Palermo only last May 1. His assignment was to take charge of the fight against the Sicilian Mafia, which has turned Palermo into a major center of the herion trade with Europe and the United States.

General Chiesa was killed as he used his body to try to shield his wife, who was at the wheel of their car. Mrs. Dalla Chiesa died in a hospital immediately after the assault.

The gunmen, using two cars and a motorcycle, escaped. Their vehicles were found soon after the assassination in a side street less than a mile from the scene of the crime. They had been set on fire.

Before moving to Sicily, General Dalla Chiesa was Deputy National Commander of the Carabinieri, an appointment that he earned for his leading part in the struggle against political terrorists.

"General Dalla Chiesa was sent to Palermo as representative of the Government of the republic, to respond to the mortal challenge flung by the Mafia against the democratic state," Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini said in a statement tonight.

He paid tribute to the "highest contribution" that the general had made in the antiterrorist struggle and said that he died at a moment at which, "with intelligence and courage," he was putting into action "a battle plan against Mafia terrorism." President Sandro Pertini announced from an Alpine resort that he would cut short his vacation on Saturday to return to Rome.

Police sources at the scene of the crime told ANSA, the Italian news agency, that the gunman had first fired on Mrs. Dalla Chiesa, and then, as her husband leaned over her, killed him. Their car, out of control, crashed into a wall. The killers also fired on a car carrying security police accompanying the general, mortally wounding a 32-year-old plainclothesman, Domenico Russo.

The general and Emanuela Setti Carraro, a 32-year-old Red Cross volunteer nurse, were married only last July. They had just left police headquarters for the prefect's residence.

The police have issued no statements suggesting whether the killers were Mafia members or political terrorists. A policeman on the scene said the fatal bullets had been fired from Soviet-made AK-47 assault rifles, which in the past have been used by terrorists and crime syndicates.

An unidentified man phoned a newspaper in the Sicilian city of Messina soon after the assassination, taking responsibility for the crime on behalf of "the guerrilla party," which is not a known terrorist group.

General Dalla Chiesa, whose family has a long military tradition, was named head of the antiterrorist campaign in 1978, after the kidnapping and murder of former Prime Minister Aldo Moro. The next year he was appointed head of the Carabinieri in northern Italy until his nomination late last year as Deputy Commander of the National Police. He served as an infantry officer in World War II until 1943, when he joined an anti-Fascist Partisan unit.

ITALY'S ANGER RISES AT GENERAL'S MURDER

(By Henry Kamm)

ROME, Sept. 4.—A funeral was held today for Gen. Carlo Alberto Dalla Chiesa, the high-ranking police official assassinated by gunmen Friday night in the center of Palermo in Sicily, and it provided an occasion for expressions of anger and frustration over the Government's seeming inability to provide law and order.

The 62-year-old general's wife, Emanuela, 32, was also slain. A bodyguard who had been reported slain was said today by hospital officials to be in an irreversible coma.

The murders, which officials suspect were carried out by organized crime, have aroused more emotion in Italy than any event since the 1978 kidnapping and murder by left-wing terrorists of former Prime Minister Aldo Moro.

Preaching the funeral sermon, Salvatore Cardinal Pappalardo, in the presence of President Sandro Pertini and Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini, criticized "the actions and decisions, slow and uncertain, of those who should provide for the security of simple citizens, Government servants and authorities of state."

"The slower and more uncertain are the actions of the state, the more opportune, decisive and violent are the actions of those who have the mind, the will and the might to strike," the Archbishop of Palermo continued in the televised ceremony, and the people in San Domenico Church applauded.

The Cardinal's tough homily was punctuated by outcries of rage and anguish from the tightly packed crowd in the Baroque church. Shouts for the resignation of the Government, many of whose ministers were present, rose, and so did demands for the introduction of the death penalty.

The couple will be flown to Milan for burial. They were struck down Friday night in their car with Mrs. Dalla Chiesa at the wheel. The murderers escaped in two cars and on a motorcycle, which were later found set afire and abandoned.

General Dalla Chiesa had a nationwide reputation, cutting across party lines, for efficiency and probity in the struggle against banditry after World War II and against political terrorism and syndicated crime. He was sent to Palermo in May as a prefect, an unusual appointment for a military man, with the mission to put the Mafia out of business after the murder, also in Palermo in his car, of Pio La Torre, a regional Communist leader and outspoken opponent of the Mafia.

The assassinations of Mr. La Torre and General Dalla Chiesa, the two public figures who have become national symbols of the struggle against the criminal "families," are viewed by the average Italian as acts of arrogant disdain by the Mafia, for which the Government has been unable to find a response.

The demonstrations today, as well as announcements of widespread protest work stoppages throughout Sicily, in Rome and in other regions are viewed here as indications of the serious challenge posed to Mr. Spadolini's Government over its ability to protect Italy's citizens. By coincidence, Parliament today completed its assent to Mr. Spadolini's second Cabinet, which is identical to the one that resigned last month.

MAFIA FIGHTER'S DEATH MARKS END OF LEGEND

(By Kay Withers)

ROME.—A few weeks ago Gen. Carlo Alberto Dalla Chiesa delivered the eulogy at the funeral of a police colleague gunned down by Sicily's crime bosses.

"There is a name that some would prefer not to repeat," he said in ringing tones. "And that name is Mafia! The Mafia, who knew he was unprotected and who, with its taste for cowardice, murdered him in front of his family as he went home to rest."

Apart from the speech's courage and directness in an island where omerta—the law of silence—reigns, it was tragically prophetic. General Dalla Chiesa himself and his 32-year-old bride of six weeks, Emanuela, fell in a hail of bullets Friday night, as presumed Mafiosi ambushed their unprotected car in a Palermo Street.

It was the end of an already tarnished Mafia reputation for chivalry in sparing women, a sign of the increased brutality of the times.

And it was the end of a legend.

General Dalla Chiesa was perhaps the only police officer whose name was a household word in Italy. The newspapers wrote constantly of "General Dalla Chiesa's Carabinieri" during the four years in which he led the country's battle against terrorism.

General Dalla Chiesa caught Renato Curcio, founder of the Red Brigades, and he wrested a crucial confession from former brigade member Patricio Peci and largely broke the terrorist gang. In short, General Dalla Chiesa was a hero in a country that has few of them.

As the speaker of the Chamber of Deputies, Nilde Jotti, put it, General Dalla Chiesa "represented the state's success against terrorism."

This symbol of hope was sent to Palermo in May, to pit his acknowledged wits against what Rome's Il Messaggero called "the eternal strength of the Mafia."

On the eve of his arrival, the island's organized crime leaders greeted him with the murder of Pio la Torre, the regional Communist Party secretary and an opponent of the Mafia. A stream of other killings followed.

General Dalla Chiesa believed the luck that never left him in four years of anti-terrorist activity and his penchant for breaking up his routine and moving without notice would protect his life. But in the end, an unexpected romantic streak betrayed him—his young, pregnant wife picked him up Friday in an unarmored car. Now they are both dead.

According to his friend and colleague, Gen. Umberto Cappuzzo, his successor as Carabinieri chief, the military, somewhat portly General Dalla Chiesa "liked to introduce a human dimension" to his life as Italy's tough top policeman.

"Each of us makes a decision in life," the general once said. "I chose to serve the state to the bitter end."

The impact of his death is enormous here, in some ways greater than that of the murder of former Prime Minister Aldo Moro in 1978.

"More than Moro, General Dalla Chiesa conveyed the impression of invulnerability," commented sociologist Franco Ferrarotti. "He was a Carabiniere, a general. If he couldn't be protected, who could? From the point of view of the state's effectiveness, his death reinforces the feeling that you can't beat the Mafia."

The president of the Sicilian region, Mario Dacquisto, yesterday described an "air of resignation" in the island capital, the feeling that "nothing can be done."

Nevertheless, General Dalla Chiesa's death is more an indication that something can be done and that he was doing it. His effectiveness was what killed him.

General Dalla Chiesa possessed the gift of collating apparently isolated details into a total design. And he had started an examination of the financial status of suspected Mafiosi and crime bosses, a technique long advocated by anti-Mafia activists, who believe millions of dollars in profits from the lucrative heroin trade in the United States are flowing into Sicilian pockets.

"He touched the sensitive nerve of vested interests," Mr. Ferrarotti said. "The Mafia doesn't care about ringing denunciations. But if you take, say, 3,000 names and start looking into how their estates were acquired, then you're dead."

The presumed efficacy of General Dalla Chiesa's methods was underlined the day after his death when Alberto Chiari, head of Sicily's finance and customs police and evidently a man of rare courage, gave orders to continue the investigation.

The murder undoubtedly will stimulate debate here over how to deal with the Mafia and whether to give prefects and police sweeping powers.

So far in Italian history, the man who has met with the greatest success in dealing with the Mafia was Benito Mussolini. The Fascist dictator sent the notorious Prefect Mori to Palermo and allowed him to combat omerta by jailing whole villages until someone talked. Fighting the Mafia with the Mafia's own methods, you might call it.

General Dalla Chiesa had in fact asked the government for special powers, which had been refused. As Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni stood in silence before the two closed coffins in Palermo yesterday, relatives of Domenico lo Russo, the dying policeman shot with the Dalla Chiesas, screamed at him, "Get out!"

Scuffles with police erupted outside Palermo's San Domenico church, where a state funeral was held yesterday.

One Rome commentator suggested using "a very effective and somewhat brutal police force." Politicians have dragged their feet, in permitting repressive tactics, no matter what the cost. "The state will win in the end," said Mr. Dacquisto. "But there will be other victims, perhaps many, before the end."

None, though, so illustrious. Carlo Alberto Dalla Chiesa was thought to be the ace up Italy's sleeve. One should never underestimate this country's amazing resilience, but the strong initial impression here in the wake of Friday's assassinations is that Italy has played its best card against the Mafia and lost.

HEAD OF ITALIAN POLICE GROUP NAMED TO CRIME POST

(By Henry Kamm)

ROME, September 5.—The Government of Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini today created a post of high commissioner for the fight against organized crime.

Meeting in emergency session, the Cabinet named to the position the head of a secret police agency attached to the Prime Minister's office. The official, Emanuele de Francesco, was simultaneously appointed successor to Gen. Carlo Alberto Dalla Chiesa as prefect, or regional governor, of Palermo.

General Dalla Chiesa and his wife were murdered in the center of Palermo Friday night. Two cars and a racing motorcycle ambushed the small private car that Mrs. Dalla Chiesa was driving and opened a barrage of automatic fire. Mr. Spadolini had sent the general, who had gained a considerable reputation for his success in leading the battle against political terrorism, to Palermo last May with the special mission of combating the Mafia.

SPADOLINI ATTENDS FUNERAL

The announcement of the creation of the new office, which will have coordinating power over all organs of Government in the fight against the crime syndicates, was made by Mr. Spadolini to a special session of the Senate.

The session was ordered Saturday, when the Senate met to confirm Mr. Spadolini's newly formed Government, and allowed him to leave for Palermo to attend the victims' funeral without replying to questions on the killings.

The funeral service became the scene of strong criticism against the Government's inability to affirm its power against the Mafia.

The tone was set by a daughter of the 62-year-old general's first marriage and by the father and sister of the general's 32-year-old wife.

While the relatives accused the Government of inability to protect the general and his wife, the Archbishop of Palermo, Salvatore Cardinal Pappalardo, made his charges—of indecision and weakness, in fighting the Mafia—the principal theme of his oration. Then, evidently emphasizing his criticism, he stepped from the pulpit to greet President Sandro Pertini and pointedly ignored the Prime Minister and other Cabinet members.

HUNT FOR KILLERS GOES ON

The 85-year-old President is considered above politics and has not been criticized. The critical attitude toward Mr. Spadolini and his ministers was shared by the large crowd in the church and on the square in front of it. Government members were insulted and some members of the crowd threw coins at them while the coffins of the victims were applauded.

Today's national newspapers gave prominence to the expressions of rage, heightening, political sources said, the Government's sense of urgency to calm the national mood. While the rapid naming of General Dalla Chiesa's successor and the granting of exceptional status to him was a step in that direction, Mr. Spadolini was unable to report any success in the principal task, the hunt for the murderers.

According to police sources, eight hours after the crime, which took place within view of several apartment houses, no witnesses had come forward. This is viewed here as a measure of the terror that the Mafia exercises over the citizens of Palermo and other regions of Sicily. About 100 murders have been committed in the Sicilian capital this year; most are assumed to have been settlements of gangster accounts and remain unsolved.

PROMINENT OFFICIALS KILLED

In the last three years, the following prominent officials have been murdered in Palermo and surrounding regions: the provincial secretary of the Christian Democratic Party; the deputy police commissioner of Palermo; a judge; the chief public prossecutor; two officers of the carabinieri, the national police force under military command of which General Dalla Chiesa had been deputy national commander; the president of the region of Sicily; the mayor of Castelvetrano, and the regional chairman of the Communist Party.

All the murders remain unsolved.

Political commentators in the major newspapers speculated that General Dalla Chiesa was assassinated not only because of his prominence and aggressive stand against the Mafia but also because his methods of proceeding against organized crime were showing signs of becoming effective.

Adopting the American method of fighting against organized crime through the use of tax-evasion prosecutions, General Dalla Chiesa had enlisted all branches of local and national Government to compile information on the holdings and business interests of suspected crime-syndicate members. He had also sought to explore the links between political power and organized crime by seeking information on the letting of public contracts in Sicily.

Before the Senate tonight, Mr. Spadolini affirmed that the Government would continue the fiscal work begun by General Dalla Chiesa.

ITALY GIVES WIDE POWERS TO ANTI-MAFIA CHIEF

(By Henry Kamm)

ROME, September 6.—The official charged with leading the fight against the Mafia was given sweeping new powers today as he took over from his slain predecessor.

Acting with unusual speed, the Government of Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini today prepared, and President Sandro Pertini signed into law, a decree conferring the extraordinary powers on the new prefect of Palermo, Sicily. The prefect, Emanuele de Francesco, has also been appointed to the newly created post of high commissioner for the fight against organized crime.

Before the decree was even signed, the official, Mr. De Francesco, arrived in the Sicilian capital, where his predecessor as regional governor was murdered Friday night.

Heavily guarded, in contrast with the custom of Gen. Carlo Alberto Dalla Chiesa, the slain prefect, Mr. De Francesco was driven from the airport to his offices and began a round of conferences with security officials conducting the search for the murderers of the general and his wife.

Mr. De Francesco arrived in a city whose life was muted not only by the shock of the assassination, which has jolted Italy more than any event since the kidnapping and murder by left-wing terrorists of former Prime Minister Aldo Moro in 1978, but also by a four-hour general strike called in protest against Mafia violence. Similar but briefer work stoppages took place in Rome and in many other cities.

As a further measure of the determination of Italy's political system to rise to what the President, the Prime Minister and other political leaders have called a challenge to the state by the Mafia, parliamentary leaders of both Government and opposition parties pledged to approve with record speed an anti-Mafia law that has been under examination for many months.

One of the main movers of the bill, Pio la Torre, the Communist Party leader in Sicily, was murdered in Palermo in April. The murder brought the appointment of General Dalla Chiesa with the express mission of stamping out Mafia power.

MAFIA GROWS RICH ON DRUGS

The law is expected to duplicate some of the provisions that today's decree gave to the high commissioner. They reflect the big increase in wealth acquired by the crime syndicates with the growing involvement in the last two years of Sicily, and in particular the Palermo region, with the production and trafficking of heroin to the rest of Western Europe and the United States.

In an attempt to identify and prosecute the major members of crime "families," bank-secrecy regulations were set aside to allow the high commissioner to obtain information on the holding of suspected gangsters.

The commissioner was also authorized to obtain full disclosure of the ownership of shares of companies bidding for public-works contracts. Much of the "laundered" proceeds from the narcotics trade, arms smuggling and other Mafia activities are widely believed to be going into prosperous Sicilian construction companies.

The commissioner was given the right also to intercept the telephone calls of suspects and was given access to all relevant reports of a secret service organization in the Prime Minister's office. Before being appointed high commissioner Sunday, Mr. De Francesco headed that organization. There are suggestions that he will continue to do so while also serving as prefect of Palermo.

Some of the powers given to Mr. De Francesco were among those reportedly requested by General Dalla Chiesa and denied by the Government because of opposition by the Interior Minister, Virginio Rognoni. Mr. Rognoni has become a main target for criticism for supposedly failing to provide General Dalla Chiesa, an officer widely respected across party lines, with the means to conduct his fight against the Mafia and protect himself.

EXCERPTS FROM THE SICILIAN CONNECTION: SOUTHWEST ASIAN HEROIN EN ROUTE TO THE UNITED STATES

(Report by Senator JOSEPH R. BIDEN, Jr.)

VI. ITALY AND THE SICILIAN CONNECTION

"It would seem that the Italian laboratory activity is directed at the United States." (Peter Bensinger, Director, DEA, April, 1980.)

The next stop on the Southwest Asian trail is Italy. Historically, Italy has played a significant role in the transhipment of Middle Eastern herion to the United States. Organized crime families based in Sicily have frequently been involved in the transhipment of this heroin, with family members in America conducting the marketing. Indeed, in the late 1940's and early 1950's, the Italian Police, working with the U.S. Federal Bureau of Narcotics, managed to eliminate an important Sicilian heroin importation connection. Of course, traditional organized crime families in the United States and Italy, in particular the one formerly headed by the late "Lucky" Luciano, who was deported from the United States to Italy, continue to maintain close relationships up to the present day.

Italy is again emerging as an important source of heroin destined for the United States. DEA believes that Itlay is the principal source of Southwest Asian heroin headed for the East Coast of the United States.

DEA and Italian police have already closed down several major, very sophisticated laboratories in Itlay. The first important seizure was in San Remo which is located near the French border, on November 27, 1979. Five individuals were arrested, including a former French Connection chemist. Twenty-two kilograms of morphine base and one kilogram of heroin were seized. This seizure was the first in Southern Europe since a French seizure near Marseilles in February, 1978. Prior to that, there had been no seizure of a significant lab in this part of the world since 1972.

In April 1980, DEA Director Peter Bensinger stated that the San Remo seizure indicated that, as in the French Connection days, the big-time organized crime traffickers are having no trouble obtaining all of the morphine base they want. According to Bensinger, the investment in sophisticated laboratory equipment for the conversion of morphine base to heroin and the presence of a significant amount of morphine base at the San Remo laboratory suggest an attempt to export large amounts of heroin to the United States.

Bensinger said that all of the heroin produced at the San Remo laboratory was intended for U.S. consumption. According to DEA's calculations, the laboratory was capable of producing between 10 and 50 kilograms of heroin a week. That would be sufficient to supply indefinitely between 6,000 and 30,000 of the estimated 400,000 heroin addicts in the United States.

On June 4, 1980, the Guardia di Finanza, the primary domestic police agency in Italy, working with DEA, seized two laboratories outside Milan that were potentially capable of even larger production than the one at San Remo. Seventeen individuals, including four French chemists, were arrested. More than 60 kilograms of morphine base and three kilograms of finished heroin were seized at the labs. The laboratory records indicated that they produced about 4 kilograms of heroin a day or approximately 20 kilograms a week. One informant said that the plan was to convert one ton of morphine base to heroin, all destined for the United States.

Both of those recent seizures in Milan and the seizure at San Remo involved Italian and French Corsican traffickers with ties to the United States directly or through Canada. Despite the presence of these laboratories in central and northern Italy and the heavy involvement of French chemists in their operation, DEA is convinced that it is traditional Sicilian organized crime that poses the most serious threat to the United States. DEA suspects Sicilian families of reconnecting with their American branches to merchandise heroin produced in the laboratories that were recently seized or in three equally sophisticated labs that DEA believes may be operating in Sicily.

Penetrating the Sicilian families will be much more difficult and dangerous, though DEA has had some success. From November, 1978, through September, 1979, DEA participated in a major intelligence operation in cooperation with the Italian police in Sicily. The purpose of this effort was to locate heroin processing laboratories in Sicily and to identify major traffickers operating between Sicily and the United States. As a result of this operation, approximately $500,000 in U.S. cash, presumably intended to pay for shipments to the United States, was seized at the Palermo Airport in June 1979. In the next month, Italian officials arrested two important organized crime figures with four kilograms of Southwest Asian heroin in their possession.

Dr. Giorgio Borris Giuliano, the deputy police chief of Palermo, had taken an active interest in the prosecution of this case, and was murdered, gangland style, in July 1979. A leading judge in Sicily, who had expressed strong anti-organized crime sentiments, was also murdered there. These killings have understandably placed quite a pall on anti-narcotics operations in Sicily. There were other political assassinations committed last year by individuals associated with organized crime and altogether, some 70 gangland slayings occurred in Sicily in 1979.

The killings illustrate just a small part of the complex Sicilian-U.S. operation involved in the processing and transhipment of Southwest Asian heroin to the United States. Between December, 1977, and January, 1980, more than 50 kilograms of heroin from Palermo were seized at JFK airport alone. Twenty-four of the 50 kilograms were seized on January 16, 1980, in a case involving two members of a well-known organized crime family in the New York area. One DEA study discusses a $3.5 million transaction between New Jersey and Sicilian organized crime families. DEA and Justice Department intelligence efforts have identified direct links between four Sicilian families and the trafficking of Southwest Asian heroin into the United States, as well as direct links between those families and the two political assassinations described above.

In a meeting with the Italian Minister of Interior, it was clear that the Italian government is very aware of these "links." He is very concerned about Italy's growing role in the international transhipment of Southwest Asian heroin to the United States and the contribution that this illegal trade makes to the general lawlessness among Sicilian organized crime families. In addition, he is alarmed that Southwest Asian heroin has fomented a serious heroin epidemic in Italy itself—which now ranks second only to West Germany in per capita heroin addiction.

One U.S. Government study group that went to Italy to assist the Italians in coping with the epidemic stated that the evidence of the seriousness of the problem is manifest. "Physical evidence of possible heroin use, such as needles and syringes," the group reported, "can easily be found in the streets of Rome, Florence and other large cities." Indeed, one DEA agent told a harrowing story of one of his children playing on a beach in Italy and coming to him with a needle sticking out of his leg that the boy had picked up on the beach.

IX. INITIATIVES

Will the International Drug Trade ever be completely wiped out? . . . "not in my lifetime." (Mathea Falco, Assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics Matters, responding to a reporter's question in U.S. News & World Report, December 25, 1979.)

This report documents the existence of a substantial new threat to the United States, if not the entire West. This country is about to face a massive influx of Southwest Asian heroin, which, if unchecked, will feed a large heroin addict population and cause a concomitant rise in street crime and related social disarray. Indeed, it is arguable that if we do not disrupt the new Sicilian Connection, we may face a heroin epidemic and a crime wave reminiscent of what this country experienced in the early 1970's.

While recognizing the severity of this potential threat, this report also makes a strong case for candor and caution in suggesting policies and initiatives to cope with the international traffic in heroin. Assistant secretary of State Mathea Falco's conclusions, grim as they are, are thoroughly consistent with the findings of this report. There simply are not any short-term, politically realistic solutions to the problem of heroin addiction in this country. The major disruptions in international trafficking which have occurred in the last decade have been largely influenced by fortuitous events; a drought in Asia, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, a drought in Mexico.

That observation is not meant to suggest that carefully considered international initiatives involving cooperating governments like Mexico and Turkey cannot successfully take advantage of fortuitous events. However, it is absolutely essential that the American people understand that the growing of opium, whether by the Pathans in Pakistan or the Turks in the Afyon Province of Turkey, and the trafficking and processing of the heroin in parts of Turkey, by the Kurds in Iran or by the Sicilians and Corsicans in the Mediterranean, often reflect deep-seated problems of poverty, political insurgency and political instability. These are not problems which our foreign policy can solve in a single year, a single decade or perhaps even in this century.

Indeed, quasi-official complicity in the heroin trade that hinders resolution of the international problem (e.g., as is alleged about the Bulgarian agency, KINTEX) may not be subject to unilateral action at all. We must develop an international strategy to "manage" this problem, exploiting as best we can the political and environmental conditions in a particular growing or transhipment area. In the long run, we should seek a system of multilateral initiatives—a world strategy—which will permit us to exploit fortuitous events when and where they occur. When a drought occurs in Southwest Asia, the U.N. can move in adequate income substitution programs to encourage farmers to give up opium cultivation. The mass emigration of the Pathan poppy farmers caused by the Afghan war creates an opportunity for income substitution. Of course, bilateral arrangements with the various producing and transhipping countries can strengthen whatever multilateral initiatives we develop.

The recommendations that follow are necessarily tentative. They are intended to serve more as an agenda for further discussion—in the context of investigative hearings in the Criminal Justice Subcommittee planned for the late summer—and not as a final set of policies. The recommendations fall into five basic categories: (a) dampening U.S. demand for heroin; (b) developing a more coherent federal strategy; (c) strengthening the Justice Department's response to organized crime; (d) developing a more coherent long-term international strategy, and; (e) adopting a set of bilateral initiatives aimed at stopping Southwest Asian heroin at production and transhipment points.

A. Dampening U.S. demand for heroin

The American people must understand that the best way to disrupt the international trade in illegal drugs is to reduce the illegal demand for heroin in the United States. It is hard to disagree with the Turkish officials who argued that, "so long as illicit demand continues, illicit production will definitely be carried on . . ." It is this powerful, insatiable demand that makes the same heroin worth a few thousand dollars in Southwest Asia worth a quarter of a million dollars on the streets of New York. Such staggering profits make international trafficking worth almost any risk and render it practically invulnerable to law enforcement. As long as all the heroin needed by America's addict population can be supplied from a hundred square miles of land beyond any government's control, we must recognize that, inevitably, we will waste much rhetoric, foreign aid and political prestige demanding action of governments that they simply cannot deliver. Therefore, the first two recommendations pertain to reducing demand:

Recommendation I: The Congress should resist efforts to reduce the amount of Federal money now available to State and local governments for treating heroin addicts.

The recent budget-cutting fever in the Congress has threatened the 90,000 treatment slots provided by the Department of Health and Human Services to State and local governments. Cutting back funding for treatment slots at a time when we are faced with a major new heroin threat risks smoothing the way for the wave of Southwest Asian heroin.

Recommendation II: The abolition of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, although unavoidable within the context of the current effort to balance the budget, should not be carried out in such a manner as to undercut effective criminal justice programs designed to treat addicts who commit street crimes.

The Treatment Alternatives to Street Crime (TASC) program, developed by LEAA in 1972, has proven itself effective at identifying and then treating criminals with heroin addiction problems. Other results of the TASC program are a direct reduction in the incidence of street crime committed by heroin addicts as well as a substantial reduction in the demand for heroin in those cities where TASC has been implemented.

B. Developing a more coherent federal strategy

The next recommendation concerns the central role of the Federal Government in coordinating a national and international strategy for combatting international trafficking.

In 1972, Congress mandated the development of an annual strategy statement by the Executive Branch concerning drug abuse. The Strategy Council on Drug Abuse at the White House is charged with the development of that strategy, and the National Narcotics Intelligence Consumers' Committee is an interagency unit established to digest the intelligence upon which the strategy is based. The role of these two interagency bodies must be seriously reexamined. Although each has provided significant information and advice, overall performance and impact have been somewhat uneven.

For example, although both played an important role in identifying the threat of Southwest Asian heroin, neither has provided particularly forceful leadership in developing a specific Federal strategy for responding to that threat. There is strong evidence to support the contention made by two members of the Council that it is not particularly well-respected in the Federal Government as a forum for developing a coordinated strategy. The strategy itself is so general and vague that it is probably not a meaningful guide to agencies. A similar criticism might be leveled about the National Narcotics Intelligence Consumers' Committee, especially that the intelligence information it disseminates is not taken seriously by high-level decision makers. Certain administration officials argue that the rigor of the analysis performed by the Committee is not always adequate to result in useable information.

Recommendation III. Congress should consider establishing a legislative charter for an interagency narcotics coordinating body with a director appointed by the President subject to advice and consent of the Senate. The Director should have authority to review the budget of, set the priorities for, and resolve conflicts between the agencies involved in narcotics prevention and control. The Director should have the authority, after consulting with the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, to levy collection requirements on the intelligence community. The Director should be required to issue an annual strategy statement that is both public and classified that provides specific direction to the relevant agencies.

C. Strengthening the Justice Department's response to organized crime

The Sicilian Connection will be as sophisticated as any of the major trafficking networks we have confronted in the past. As a recent GAO report pointed out, we are dealing with merchandising systems of immense size and complexity. The National Narcotics Intelligence Consumers' Committee estimates that annual illicit drug sales exceed $45 billion, which, for illustration, is six times the gross revenue of the whole A&P grocery chain. A recent Treasury Department report explained that A&P requires 3,000 stores, 100,000 employees and $200 million in working capital. Clearly, heroin trafficking networks moving billions of dollars worth of Southwest Asian heroin are likely to be large and complex. Recent DEA intelligence suggests that Sicilian systems for merchandising heroin in the U.S. may involve dozens, if not hundreds, of individuals and transactions measured in the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Although DEA produces the best intelligence on organized crime and its involvement in narcotics trafficking, recent Criminal Justice Subcommittee ovesight hearings indicate that the agency and its parent, the Department of Justice, are not well prepared to meet the threat of a sophisticated new Sicilian Connection. A recent report by GAO correctly concluded that the Federal program directed at major drug trafficking networks is "not effectively carried out." GAO blamed "lack of expertise, little overall direction, shifting priorities, and legal obstacles."

As suggested earlier in this report, DEA and the Justice Department generally have achieved, as one Justice official admitted, a "dismal record" in attacking the financial empires and the merchandising networks of the illegal drug trade. That is a primary reason why major violators can preserve their networks and resources and, in some cases, continue to operate them from prison. The Subcommittee on Criminal Justice will conduct further hearings on the subject of financial investigations in the summer of 1980.

Recommendation IV: It is absolutely essential that the Federal government give immediate attention to more effective investigation of financial assets and more effective use of the tools Congress has given the Executive Branch in the Criminal and Civil Forfeiture Statutes.

Recommendation V: The General Accounting Office's recent recommendation concerning DEA's use of intelligence in operational law enforcement, especially as it pertains to the Central Tactical (CENTAC) program, should be given very serious consideration by both DEA and the Congress. It is absolutely essential that DEA develop a more effective strategy for using its resources and its intelligence against major organized crime networks.

By its very nature, traditional organized crime is highly centralized and very difficult to penetrate. And, as the GAO recently pointed out, DEA is not proficient in conspiracy investigations. As recent Criminal Justice Subcommittee hearings have indicated, DEA delegates to local office management of its major investigations, even those with complex interstate and international components. Rarely are investigations managed at headquarters, which ought to have a broader range of information available on any particular conspiracy. DEA should be developing highly sophisticated centralized strategies at its Washington headquarters, directing the best talent available at this new Sicilian Connection.

DEA personnel abroad are generally very competent and effective government officials. While centralization of investigative management is, as mentioned above, a worthy goal, one questions the wisdom of reductions in DEA presence in Europe as recently mandated by OMB. This seems especially contradictory at a time when the United States is asking West Germany, England, France and Italy to increase their international narcotics control efforts.

Recommendation VI: DEA presence in Europe should not be reduced but rather increased, and to the extent possible, working conditions and salaries of DEA personnel abroad should be at least made competitive with other foreign service personnel of equal rank and stature.

D. Developing A More Coherent Long-Term International Strategy

In terms of international initiatives, the United States must invest its energies primarily in developing a multilateral program which will create the realistic hope of ending illicit opium production. That multilateral program must begin with some modest initial measures such as those proposed at the NATO meeting last fall and incorporated in the following three recommendations.

Recommendation VII: A serious effort should be undertaken to develop a better international data base on the exact dimensions of narcotics abuse in all countries in the world, especially in the industrialized West. A determined effort should be made to get all NATO allies to join the United States in its initiative to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development to create an internationally respected base of data on the magnitude of the drug problem facing each country.

The United States must recognize that economic development in the under-developed regions of the world, especially in politically troubled areas like the Northwest Provinces of Pakistan, the Kurdish areas of Iran, and parts of Eastern Turkey, probably provides the ultimate solution to the illicit growth of opium. However, we must be exceedingly careful that economic development not exacerbate the problems we are trying to resolve (e.g., irrigation projects are extremely important, but not if newly arable land is used for opium cultivation).

Recommendation VIII: The American foreign policy establishment should make a more serious effect to pursue our government's proposal to the Development Assistance Committee of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development to include narcotics control as a factor in bilateral and multilateral assistance programs. The United States has proposed that such assistance programs should deliberately exclude opium production from irrigation projects and other agricultural programs they sponsor.

The centerpiece of any truly international effort must be the United Nations. The most important United Nations instrument in this area is the Fund for Drug Abuse Control (UNFDAC). Its, nonpolitical nature has been especially useful in formerly nonaligned Afghanistan, as well as in traditional law enforcement, crop substitution and research in South Asia and other opium-producing areas of the world. A recent study conducted by the Bureau of International Narcotics Matters at the State Department concluded that, besides West Germany and the United States, contributions for narcotics control assistance are "modest". With respect to such effort and assistance in Southwest Asia, they are non-existent.

Recommendation IX: The United States should be more aggressive in asking other Western countries to increase contributions to the Fund, and encouraging the World Bank and other multilateral development banks to support narcotics control-related development assistance.

The State Department's Bureau of International Narcotics Matters had done exceedingly well in its limited budget. However, we agree with the tenor of recent GAO criticism of that offices's failure to develop a general stratgey on international initiatives.

Recommendation X: The Bureau of International Narcotics Matters should develop a comprehensive stategy paper on all matters described above, but in particular, on how other Western allies might join together in an international war against illegal drugs.

The General Accounting Office suggests the convening of a conference of high-level representatives from victim countries, primarily NATO countries. The French have been particularly leery about participating in such NATO-based initiatives and still prefer the European program proposed by former President Georges Pompidou. The so-called Pompidou group excludes the United States and has not been particularly effective in curbing the recent European heroin epidemic. However, discussions with Italian and German officials indicate that interior ministers from those two countries and other European countries are meeting regularly. European cooperation is evidently not only possible but becoming a fact.

Recommendation XI: The United States should take advantage of the present environment of cooperation in Europe, and if possible, attempt to join in a Western European conference on the subject. There should be at least four items on the agenda of such a conference:

1. Identification of source and transshipment countries with which individual participants might develop bilateral arrangements to curb illicit activity. For example, the French or the Swedes might be able to accomplish more with the Iranians than we could.

2. Development of initiatives which would curb heroin laboratory and transshipment activity in European countries, especially Italy and France.

3. Assessment of the drug treatment and data collection needs of Western European countries and pooling information on these subjects.

4. Exploration of joint initiatives which might be undertaken to freeze assets held by international traffickers or to halt sizable international cash transactions by the traffickers.

E. Bilateral initiatives in countries where Southwest Asian heroin is produced or transshipped

Pakistan is a primary source country for Southwest Asian heroin. Bilateral assistance from the United States or any other victim country or multilateral assistance by the U.N. or any other agency, would be useful in facilitating enforcement of President Zia's recent opium-growing ban. U.S. relations with the government of Pakistan and use of goverment A.I.D. money to assist in enforcing the ban had been complicated until recently by the $400 million military aid package for Pakistan proposed by the United States in response to fear of Soviet invasion of Pakistan. Since that arrangement stalled, the Pakistanis have actually been more interested in talking with the U.S. government about bilateral aid arrangements in the narcotics field.

At present there is a general prohibition on using A.I.D. money in Pakistan for most purposes because of the so-called Symington Amendment, which prohibits sending funds to countries developing nuclear weapons. However, there has always been an exception to that rule for narcotics control. Therefore, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the State Department have been working on amendments to the Foreign Assistance Act that would provide additional funds for rural development and narcotics control on the assumption that such money might be used in the Northwest Frontier Province where most of the opium is grown.

Fear of disrupting the proposed military aid package with the Pakistanis and an attitude of general fiscal restraint led the Administration to propose no additional expenditures of A.I.D. monies in Pakistan for this fiscal year. This occurred despite Assistant Secretary of State Mathea Falco's testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee on March 14, 1980, that control of Southwest Asian heroin at its source is a number one priority.

However, the investigation underlying this report revealed an accumulation of a considerable amount of American A.I.D. counterpart funds in Pakistani bank accounts. Under the Symington Amendment, those funds cannot be spent for any purpose other than narcotics control. In the recent markup of the Foreign Assistance Act, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee authorized the expenditure of up to $10 million of the accumulated funds for rural development in Pakistan to provide substitute income for opium-growing Pathan farmers. The money could be used for rural development projects such as road building—a sorely needed improvement in the Northwest Province areas of Pakistan. In simple terms, Pathan farmers who otherwise would be growing opium for income would build roads instead.

Apparently, the Pakistani government has expressed interest in using the funds for that purpose. Of course, this would only be a short-term solution to the general problem of finding substitute sources of income for members of the Pathan tribal groups who otherwise have no ready source of cash income. A permanent solution will obviously require great patience and commitment from the United States over a number of years to resolve the underlying economic and social problems—but a new U.S. heroin epidemic is imminent, and short-term measures are crucial to combatting it.

Recommendation XII: The Congress should enact the amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act authorizing expenditure of $10 million in counterpart funds in Pakistan. The State Department should move swiftly to develop a plan with the Pakistanis to implement an income substitution program in the Northwest Provinces.

Turkey is the first non-source victim country in the Southwest Asian heroin trail. We are satisfied that a sophisticated law enforcement and diplomatic program by our government and the government of Turkey might have a substantial impact.

I agree with DEA agents in Turkey who state that the primary goal of DEA's operation in Turkey and its liaison with the Turkish National Police should be to identify major traffickers as they leave for Western Europe. Furthermore, there is clear consensus that some effort should be made with Turkish customs to gain more effective control over the exports leaving from Istanbul airports, seaports, trainyards and across the other major land arteries through Istanbul.

Recommendation XIII: DEA should continue to work vigorously with Turkish National Police to fill the large intelligence gaps concerning trafficking in the rural areas we have identified in this report and with Turkish customs to increase its effectiveness in Istanbul.

The local militia force in Turkey primarily responsible for security in rural areas, known as the Jandarma, is potentially an important part of efforts to halt trafficking in the Turkish countryside—particularly if DEA and the Turkish government make greater efforts to sensitize them to the narcotics problem.

Recommendation XIV: I agree with DEA and Turkish officials that there should be greater emphasis on developing the Jandar-ma's narcotics control capability. Also, the ability of the Jandarma—especially its airwing—to monitor leakage from legal opium production into illegal use as well as the extent of illicit opium cultivation should be upgraded.

The Balkan Countries and Greece may be the most important transshipment points for Southwest Asian heroin to both Western Europe and the United States. The role of the customs agencies in Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and Greece is of critical importance. The Yugoslavs have been doing an outstanding job—with the largest seizures of Southwest Asian heroin by any European country. However, the allegations concerning the possibly sinister role of the Bulgarian KINTEX organization are indeed disturbing. The effectiveness of Greek customs at the Yugoslav, Bulgarian and Turkish borders and at the Volos ferry from Syria is also a matter of deep concern.

Recommendation XV: The Senate Intelligence Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee should query the intelligence community and the State Department on the most recent information on the role of the KINTEX in gun and drug smuggling with the KURDS and elsewhere in the Middle East. If there is substance to the allegation, an intensive diplomatic initiative ought to be undertaken to thwart that activity. One possibility might involve the Turks who are developing bilateral narcotics initiatives with the Bulgarians and have alleged in international forums that there is a traffic in trading guns for heroin among insurgent groups in Turkey.

Recommendation XVI: If a solidly documented DEA report establishes the role of Greece as a transit point for Southwest Asian heroin en route to the clandestine laboratories in Italy and France, a permanent DEA presence should be established in Athens to help the Greeks improve their customs operation.

Italy has assumed increasing importance in the connection between the poppy fields of Southwest Asia and the streets of American cities and towns. As in Ankara, the DEA office in Rome is of extremely high professional competence and has an excellent relationship with the host government. Indeed, the DEA office in Rome may enjoy a closer working relationship with the Interior Ministry than does our diplomatic corps. In fact, the State Department narcotics coordinator for Rome does not seem to take an interest in his responsibilities and he did not even meet with Congressional staff during the recent visit. This matter should receive the immediate attention of Ambassador Gardiner and the Bureau of International Narcotics Matters.

The effectiveness of the Rome DEA office was evidenced recently by the very large laboratory seizures in San Remo and Milan. Discussions with DEA, State Department and Italian officials clearly indicate that the Italians are taking this problem seriously. They are committing substantial resources to reorganizing their narcotics treatment capabilities. They are also seriously considering suggestions made by our government and outside experts that their law enforcement operations be reorganized along the lines of the U.S. government's DEA in order to more effectively combat the illicit narcotics trade—especially the Sicilian organized crime link to the United States.

Such a reorganization would assist DEA in filling some of the obvious intelligence gaps acknowledged by DEA officials. For example, we still do not know exactly how Southwest Asian morphine base is getting to Sicily, the location of the major heroin laboratories in Sicily, or the modus operandi of the trafficking to the United States.

Recommendation XVII: The Italian government should again be approached about sending a high-level delegation to the United States to see how DEA is organized and how we might help them reorganize their drug enforcement operations. In the course of those discussions and through our DEA office in Rome, we should continue trying to fill the three intelligence gaps described above.

Mr. BIDEN. Thank you very much, Mr. President.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as much as I hate to confess it publicly, I must say that I am about to decide that no one wants to speak about abortion today. If that is the case, I intend to go on to some other considerations.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the majority leader in taking us out. I had hoped we would have what the leader has called a spirited debate this afternoon, but I would be prepared to go ahead on Monday with a spirited debate.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 2:05 p.m., in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS—VETO

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I reluctantly voted to sustain President Reagan's veto of H.R. 6863, the supplemental appropriations bill. I say reluctantly because my vote is not an endorsement of the administration's budget priorities as outlined in the President's veto message. I do not, for example, think we need all of the military spending originally requested by the President. Rather, my vote against the supplemental appropriations bill is a vote against a Federal budget and Federal spending which will be in the red by close to $112 billion this 1982 fiscal year.

Within 15 minutes of the Senates vote the stock and futures markets have reacted negatively. Overriding the President sent the wrong signals to the financial markets that determine interest rates, long-term corporate investment, and ultimately the future of our economy.

We can hardly be serious about the constitutional amendment to balance the Federal budget when we continue to enact spending bills far in excess of our Federal income.

HISTORIC BEAUFORT, S.C.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, history books abound with information about early settlements in the New World like Jamestown, Va., and Plymouth, Mass. Often, however, little is said about the historic coastal city of Beaufort, S.C., which, in 1520, became the site of the second landing of Europeans in North America.

The history of Beaufort is a story of the struggle of people against nature, and of the harsh realities of settling a wilderness. The odds against these early settlers were only matched by their courage and willingness to succeed.

The residents of Beaufort established a prosperous life, only to see it vanish during the adversity of the War Between the States. The area remained economically distressed until the middle of the 20th century.

Little did the good citizens of Beaufort know that the same natural beauty that attracted the Spanish, French, and English settlements in this beautiful coastal area would later attract throngs of tourists and retirees. Located on the coast between Charleston, S.C., and Savannah, Ga., its location also provides a strategic location for military bases.

The community of Beaufort, which at one time was impoverished and seemed to have little hope of survival, is today flourishing and enjoying prosperity, thanks to its agriculture and the bounty of its surrounding Atlantic Ocean waters. Shrimp, crabs, oysters, and other sea life teem in the waters around Beaufort and have made the area attractive to industry and business, as well as to tourists.

Beaufort can boast of a remarkable history. It was the location of the first attempted North American settlement by the French in 1562, and of other early settlements by the Spanish and French.

Mr. President, the people of Beaufort can take great pride in the history of this fine port city. Researchers from the Institute of Archeology and Anthropology at the University of South Carolina have given the citizens of Beaufort County even more reason to be proud of this historic area. Three years ago, these researchers began an excavation project to uncover the lost city of Santa Elena.

89-059 O-86-21 (Pt. 17)

Santa Elena was established by the Spanish in 1566 to help convert the local Indians to Christianity, and it served as protection for Spanish treasure fleets on their voyages from Mexico to Europe during the era of great competition between the French and the Spanish for control of the New World.

It is interesting to note that the settlement of Santa Elena is over half a century older than the Pilgrim settlement in Plymouth, Mass., and 40 years older than Jamestown in Virginia.

Two forts were built on the settlement to protect the Spanish, who had colonized that area, from enemy attack. The first, San Felipe, built in 1570, was attacked and captured by Indians in 1576. The second fort, San Marcos, was built in 1577 and abandoned in 1587. It appears that the Spanish were disturbed at the news that Sir Francis Drake had attacked and burned St. Augustine in Florida. Fearing he might make his way up the coast to San Marcos, the Spanish fled from the settlement. Thus, the occupation of this area came to an end.

Today, the land where Santa Elena stood is owned by the U.S. Marine Corps, and is part of their training center called Parris Island. Researchers continue to work diligently to find the entire settlement. They have made great strides so far, and are to be commended for their outstanding work. I look forward to hearing more about their findings and am excited about the prospects of their search.

Certainly, Beaufort and its surrounding islands have witnessed a history of conflict that contrasts vividly with the natural serenity of the area. From the time the Spaniards first sailed into the harbor of Port Royal, more than 450 years ago, up to the present day, the people have experienced war, hurricanes, fires, epidemics and the vicissitudes of economic fortune, in their struggle to save their environment and the land that they loved.

Mr. President, the people of Beaufort are proud and strong. They enjoy a rich heritage and have not forgotten the struggles their forefathers encountered during their fight to make Beaufort a strong city. Surely, they can take pride in their past and they can look forward to a prosperous future.

This beautiful city, shaded peacefully by moss-laden oaks and overlooking broad expanses of winding rivers, is truly an historian's paradise. I feel it is important that more Americans become aware of the significant part the area of Beaufort County played in the history of our great country.

Mr. President, in order to share more of the history of Beaufort County with my colleagues, I ask unanimous consent that a brochure printed by Dr. John J. Duffy, professor of history at the University of South Carolina, be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the brochure was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A BRIEF HISTORY OF BEAUFORT

(By John J. Duffy)

The history of Beaufort is a story of the struggle of men against nature, Indians, Spaniards, Frenchmen, and fellow countrymen. Beaufortonians established prosperity in the face of adversity, only to see it dissolve in the Civil War. Many false dawns of hope followed defeat in the Civil War, but, in the main, the area remained in economic distress until the middle of the twentieth century. The same natural beauty which attracted first the Spanish and then the French and English to its shores would in the twentieth-century attract tourists and retirees. The strategic location, which over the years had made it vulnerable to enemies, would make it a suitable location for military bases. The present prosperity of the area is based upon these factors as well as agriculture and the products of the surrounding waters.

The first European to visit the area, Francisco Cordillo, landed in 1520 on what is now Port Royal Island and named the cape Santa Elena. Recognizing the strategic importance of the area, the Spanish in 1557 attempted to develop a fort at Santa Elena, but the project failed. The French Admiral Gaspar DeColigny dispatched Jean Ribaut and a group of volunteer Huguenot settlers to Port Royal in 1562. They settled on a small island lying between two rivers which is now called Parris Island. There, Ribaut built Charlesfort on the northern bank of Ballast Creek. Ribaut left the settlers and returned to France which was then in the throes of a religious war. Hostilities kept Ribaut from returning to the aid of the thirty Frenchmen left at Charlesfort. In spite of the aid given them by the Indians who were subjects of one King Audusta, the tiny garrison of Frenchmen ran short on food and despaired of Ribaut's return. They built a small ship and set sail for France. When found by a passing vessel, the men had run out of food and were desperate. Thus ended in tragedy the second attempt to colonize the area which is now Beaufort.

After the collapse of the French expedition, the Spanish returned to the area in April of 1566 under Menendez and built Fort San Felipe on the southeastern point of Parris Island. They left a garrison of 110 men. In accordance with Spanish custom, priests were dispatched to the area in 1569 to Christianize Indian inhabitants of the area. The Pardo expedition, one of the most significant expeditions in North America, explored the interior as far as what is now Alabama in 1567. The Spanish remained in the area until an Indian rebellion in 1576 drove them back to St. Augustine. With the burning of St. Augustine by Sir Francis Drake in 1586, Spain withdrew from Port Royal. The missionaries continued work in the area well into the seventeenth-century.

After the restoration of King Charles II in 1660, English interest in establishing colonies on the Northern American continent was rekindled. William Hilton was dispatched in 1663 from the Barbados to explore the continent. Hilton, after whom Hilton Head Island was named, landed in the Port Royal area and his report was highly complimentary, praising the fertility of the soil, the healthful environment, the abundance of fish and game. As had Ribaut a hundred years before, he described the Port Royal area as the finest location for settlement on the Carolina coast. According to Hilton, "The Ayr is clear and sweet, the countrey very pleasant and delightful; and we would wish, that all they that want a happy settlement of our English Nation, were well transported thither." In 1666, the Barbadian official Robert Sanford sailed along the coast to Port Royal and arrived at the same conclusion.

In the spring of 1679 the colonizing expedition from Barbados under the command of Governor Sayle landed in the Port Royal area. Here the first government of South Carolina was actually elected. The freemen chose five council members to work with the five deputies of the Proprietors. Beaufort might well have become the site of the first colony if it had not been for the guile of the Cacique of Kiawah. This Indian leader extolled the advantages of the land to the north on the banks of the Ashley. The Indian's advice, as well as fear of possible Spanish attack, led the expedition to proceed north where the colony was established at Charleston.

In 1648 a group of Scots established a settlement at Stuarttown on Port Royal Island. The area was still being bitterly contested between Spain and England and in 1686 the Spaniards destroyed the Scottish settlement. The activities of the Spanish and their Indian allies in the area frustrated any attempts of English colonization in the Port Royal area in the next generation. This fighting in the area between the Spanish and the English was only part of a great world struggle for supremacy. The success of Colonel James Moore's expeditions against the Spanish in northern Florida in 1704 relieved some of the pressure on the English in the Port Royal area, and in 1712 the legislature laid out plans for a town to be known as Beaufort. As early as 1711 a settler in the Beaufort area established a name for himself in the colonies in the intermittent Indian wars. Colonel John Barnwell commanded a small body of troops and with the help of Colonel James Moore, the younger, destroyed the Tuscarora Indians around New Bern. Colonel Barnwell was thereafter know as "Tuscarora Jack."

The town of Beaufort was three years old when a new and terrible threat appeared. In April of 1717 the Yemassees, who had initially been friendly to English colonists, rose in rebellion against them and attacked the Port Royal settlement. They massacred every person they could find. The Indians were permanently subdued in 1717 but the continuing threat of the Spanish to the area caused the settlement to develop slowly. As late as 1721 there were only 30 whites and 40 black inhabitants in St. Helena Parish.

St. Helena's Church was built in 1724–1725 in Beaufort. The numerous creeks and rivers separating Beaufort from the rest of the settlement led to the establishment of Prince William's Parish in 1745. The church serving this area was built at Sheldon. In 1747, St. Peter's Parish was separated from St. Helena's and a church built in Purrysburg. The last of the parishes carved from St. Helena's was St. Luke's Parish in May of 1767 which served the area between the New River and Port Royal Sound, including Hilton Head. Although the area was not separated from St. Helena's Parish, in 1748 a "Chapel of Ease" was erected on St. Helena Island to serve its inhabitants who found it difficult to travel to Beaufort.

Rice culture proved unsuited to the Sea Islands is this period. After 1740 the development of indigo provided a money crop which was perfectly adapted to the geography of the area. The evidence of growing prosperity in the region after 1740 is great. In this period, however, one should not imagine the development of great plantations. Rather, the Beaufort planters of the eighteenth-century lived on a relatively small number of acres. A study made of the local militia rolls showed that only sixteen Beaufortontians were listed as owning more than 1000 acres and only one with more than 2000 acres. Most planters owned between 5 and 15 slaves. Several of them owned herds of cattle and other livestock. Important landholding families of the period were the Barnwells, the Middletons, the Heywards, the Deveauxs, the Wiggs, and the Bulls.

With the triumph of the British cause over the French and Spanish in 1763, the Port Royal area prospered, greatly aided by the bounty paid to indigo growers within the empire. Thus, when the Revolution broke out, the citizens of the Beaufort area proved uninterested in the revolutionary cause or actually hostile to it. Shipbuilding was extremely important in Beaufort in the eighteenth-century and the industry centered around Port Royal. In 1743 William Bull described Port Royal to the lords of trade as the "most commodious harbour in the province."

The conservatism of the Beaufort district in the Revolution can be explained in terms of its prosperity, the importance of the indigo bounty, and the strong influence of the relatives of Lieutenant Governor William Bull, Jr. and of the recently arrived Scottish merchants within the colony. With the evacuation of Port Royal Island by the Americans in February, 1779, the British moved into the area and secured control. What enthusiasm that had existed for the Revolutionary cause now completely evaporated. Although the records of the patriots from the Beaufort area in the Revolution is somewhat unclear, Beaufort produced one of the outstanding leaders of the Tories in the person of Colonel John Deveaux. Deveaux at the end of the Revolution captured the entire Spanish garrison in a bold attack on the Spanish in the Barbados, thus assuring that those islands remained a part of the British Empire. The war left the Beaufort area in wreckage.

With the development of Sea Island cotton after 1790 Beaufortonians recovered and by 1800 were entering into a phase of their history which has been characterized by one historian as the "Periclean age of Beaufort." This lasted from 1800 to 1860. It was the Beaufort of this period which the historian Edward McCrady described as the "wealthiest, most aristocratic, most cultivated town of its size in America." The great plantations which characterized the period in South Carolina appeared in the Beaufort area at this time.

The English scientist Charles Lyell, who visited the area in 1845, described the passage of his ship through "the winding mazes of a most intricate channel called the Beaufort River." The low sand islands and mainland covered with oaks, long-leaf pines and palmettos were inhabited by cattle, game and wild ducks. He noted the bounteous supply of oysters. To his eye this constituted a "novel and curious scene."

Lyell left an idyllic portrait of the town of Beaufort where the planters had established their summer homes to escape the heat of the interior. Each villa, he noted, was "shaded by a verandah, surrounded by beautiful live oaks and orange trees laden with fruit."

Among the buildings which so charmed the Englishman in 1845 would have been the Old Barnwell House dating from 1733, the Beaufort Arsenal (1795), the home built by Chancellor DeSaussure in 1795, St. Helena's Church, the Classical Revival building which housed the Baptists, built in 1844, the La Fayette Building, the De Treville House, the Anchorage, Tabby Manse, and other equally imposing structures.

In the 1850's the wealthy planters refurbished many of the other structures and added others equally imposing. Among the great homes dating from this period are the Tidalholm, the Greek Revival Waterhouse Home, the Porter-Danner House, Paul Hamilton's Home, the Oaks, and the Crofut House.

The imposing Beaufort College Building dates from 1852. The Beaufort College provided preparatory training for the young men of the area from 1795 until the beginning of the Civil War. The President of the College Board. Dr. Thomas Fuller, one of the wealthiest men of the area, owning over 360 slaves on three plantations, also served as the Commissioner of Free Schools.

Large libraries were recorded to have existed in the area including one owned by Thomas Aston Coffin at "Coffin's Point." An even larger collection of books was owned by Edgar Fripp at Seaside Plantation on St. Helena Island. Similarly, the records of the Union forces indicate that there was a very fine library containing books and old papers dating back to 1812 at the Pope Plantation on Hilton Head Island. The largest library in the area probably belonged to Robert W. Barnwell, who served as a U.S. Congressman and U.S. Confederate Senator as well as the president of South Carolina College. Unfortunately, most of these libraries were destroyed.

Beaufort planters ardently supported the secessionist cause. In fact, the most prominent Beaufortonian of the period, Robert Barnwell Rhett, former Congressman and Senator, has been called by his chief biographer, the "Father of Secession." Rhett, a fiery orator, was considered too implusive and too fanatic by the leaders of the new Confederacy, which he had done so much to establish, and his last years were ones of bitter resentment. Political figures who came from the Beaufort area in this period included William J. Grayson, a U.S. Congressman, and Henry DeSaussure, the director of the United States Mint.

Several months after the Civil War began in November of 1861, the Federal fleet under the command of Commodore S. F. Dupont landed 12,000 soldiers under General Thomas Sherman and entered Port Royal after reducing Forts Walker on Hilton Head and Beauregard at Bay Point. At approximately the same time, General Robert E. Lee took command of the Department of South Carolina and Georgia and determined that he would be unable to hold the numerous entrances and islands on the Carolina coast. He abandoned all the positions except for those essential to the defense of Charleston. Shortly thereafter, the land of the great planters was seized by the Union forces as "abandoned lands" and distributed to the black inhabitants and soldiers or bought by the government at low prices. In November 1862, the first slave troops mustered into the federal service enrolled in Beaufort under the command of Thomas Wentworth Higgins, an abolitionist from Massachusetts and colonel of the "first regiment of South Carolina Volunteers." According to the South Carolina historian, D. D. Wallace, the black soldiers led by white commissioned officers did some "splendid fighting with heavy losses against fortified positions along the coast." The Port Royal area remained in Union hands for the rest of the war. In fact, the right wing of Sherman's army entered South Carolina through Beaufort, then marched inland and from there joined the left wing in its movement to Columbia.

Reconstruction had actually begun in the Beaufort area long before the rest of South Carolina. It is not surprising that some of the more remarkable leaders of the Reconstruction period came from Beaufort. The most famous of these black leaders was Robert Smalls, and escaped slave, who actually took over the Confederate ship, The Planter, and surrendered it to the Union forces. Smalls earned a commission in the Union navy and piloted several Union gun boats in seventeen battles. Elected to the Constitutional Convention of 1867, he played an important role in it. He was instrumental in South Carolina's ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. Elected to Congress in 1876, he served until 1886 and was, in fact, the last black Congressman from South Carolina. The "king of Beaufort County," Smalls played a leading role in the black community in South Carolina in this critical period. He was also a man of great humanity, known for his kindness to his former master's family for whose son he secured an appointment to Annapolis. Smalls was also instrumental in securing a naval station for the Port Royal area.

Cotton production recovered gradually and the crop of 1879 was the largest ever grown. However, economic hard times returned in the 90's and the Sea Island growers sought tariff protection.

The Beaufort area also suffered a devastating blow from nature in the Hurricane of 1893. Winds of a hundred miles and hour combined with high tides covered the islands with ten to twelve feet of water. Estimated loss of life was as high as 14,000. The ensuing suffering was vividly described by Joel Chandler Harris, creator of "Uncle Remus," in Scribners Magazine. A large ship was actually left aground in the middle of a ruined Bay Street.

Beaufort produced a remarkable state senator with wide influence in the person of Senator Neils Christensen. In 1905, the twenty-nine year old Christensen, who was also the editor of the Beaufort Gazette, began a crusade against the state dispensary, which by that time was riddled by graft and had become extremely unpopular in the state. Christensen's opposition to the dispensary brought him into conflict with one of the most powerful politicians in South Carolina, Coleman Livingston Blease. In spite of threats against his life and vindictive personal charges by Blease that his father had commanded Negro troops, Christensen persisted in his efforts and the dispensary was ultimately abolished.

The establishment of the Marine Corps Recruit Depot at Parris Island during World War I brought a brief flurry of prosperity to the Beaufort area. The introduction of truck farming to replace the disappearing Sea Island cotton also contributed to the revival of prosperity. Agricultural depression, the boll weevil, and the disappearance of Sea Island cotton brought economic depression to South Carolina and Beaufort county long before 1929.

In 1947, Port Royal was transferred from the jurisdiction of the Savannah United States Engineers office to the Charleston United States District Engineer. The newly created South Carolina State Ports Authority attempted to secure federal funds for improving the harbor. The state legislature established the Port Royal Authority in 1954. The local authority jointly with the state authority, congressional representatives, state leaders and local interest secured an appropriation of $500,000 from Congress in 1955 for the dredging of the Port Royal area. In 1958 State Pier 21 was opened at Port Royal by the Authority. Beaufort further profited from the establishment of the Marine Air Station as an auxiliary and later as a major military base. Improved roads and the building of crucial bridges in the lower part of the county opened up the surrounding Sea Island for development. The influx of retired persons into the area further enhanced the economy. Beaufort enjoyed the highest rate of growth of any county in the state in the period 1950-60. The county has no heavy industry and its present prosperity is based upon the military presence, service industries, retirees, tourism, truck farming, and fishing.

It is heartening to note that much of Beaufort's wealth in the third quarter of the twentieth-century has been used to restore the grandeur of old homes and buildings dating from its "Periclean Age." As a result Beaufort is one of the most attractive towns on the Atlantic coast.

Beaufort, South Carolina, pronounced bew-fort, and Beaufort, North Carolina, pronounced bo-fort, were named in honor of the Duke of Beaufort, pronounced bo-fort. Beaufort, North Carolina retained its original pronunciation while the South Carolina town's name was anglicized in the same way that the "beau" in beautiful was. Several explanations for this exist. One is that the 18th century pronunciation was bew-fort but historians maintain that this is not so and that the pronunciation of the name of the English noble was the same then as now. Another explanation was that sea captains pronounced the two differently to avoid confusion but this cannot be accepted since Beaufort, South Carolina as a port of destination would have been designated Port Royal. Until a better explanation is forthcoming, we simply have to attribute the anglicization of the name of Beaufort, South Carolina to common usage by the inhabitants. The change has been totally accepted and the unwary newcomer or tourist who pronounces Beaufort, bo-fort will find himself courteously corrected by the residents.

CONGRESSMAN KEITH SEBELIUS—FAREWELL TO A FRIEND

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas has just returned from a trip home, a visit which brought contrasting emotions. There was joy on Thursday, when President Reagan was the guest speaker at the Alf Landon lecture at Kansas State University. But just the day before, there was sadness, as I traveled to Norton, Kans., to say farewell to our former colleague and beloved friend Keith Sebelius. To his loving wife and countless friends, the Senator from Kansas offers his deepest sympathies.

A DEDICATED MAN

If you wanted to find a model Congressman, Keith Sebelius was your man. He was everything that a Congressman is supposed to be. He was a spirited and effective spokesman for his constitutents, never losing sight of his task in Washington: To serve the people of his district. He never forgot where he was from. In fact, he never really left. To Keith, Washington was only where he worked—his home would always be Norton, and he spent as much time in his district as was professionally possible. For more than a decade, Keith Sebelius was the proud Representative of "The Big First," a huge congressional district that takes up half the State. But the dimensions of the job did not bother Keith—he knew he could handle it. Voters agreed, electing him to six consecutive terms in the House of Representatives. Once he reached Washington, his constituents quickly realized they could not have found a more tireless and dedicated friend. Whether at home in Norton, on the road in the Big First, or at the office in Washington, Keith was accessible, understanding, and willing to work. He listened, he understood, he acted. And when Keith Sebelius was ready to speak, his colleagues on the House Agriculture Committee listened. In Congress, it does not take long to figure out which Members truly understand the issues, and there is no question Keith Sebelius understood the needs and concerns of the American farmer. Certainly, farmers have never had a better friend. The Congressman was not interested in making headlines. He simply wanted to do his work with quiet efficiency, knowing that the needs of the people always came first. If there was ambition, it was only to see that the Big First prosper.

COMPETITION BRINGS FRIENDSHIP

The Senator from Kansas is proud to say that Keith Sebelius was his Congressman, from 1969 until 1981. When this Senator first ran for Congress in 1960, his opponent in the Republican primary was Keith Sebelius. In many ways, the competition of political foes is no different from the competition waged by members of any other field of endeavor. To match a competitor, you must learn what makes them run, and you must understand their very nature. Sometimes the competition is fierce. But through such challenges you are forced to reach inside yourself and ultimately become the best that you can be. And that is a debt I owe to Keith Sebelius. This Senator won that race, but happily, from this competition, came a friendship that endured and a partnership that flourished. Later, it was Keith Sebelius who followed this Senator to Washington in 1969. I was a freshman Senator and Keith was the new man from "The Big First." Thus began a distinguished 12 years of service by the dedicated man from Norton. Oh, some might say he did not make legislative history and I guess there will be no Federal buildings bearing his name. But in the Big First he will always be a hero. Ask the farmer on the combine, ask the shopkeeper on Main Street, ask the mayor of any western Kansas town. Just ask the people. They will tell you.

HE WILL BE REMEMBERED

When we said goodby to Keith this week in his beloved Kansas hometown, one had only to look around to witness the respect accorded this good man. There was the entire Kansas congressional delegation, the Governor and many State legislators—Republicans and Democrats, alike. But above all, there were the people, always the people. They crowded into the church to say goodby to their friend. And in Topeka the flags at the Capitol hung at half staff.

Just west of Keith's hometown is a gentle lake that already bears his name. This Senator truly believes that when Kansans gaze at the peaceful waters of Keith Sebelius Lake, they will remember this good friend, and they will know he was there, and that he did make a difference. Kansas will miss him.

TOURO SYNAGOGUE COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I had the great good fortune to attend the ceremonies on the occasion of the issuance of the Touro Synagogue commemorative stamp. This stamp was unique in that it honored Touro Synagogue, the oldest synagogue in our Nation. It and its congregation have occupied an honored place in Newport, and an honored spot in the hearts of Newporters since the very day of its founding. I know I am particularly proud to be a director of the Society of Friends of Touro Synagogue.

We were honored by having Postmaster General William Bolger come personally to speak and issue the stamp. Aaron Slom, president of the Society of Friends of Touro Synagogue, did an excellent job in organizing and presiding over the day. My good friend and colleague, Senator CHARLES PERCY, was there. But I was particularly struck by the marvelous and deep-feeling words of Rabbi Theodore Lewis when he developed the point that not only should government give "to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance," but that the people must be likewise motivated.

In this regard, I ask unanimous consent that the truly eloquent words of Rabbi Lewis be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point together with the sensitive, fine speech given by Postmaster General Bolger.

There being no objection, the invocation and remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RABBI LEWIS INVOCATION

We beseech Thee, oh God, to give of Thy blessings to those who have assembled in this sacred, and historic edifice this morning. Above all, do we ask that Thou bestow Thy divine Grace on the Honorable William F. Bolger, Postmaster General of the United States. He has come here as a representative of the United States Government to inaugurate the issuance of a Touro Synagogue Commemorative Stamp. For over 25 years the Society of Friends of Touro Synagogue has importuned the Postal Service of the United States that a stamp be issued honoring this, the oldest Synagogue in the United States and the only one that has been designated as a National Historic Site.

It was to this Congregation that George Washington wrote his famous letter in which he used the immoral words "for happily the Government of the United States which gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance" words which have become the classical expression of religious liberty in America.

Our hearts are filled with joy as we join in the dedicatory exercises commemorating the issuance of the Touro Synagogue Commemorative Stamp.

By issuing this stamp, the United States Postal Service is not only honoring this venerable House of God, but is also paying tribute to the part that Jews have played in the development of this blessed land that we love. In every field of human endeavor, in art, in industry, in economics, in medicine and in law, Jews have made significant and lasting contributions to the welfare and well being of America.

Whereas Washington's eloquent words "for happily the Government of the United States which gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance" were adequate and forward looking in the 18th century, these words will not suffice for the end of the 20th century. In this modern era, if we are to overcome the divisiveness that separates the people of this land, there must be a new slogan—"for happily the Government and the people of these United States which give to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance." It is not enough if only the Government gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance, the people must be likewise motivated.

Let us, then, move on towards the realization of this ideal in our society. Thus, will we show by our attitudes and by our way of life, that the words of George Washington continue to inspire us and have become an integral part of our lives. Thus, will we give meaning and substance to this ceremony in which we participate this day.

REMARKS OF WILLIAM F. BOLGER, POSTMASTER GENERAL

(First Day of Issue Ceremony, the Touro Synagogue Stamp, the Touro Synagogue, Newport, R.I., August 22, 1982)

Thank you, and good morning, ladies and gentlemen. I am delighted to be able to share this occasion with you.

To the members of The Society of The Friends of Touro Synagogue, I commend you for your dedication to the maintenance of the oldest synagogue in North America and to the promotion of awareness of its important role in American religious liberty. I also wish you success with the Patriot's Park project.

I know how long members and friends of the Touro Synagogue have campaigned for this stamp. And I know how much it must mean to people like Rabbi Lewis, Ben Helfner, and the family of Dr. Martin Greenfield to see this come to fruition.

We of the Postal Service understand this kind of dedication because we share it.

Through our commemorative stamp and stationery programs, we have created a unique honor roll to recognize and pay tribute to the men and women who over the years have made significant contributions to this country and, indeed, to all humanity.

A good portion of our postal honor roll has honored those individuals whose valiant efforts contributed to the growth and independence of this Nation.

I think we all recognize that the birth of our Nation was brought about not by the work of one particular group of people, but rather was achieved through the courage, perseverance and dedication of individuals representing diverse ethnic and economic groups. They were individuals who—while different in many ways—shared the dream of a new Nation and confidence in its future; individuals who—while different in many ways—were united in purpose.

It was that unity of purpose that gave impetus to the Nation's independence.

In 1975, we issued four stamps in a set entitled, "Contributors to the Cause," focusing on this diversity in unity. The series commemorated the accomplishments during the Revolutionary War of four individuals of different backgrounds who were "united in a common cause." Their names were less well known than George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, John Adams and other Revolutionary heroes.

There was Sybil Ludington, a young girl barely into her teens, who rode her horse through the New York countryside rallying the militia to repel the British at Danbury, Connecticut.

There was Salem Poor, a black foot soldier who earned a citation for his courage and bravery at the Battle of Bunker Hill.

There was Peter Francisco, a Portuguese-French immigrant who served with distinction in no less than seven major battles, including the one which resulted in the British surrender at Yorktown.

And, there was the Polish-born Jewish financier, Haym Salomon, whose genius helped to finance the revolution and later helped to sustain our fledging Nation.

The four stamps called worldwide attention to the role each played so heroically during the struggle for independence.

Even more importantly, the stamps pointed out that the history of our Nation belongs to all Americans . . . that victory was achieved not merely because of individual efforts, but because of united ones, the sum total of the efforts of all who contributed to the cause.

I do not mean to imply that in unity the colonists lost their individuality. Quite the contrary is true. The varying cultures of the early colonists provided America with a rich and rewarding legacy, strengthening our Nation's economic, social, and spiritual life.

The Touro Synagogue . . . and what it stands for . . . is a graphic representation of a central part of that legacy . . . that of religious liberty. And the stamp we dedicate this morning—so handsomely designed by Donald Moss—will travel around the world speaking in the universal language of postage stamps of this precious American right and tradition.

While the size of a single stamp is not great, its sphere of influence is. This is because millions and millions of people around the world see and use and collect postage stamps. They have very nearly universal visibility.

Depiction of a subject on a United States postage stamp is an honor. In a sense, it is a living tribute because stamps have purpose and value. And we know that portrayal on a stamp encourages many people to learn more about the subject that is highlighted. And that is precisely what I hope happens in this instance.

When we issued the Haym Salomon commemorative stamp, there were people who expressed surprise at learning that there were Jewish people here in colonial times.

As a matter of fact, there were several active Jewish communities in places like Charleston, South Carolina, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Norfolk, Richmond and Savannah, as well as New York and here in Newport.

A small group of Jewish people, descendants of Sephardic Jews from Spain and Portugal, had come to Newport as early as 1658, from the West Indies island of Curacao (Cur-a-sow).

They had heard about Rhode Island and Roger Williams and his belief in freedom of worship and liberty of conscience. And, with the same kind of courage that marked other pioneers who came to this land to build new lives for themselves and their children, they came to Newport to establish new roots. They formed a congregation and met in each other's homes to pray together.

One hundred and five years after the original group arrived—in 1763—Touro Synagogue was constructed by descendants of the earlier settlers, together with newer arrivals from a variety of countries.

That the congregants could build such a structure, that they could openly attend services there, tells us that they felt comfortable enough in the community to publicly follow the dictates of their faith. This was a marvelous portent for the future of America.

And there is a physical feature to this structure that to this day speaks of the congregation's hopes for, and confidence in, the new land.

Even though there were some who expressed concern that it might lessen the architectural beauty of the structure, a wing for a school was included as part of the Synagogue.

The congregation intended the building to be not only a house of worship for the adults, but a place of learning for their children as well.

Surely, this is proof of their trust in their fellow Americans. The people who built Touro Synagogue trusted the community to enable them not only to live and work in peace, but to be able to assemble for prayer and gather their children together to learn of their heritage—openly—and without fear.

These words—"openly"—and "without fear" are vitally important

To practice one's faith in fear is to live in fear. And, thank God, we live in a land where people feel free to worship where and when they please . . . where most people even take religious liberty for granted—rarely thinking about how glorious this is.

The Jewish people who founded Touro Synagogue did not take religious liberty lightly or for granted. They cherished it. And because they did, they not only included a wing for a school—indicative of their faith in the future—they built a trap door to the underground—as a reminder of the past.

Does this sound contradictory?

The Jewish community of Newport had existed for more than 100 years when Touro Synagogue was built.

They had lived in peace, and they did not build the trap door because they feared for the future. Rather, the builders of the Synagogue, who had not been alive during the time of the Spanish Inquisition, had been taught by their forefathers the importance of remembering . . . of remembering times of pain even during times of joy . . . a theme that is fundamental to the Jewish observance of Passover and is even part of the traditional Jewish wedding ceremony.

The builders of Touro Synagogue constructed the door to the underground to remind their children and their children's children of the time in Spain when such trap doors were not symbolic, but were very real and necessary instruments for survival.

They certainly did not take their religious liberty lightly or for granted. And they did not want their succeeding generations to do so either.

This, to me, is what the Touro Synagogue stamp is all about.

While it was built by a specific group of people, the visions, the hope, and the confidence in America that made this Synagogue a reality are part of the heritage bequeathed not to the Jewish people alone, but to all Americans by all the stalwart colonists who struggled to establish and build this great land of ours.

And it is my hope that this stamp will not only help memorialize those colonists and their courageous spirit, but will help also emphasize the unity of purpose that enabled them to build this citadel of religious freedom—the unity embodied in the United States of America.

I pray their vision, hope and confidence—their faith—will inspire us all anew.

Thank you.

Now it is my pleasure to present several albums containing the Touro Synagogue stamp to the following distinguished persons:

The first, by tradition, goes to the President of the United States, and Mr. Reagan's will be delivered to the White House.

DEFENDERS' DAY

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, on September 12, Marylanders will celebrate Defenders' Day. On this day in 1814, the fierce 2-day Battle of Baltimore began. It was a turning point in the War of 1812 and Marylanders annually look back to that day with great and justifiable pride.

Gen. Samuel Smith, a Baltimore merchant, Revolutionary War hero, and U.S. Senator, had spent the previous year training the local militia. On September 12, he sent 3,200 members of the militia to meet the 4,000 British regulars who landed at North Point less than 3 weeks after easily sacking the Nation's Capital. In two costly engagements, the citizens of Baltimore gallantly stood and fought and drove back the invaders.

Meanwhile, beginning the morning of the 13th, 50 British ships bombarded Fort McHenry at the mouth of the Port of Baltimore. The attack continued all that day and night. But when Francis Scott Key looked out "by the dawn's early light" from a flag-of-truce ship further down the Patapsco River, the star-spangled banner still flew over the fort. The British had been driven off.

The star-spangled banner still waves over Fort McHenry. The National Park Service has done a beautiful job of restoring and preserving the fort. They offer a fine film inside and a nice park outside with a view of the bustling port.

A visit to Fort McHenry is always a source of pleasure and inspiration. But, a visit on Defenders' Day is particularly rewarding, and I urge my colleagues to undertake that brief journey this Sunday. They will be amply rewarded. From 6:30 to 8:30 on Sunday evening, September 12, the Battle of Fort McHenry will be reenacted with a mock bombardment by a Navy destroyer and a defense of the fort by the Maryland Army National Guard artillery unit. Fireworks, a fireboat, and patriotic music and drill will add to the festivities.

To begin the day properly, I suggest attending the fifth annual Defenders' Day civic service of Christ's Church at 1110 St. Paul Street in Baltimore. It begins at 11 a.m.

Christ's Church has been intimately involved in the history of Baltimore throughout the years since that first Defenders' Day. The same bronze bell which pealed the alarm in 1814 rings out today; it was an organist of Christ's Church who suggested the tune for the national anthem to Francis Scott Key; and the rector of that time wrote a prayer which they use today.

This year, members of the Fort McHenry Guard will be participating in the service, as soldiers in Baltimore did in 1814.

A visit to the Inner Harbor, after the ceremonies at the fort, would be a pleasant climax for the day. The Inner Harbor which the fort defended has more to offer than ever: Harborplace with its shops and restaurants, paddle boats, a marina, the National Aquarium, an outdoor concert pavilion, and much more.

Before or after the "battle," stop by the Sam Smith Market in Harborplace and salute the gentleman for whom it is named, who, 168 years ago, returned home from his work here in the Senate to lead a brave defense of a very great city.

DAVIS-BACON

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, the 97th Congress has yet to deal with one of the costliest "sacred cows" ever legislated. I am speaking of the Davis-Bacon Act—a public law that has long outlived its usefulness—and frequently reaches an effect precisely the opposite of what its authors had in mind; that is, protecting local construction craftsmen and contractors from fly-by-night operations.

This ironic effect of the present administration of the Davis-Bacon Act has not gone unnoticed by one group that is often left holding the bag when "prevailing wages" prescribed by Washington are required in their construction contracts. In case my colleagues missed it, the National Association of Counties in July passed the following resolution:

Whereas the Davis-Bacon Act was originally passed in 1931 to protect area workers from unfair competition from outside workers in federal construction contracts, and the principle behind the Act still applies;

Whereas numerous government and objective reports have documented inequities in the wage determination process which have led to inappropriate overprotections of area wages and significantly inflated costs of federally assisted construction;

Whereas county government construction costs under Davis-Bacon Act provisions have proven to be significantly higher than similar projects not covered by the Act;

Therefore be it resolved that the National Association of Counties supports the Administration's position to maintain the Davis-Bacon Act to regulate the payment of wages and benefits in federally assisted construction projects;

Be it finally resolved that NACo endorses initiatives to reform the Davis-Bacon Act as follows to make it more equitable and less costly;

1. Provide for the continued exemption of regular county workers from Davis-Bacon coverage except where specifically mandated by statute.

2. Eliminate the "thirty percent rule" and use a "fifty percent rule" or majority rule of those in a job classification to determine the prevailing wage.

3. Allow for the reasonable use of helper categories of workers in ratios commonly used in non Davis-Bacon Act construction.

4. Provide that the county boundaries generally be used as the local wage determination area, and prohibit the use of urban wage data in rural areas and vice versa;

5. Raise the $2,000 threshold which has been used since the implementation of Davis-Bacon in the 1930's to a more reasonable level not to exceed $50,000 and index this threshold in future years to fairly reflect inflation in the construction industry.

The resolution was passed by the National Association of Counties full voting membership at its annual meeting in Baltimore, Md., July 13, 1982.

Unfortunately, the Reagan administration's attempts to reform the Davis-Bacon Act along similar guidelines have been thwarted by a lawsuit filed by the very principals who benefits the most from the application of predetermined prevailing wages. I need not take this time to acquaint my colleagues with case studies on wage determinations. I suspect that every Senator receives frequent complaints from his or her State and local government officials concerning wage determinations issued by the Department of Labor: Wage determinations that are frequently based on inadequate surveys and/or the application of the notorious 30-percent rule.

In this day of cost consciousness the Congress has a duty to deal constructively with the Davis-Bacon Act. County administrators are on the cutting edge of our attempts to balance the budget. We cannot turn our backs on them as they try to bring publicly financed construction costs into line with private construction costs.

BUFFALO BILL DAM AND RESERVOIR ACT AND THE RECLAMATION REFORM ACT OF 1982

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, an unprinted amendment was offered to the House-passed bill, S. 1409, by the majority leader on behalf of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee late Friday afternoon, August 20, 1982, and passed by unanimous consent. The amendment included three separate bills as companion titles to the House bill.

Two of the titles, consisting of the Buffalo Bill Dam and Reservoir Act, and the Reclamation Reform Act of 1982, are identical to bills previously passed by the Senate. However, title III of the amendment is substantively different from any legislation previously passed by either House. In large part it is similar to H.R. 5118 as passed by the Senate, but it includes language changes which alter considerably, and critically, the provisions of that bill.

H.R. 5118 is the Southern Arizona Water Rights Settlement Act which I introduced in the Senate as S. 2114. The bill passed the Senate unanimously on May 11, 1982, was accepted by the House but was subsequently vetoed by the President.

Mr. President, I am indeed surprised and disappointed that neither my staff nor I was consulted or even notified prior to this action. Both title III the Water Rights Settlement Act, and title II, the Reclamation Reform Act, are matters of great importance to the people of Arizona. I am sure the majority leader and the chairman of the Energy Committee, Senator MCCLURE, must have believed that I approved of the amendment. I am sure it was simply a misunderstanding. However, I did not approve of the amendment and do not now.

I was informed on Friday afternoon that there would be no more rollcall votes and there was no indication the Water Rights Act would be considered before this week.

The chairman, in his submitted statement for the RECORD, states:

> Title III of the pending amendment is the text of the agreement on the Papago Water matter negotiated between the House Interior Committee, the Senate Delegation from Arizona and the Secretary of the Interior.

That is incorrect. I was not a party to the negotiations on the reported agreement, was not present when the agreement was made, and do not support the amendment as it is written and included in S. 1409. Because I was not a party to the agreement, I do not know fully the circumstances or conditions under which it was made, not the totality of the understandings which may have been expressed at the time. I have been told there were discussions concerning judicial recourse, which were, inadvertently, not adequately reflected in the bill language. If that is the case, then it should be relatively easy to make additional changes to more accurately represent the agreement. We can then review all of the changes to assess whether they meet the original purposes of the Senate bill.

Mr. President, I am also quite concerned with getting the Reclamation Reform Act, title II of S. 1409, passed through the Congress this year. I know this is one of the highest priorities of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee and I certainly support the chairman, Senator MCCLURE, in his attempts to expedite and complete work on this package. Again, let me say that I am sure the distinguished chairman of the Energy Committee understood I approved of the legislation—as he so indicated his understanding in his floor statement. However, it is regrettable we were not able to carefully consider the proposed amendment before it was passed.

It has certainly been my intention and sincere belief, that we could pass legislation that would give some real assurance of the delivery of needed water to the people of Tucson and Pima County—both Indian and non-Indian alike.

The legislation the Senate passed unanimously, S. 2114, did just that. I believe the veto was unwarranted. I have been hopeful, and remain so, that we can still draft legislation which would be acceptable to the administration and offer sufficient assurance to the people of the Tucson area.

ADM. THOMAS MALONE RETIRES—ENDING A DISTINGUISHED CAREER OF NAVAL SERVICE

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, on September 11 a change of command ceremony will occur at the Memphis Naval Air Station. This ceremony will mark the retirement on October 1 of Adm. Thomas Malone as Chief of Naval Technical Training at the Memphis Naval Air Station at Millington, Tenn.

Admiral Malone has held the post of Chief of Naval Technical Training since August 1978. During that time he directed the Navy's technical training program for the more than 500,000 officers and enlisted students in naval vocational training in schools throughout the Nation. The preparedness of our Navy fighting men and women can, in large measure, be attributed to Admiral Malone's superb efforts as Chief of Naval Technical Training.

Admiral Malone has had a distinguished naval career which includes more than 20 years of active submarine duty on Polaris and attack submarines. He has served with distinction in the Pacific and the Mediterranean and he was a crewmember of the U.S.S. Seadragon on her east-west transit of the northwest passage and the Arctic Ocean.

Admiral Malone has served his country with distinction since his graduation from the Naval Academy in 1953. And in his service at the Memphis Naval Air Station, he has been a good citizen as well. He has helped pioneer a good neighbor policy between the naval air station and the Shelby County community. During his tenure at the Memphis Naval Air Station, Admiral Malone has supervised completion of the Sergeant Walter K. Singleton Parkway and many other essential public works projects which are important links between the naval air station and Shelby County.

He has also served the local community in numerous other ways, reflected by his chairmanship of the combined Federal Military and Civilian Campaign, his support of the Tennessee Special Olympics, and his assistance in the renovation of the St. Peters Home for Children.

Admiral Malone and his wife, Marguerite, plan to reside in Memphis after his retirement on October 1. I join with the citizens of Shelby County in wishing Admiral Malone a successful retirement and congratulations on his long and distinguished career.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-1163. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 52

"Whereas, Agriculture is the number one industry in California, which is the leading agricultural state in the country; and

"Whereas, Although California's 33.4 million acres of cultivated land account for only 3 percent of the country's entire supply of farmland, the state produced nearly 10 percent of the 1980 farm cash receipts in the United States; and

"Whereas, Agriculture accounted for approximately 18 percent of the state's gross product during 1980, which amounted to $54.8 billion, using the multiplier factor; and

"Whereas, California leads the nation in the production of 49 different crops and livestock products; and

"Whereas, The diversity of the state's agriculture is truly impressive, for over 250 different commodities are grown here; and

"Whereas, Twelve percent of the nation's agricultural exports were shipped from California last year, which provided numerous jobs and revenue for our three customs districts of Los Angeles, San Francisco, and San Diego; and

"Whereas, The product of approximately one out of every four acres of California cropland is now sold in foreign markets and thus the state's agricultural economy is dependent upon international trade; and

"Whereas, Expansion of markets for agricultural products abroad is needed to supply outlets for growing production of many California crops and to balance declines in domestic consumption of certain important products; and

"Whereas, The trade policies often adopted by many of our important overseas trading partners are clearly discriminatory or otherwise violative of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and are unfairly eroding export markets for California farm commodities; and

"Whereas, A group of California food marketers have petitioned the United States Trade Representative to take their case against the European Economic Community before an international court, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That agriculture is California's basic industry, and its well-being is vital to the economic health of the state; and be it further

"Resolved, That it is in the best interest of the state, and of the United States as a whole, that there be the closest and most vigorous possible cooperation between the Office of the Trade Representative and the United States Department of Agriculture in seeking to improve the nation's trade balance by negotiating the reduction or elimination of tariff and nontariff barriers, as well as other policies and programs, which encourage unfair competition in markets which the United States has historically served, which disrupt international trade patterns, and which block access to foreign markets for California agricultural products; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States and its appropriate committees join with the executive agencies involved and urge their active participation in seeking the most effective remedies to the problems of protectionism and subsidized competition which so seriously affect the movement of United States', and particularly California's, agricultural products into international trade; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Trade Representative, to the Secretary of Agriculture, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, to the Department of State and the Department of Commerce, and to the chairman of committees in Congress which have jurisdiction over foreign trade."

POM-1164. A resolution adopted by the National Council of the Steuben Society of America urging our Government to suspend all financial, economic, and military aid to aggressor nations and condemning the actions of the U.S.S.R. and the State of Israel which are detrimental to the cause of "Peace on Earth—Good Will Toward Men"; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-1165. A resolution adopted by the National Conference of Republican County Officials urging its members to be involved whenever and wherever meetings or gatherings occur that will ultimately have a bearing on the manner in which county officials conduct their business, and that this recommendation be implemented as part of an ongoing and dependable system; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

POM-1166. A resolution adopted by the National Council of the Steuben Society of America urging Congress to take appropriate action to effectuate the recommendations of President Reagan for a return to the States of the powers, functions, and responsibilities now assumed by the Federal Government and implemented and discharged by them through "block grants" and used in such amounts and according to such priorities as they deem proper; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

POM-1167. A resolution adopted by the National Council of the Steuben Society of America urging the passage of the proposed constitutional amendment on a balanced budget; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 2891. A bill to amend the Commodity Credit Corporation Act to require the Commodity Credit Corporation to pay rates for the storage of grain on farms which is no less than the rates the Corporation pays for storage of grain in commercial storage facilities; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

UNIFORM GRAIN STORAGE RATES

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, I have received a letter from Nebraska State senator, Hon. Loran Schmit, who is chairman of the Nebraska State Legislature's Agricultural Committee, concerning the differential between grain storage rates paid to farmers by the Commodity Credit Corporation and the rates paid to commercial grain storage facilities by the Corporation.

Inasmuch as Senator Schmit's letter explains the discrepancy between farm and commercial storage rates, I am including it in this part of my remarks. The letter follows:

DEAR SENATOR ZORINSKY: I am once again writing to you to ask your help to correct what I believe is a serious injustice to Nebraska farmers. At the present time any Nebraska farmer who stores grain in his facilities on his farm receives a storage payment of 26.5 cents per bushel. The same grain stored in a commercial facility in David City receives a storage payment of 29.1 cents per bushel and beginning July 1st will be paid at the rate of 32.4 cents.

The difference in the on farm storage rate versus the commercial storage rate represents a loss of millions of dollars to an already financially strapped agricultural economy. I do not believe the elevators should be paid any less for storage services but that farmers should be paid an equal amount. I believe that at a time when the federal government is writing three year guarantee storage construction contracts that farmers would be willing to build additional grain storage even without government loans or a three year guarantee as in the commercial program.

I would appreciate it very much if you would use your considerable influence with the Department of Agriculture to raise the storage rate for on farm storage to the equivalent of commercial storage."

With every best wish.

Sincerely,

LORAN SCHMIT,
State Senator.

Mr. President, I have written to Secretary of Agriculture, John Block, and raised the question as to the fairness and equity in the rate differential. I asked the specific question as to the justification for a difference of 5.9 cents per bushel on stored grain between the farm and commercial facilities and whether there was some problem with agricultural statutes that should be corrected. I indicated that if there is need for correction I would like to have his recommendations.

The Secretary's response confirmed the fact that a discrepancy does exist and that in some instances the rate paid per bushel may be as high as 50 cents depending on the type of grain stored and the elevator location. His response also indicated that farmer-owned grain stored in a commercial facility is only entitled to the 26.5 cent per bushel rate even though the rate paid on CCC-owned grain is higher. This means that during the time farmers are required to pay storage on grain under loan to CCC, that the farmer has to make up the difference.

I believe that Senator SCHMITT has good cause to ask for equal rates for farm-stored grain and commercially stored grain.

The farmer is accountable for keeping stored grain under loan to CCC in condition as is the commercial facility accountable for keeping grain in condition. I can ascertain no good reason for the differential. Therefore, Mr. President, not having received a satisfactory response from Secretary of Agriculture John Block I am introducing today a bill that would amend the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act to require that the grain storage rate paid by CCC be the same in the area where the grain is stored whether farm or commercially stored.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2891

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the third proviso of the second sentence of section 4(h) of the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act (15 U.S.C. 714b(h)) is amended by inserting before the colon at the end thereof the following: ", except that the rate the Corporation pays for the storage of grain on farms in any area may not be less than the rate the Corporation pays for the storage of grain in commercial storage facilities in such area".

By Mr. JEPSEN:

S. 2892. A bill to clarify the definition of abuse in the Natural Gas Policy Act; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

CLARIFICATION OF DEFINITION OF ABUSE IN NATURAL GAS PRICING SYSTEM

● Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today that will give new direction to our current natural gas pricing system. Not only will these changes make our current pricing system more fair and equitable, but it also will help hold down the spiraling costs of natural gas for consumers.

Iowans and others across America have been hit hard in recent years by the ever-increasing costs of natural gas. As many of my colleagues have surely heard from their own States, some people are even pressed to make a choice between food and fuel. With winter approaching and our economic atmosphere as it is, this situation will soon become intolerable.

My legislation is designed to keep fuel costs at a manageable level. It would, in essence, allow the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to beef up its review of contracts between gas producers and pipeline companies.

These changes are especially important for Iowa, because FERC regulates nearly 90 percent of Iowan's gas bills. Iowa has progressive conservation and energy assistance programs, but they do not go far enough to keep up with spiraling price increases.

There are three basic areas in gas contracting where we can focus upon. They are: Take-or-pay provisions; indefinite price-escalator clauses; and market-out clauses.

First, my measure would expand the Commission's authority to regulate take-or-pay contract clauses. These clauses force pipeline companies to buy all or a large portion of gas contracted for, regardless of changing market demand.

Second, the legislation would also expand the Commission's authority to regulate indefinite price escalator clauses. These clauses, especially those not tied to economic indicators, guarantee rapid, unqualified price hikes for natural gas users.

Finally, the bill will require market-out clauses to be included in contracts with gas producers. This would insure that pipeline companies would not be forced to continue buying high-priced gas under contract when market prices and demand decreases.

Mr. President, these changes are both vital and necessary if we are to begin the process of lifting the ever-increasing cost burden of natural gas off of the backs of consumers. In Iowa, for example, we have seen gas prices increase by nearly 100 percent in just the last 3 years. For the average Iowa homeowner, this translated into a $71 January 1979 heating bill to a $130 bill in 1982.

Relief is needed for these people, and it is needed now.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2892

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2 of the Natural Gas Policy Act (15 U.S.C. 3301) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(38) ABUSE.—The term 'abuse' is not limited to misrepresentation but also includes imprudence on the part of the pipeline company and any pipeline company-producer contract which materially prevents the pipeline from responding to changes in customer demand or other market forces. A rebuttable presumption arises that a contract materially prevents a pipeline from responding to changes in customer demand or other market forces if the following contract clauses are found in a producer-pipeline contract:

"(A) Take-or-pay clause which commits the purchaser to pay for a minimum daily contract quantity of gas greater than 70 percent of daily contract quantity on an annual basis whether or not such gas is taken.

"(B) Indefinite price escalator or redetermination clause which is not tied to a recognized and approved economic indicator.

"(C) Most favored nation clause where the purchase price paid by any pipeline to a producer is set by the highest price in a particular production area.

Such a rebuttable presumption also arises if a contract does not include a market-out clause which allows the buyer to escape the contract or to nominate a new lower price if the gas is not marketable at the contract price.".●

By Mr. CHILES (for himself and Mrs. HAWKINS):

S. 2893. A bill to settle certain Indian land claims within the State of Florida, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

FLORIDA INDIAN LAND CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT OF 1982

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, today Senator HAWKINS and I are introducing legislation to resolve a long-standing dispute between the Miccosukee Tribe of Indians of Florida and the State of Florida. The State and the tribe have worked together to reach a settlement which has been approved by the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida in which a suit by the tribe (Case No. 79-153-CIV-JWK) is pending. Federal action is now necessary to approve this settlement. The attorney general of the State of Florida and the Miccosukee Tribe have requested Senator HAWKINS and I to introduce the legislation to accomplish this, and we are pleased to do so.

The Florida Indian Land Claims Settlement Act authorizes no Federal expenditure in settlement of the tribe's claims. The monetary compensation to be paid to the tribe under the terms of the settlement will be paid entirely by the State. Nevertheless, Federal approval of the settlement as provided in the bill is necessary for three reasons:

First, in the settlement agreement the Miccosukee Tribe waives all its existing claims against the State. In view of the existing Federal legislation which prohibits conveyances of land by Indian tribes without Federal approval (25 U.S.C. 177), the State has wisely insisted that the tribe's waiver of claims should be confirmed by the Congress.

Second, the Miccosukee Tribe requested as a condition to the settlement that an existing Miccosukee State Indian Reservation be conveyed by the State to the Federal Government to be held in trust for the benefit of the Miccosukees. The Florida cabinet has approved this conveyance and the bill provides for the acceptance of these lands by the Secretary of the Interior as a Federal Indian reservation.

Third, finally, the settlement agreement provides to the tribe approximately 189,000 acres of Everglades land under a perpetual lease. These lands and waters will be preserved in their natural state and will be available for public recreational use but the Miccosukee Indians will be guaranteed permanent rights to live, hunt, and fish in the area, which has been their traditional homeland for more than a century. While the legal title to the leased area will be held by the State, the State has agreed that the area may be treated for certain purposes as a Federal Indian reservation. The bill implements this agreement of the parties.

I congratulate the State and the tribe for the successful culmination of their joint efforts to resolve this dispute without acrimony or lengthy litigation and without an added burden on the Federal budget.

The historical roots of this controversy lie in the 18th century prior to the creation of the United States or the acquisition of Florida in 1819. The Miccosukee Tribe are descendants of the Seminole Nation which occupied all of Florida when the United States acquired it from Spain. Their rights had been recognized by Spain and by Great Britain. The United States entered into treaty relations with the nation in 1823. Later, the Miccosukee band of the Seminole Nation was driven from its lands in northern and central Florida by the Armed Forces of the United States and forced to take refuge in the sparsely populated Everglades country of south Florida which they had previously used as hunting grounds and where they continue to live today.

Until the 20th century they were left undisturbed in the unsettled Everglades and preserved their language, religion, and way of life almost entirely unaffected by the white man. The State of Florida set aside a portion of the Everglades as a reservation for them in 1917.

However, their right to their lands was jeopardized in the 1930's by the establishment of the Everglades National Park. The State reservation was abolished in 1935—another State reservation was provided but it was far to the north of their traditional homeland—and the Indians were told they would have to leave the park. However, in 1964 the National Park Service agreed to let them live in a strip 500-feet wide at the northern edge of the park, and the State agreed that they could continue to reside temporarily on State-owned lands north of the park. These State lands are the lands involved in the present settlement.

Since before 1960 the tribe has negotiated with the State for a permanent guarantee of their right to occupy these State lands. This bill represents the culmination of two decades of negotiations. The Florida attorney general recommended in 1975 that the State negotiate a new arrangement for Indian rights in the Everglades. In 1978—following a public hearing—a new agreement acceptable to the tribe and the State was reached. However, the Governor requested that the tribe waive any legal claims it might have against Florida as a condition of State approval. The Indians, who had no prior plans to sue the State, then investigated their rights and discovered two significant claims, a claim based on the State's flooding of more than half of the State Miccosukee Reservation which I have mentioned, and a claim based on the establishment by Presidents Tyler and Polk of a 5 million acre "executive order" Indian reservation in southwestern Florida, including the cities of Naples and Fort Myers. The tribe set forth these claims in a suit filed in the Federal court in January 1979.

In the settlement negotiations which have taken place since the filing of the tribe's complaint, the Indians have made clear their willingness to waive these claims, as well as any other claims they may have to lands in Florida, provided acceptable guarantees of their permanent rights in this 189,000-acre tract be provided. The Governor and cabinet of the State of Florida approved the settlement agreement on October 6, 1981, the Miccosukee Tribe approved it on March 8, 1982, and the district judge tentatively approved it on July 2, 1982. Approval by the Congres is the only remaining step needed to resolve this matter. The settlement agreement provides that the agreement will terminate unless congressional approval is given by December 31, 1982.

For this reason I hope the Senate will act favorably and expeditiously on this legislation.●

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr President, I rise today and join Senator CHILES in introducing the Florida Indian Land Claims Settlement Act. This measure is the culmination of over 25 years of negotiations between the State of Florida and the Miccosukee Tribe of Indians of Florida. These negotiations have fortunately led the permanent resolution of a controversy whose roots go back as far as the 18th century. The clear and careful process of negotiation that has led to this agreement makes me and all the participants very proud. A significant and lasting agreement has been achieved without acrimony, lengthy litigation, or added burdens on the Federal budget.

Specifically, this bill provides for the establishment of a Federal Indian reservation in the State of Florida—to be held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior. In addition, this settlement agreement provides approximately 189,000 acres of Everglades land to the Miccosukee Tribe under a perpetual lease. While legal title to this leased area will be held by Florida, the State has agreed that the area may be considered, in certain circumstances, as a Federal Indian reservation. In exchange for these guarantees of land as well as hunting and fishing rights, the Miccosukee Tribe of Indians has agreed to waive any other claims to land in Florida. Because it is prohibited for tribes to convey land to States without approval of the Federal Government, the State and the tribe have requested congressional approval of the settlement agreement.

The settlement is acceptable to the Miccosukee Tribe and to the attorney general of the State of Florida. It has been approved by the U.S. District Court of the Southern District of Florida and has been supported by public recreational and conservation groups in open hearings. I support this bill because it brings about final resolution of the long dispute between the State and the tribe, provides a permanent home to a small but proud tribe of American Indians, and, most important, brings to the situation a measure of justice where none previously existed.

Passage of this bill will be a victory for a very important group of Americans. The history of the Miccosukee Tribe and its relations with the U.S. Government is not without a certain pathos and grimness. Before the United States was even a nation, both Spain and Great Britain recognized the tribe's rights in the area that is now Florida. In 1823, after the United States had already acquired Florida, we negotiated a treaty with the Miccosukee Nation. Later, though, the U.S. Government sent Armed Forces to drive the Miccosukee from their own territory deep into the Everglades—where they are to this day.

The Miccosukee's rights to their own land have gradually been taken away. A portion of the Everglades that was given them as a reservation in 1917 was taken away in the 1930's, when Everglades National Park was established. In 1964 the National Park Service let the Miccosukee settle on land in the north of the park. This piece of land is a small strip 5-miles long but only 500-feet wide.

The situation as it exists now is sad and ironic—the descendants of the natives who once inhabited the entire State of Florida must now rely on permission from the National Park Service to build their homes and feed their families on a tiny piece of swampland. In fact, they do not even have a permanent guarantee for their right to occupy this land.

The Miccosukee Tribe has continued to negotiate with the State of Florida. This bill, which I fully support, is the happy result of two decades of negotiation.

In 1978 an agreement acceptable to the Miccosukee Tribe was reached. As a condition of the State's approval, however, the Governor requested that the tribe waive any legal claims it might have against the State of Florida. Two claims were then discovered, which the Miccosukee rightly set forth in a suit filed in January 1979. The first claim is based upon the State's flooding of more than half of the Miccosukee State Indian Reservation, and the second is based on President Tyler's and President Polk's establishment of a 5-million acre Indian reservation in southwestern Florida, including the cities of Naples and Fort Myers.

The Miccosukee Tribe has agreed to waive these claims if the terms proposed in the bill are met—that is, if they receive a permanent right to a 189,000-acre tract of land and have the Miccosukee State Indian Reservation taken into trust by the United States. The Governor and cabinet of the State of Florida approved the settlement agreement on October 6, 1981. The Miccosukee Tribe approved it on March 8, 1982. The district judge tentatively approved it on July 2, 1982. Last but not least, our approval will resolve this very serious issue. The settlement agreement will terminate unless congressional approval is given by December 31, 1982.

Because of my deep concern that a sadder chapter in American history be closed and a new chapter—one that tells a happier tale of increased opportunity, greater independence, and more self-determination for the Miccosukee Tribe of Indians of Florida—be opened, I urge my colleagues to support prompt passage of this measure.●

S.J. Res. 240. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the week of January 16, 1983, through January 22, 1983, as "National Jaycee Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL JAYCEE WEEK

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am introducing today a Senate joint resolution that will, if passed, authorize the President to designate January 16, 1983, through January 22, 1983, as "National Jaycee Week".

The U.S. Jaycees, headquarters in Tulsa, Okla., will be celebrating 63 years of service to communities across America in January.

The Jaycee movement began in St. Louis, Mo., on October 13, 1915, and quickly spread to a national organization, formally created by 29 chapters at the first convention in St. Louis on January 21, 1920.

Through the years, the Jaycees have been involved in a variety of projects. In the early days, Jaycees were at the forefront in such diverse areas as aviation (Charles Lindbergh was the most prominent Jaycee in that field), development of U.S. Air Mail Service, and creation of the National Wildlife Federation. Just prior to U.S. involvement in World War II, the organization voted at its national convention to support the formation of the Selective Service System. Congressional debate had been stalemated on the issue until the Jaycees—all between the ages of 21 and 36 and very draft-prone—voted their support for the draft. Some 85 percent of the membership served in the war.

The organization has been involved—always on a nonpartisan basis—with other government issues and programs over the years. The Jaycees campaigned in support of political freedom for civil servants, were instrumental in formation of the ACTION agency and lobbied in favor of statehood for Alaska. More recently, the Jaycees have concentrated their government efforts on matters of economy, having called repeatedly for a balanced Federal budget. In 1981, the Jaycees enacted its "Enough Is Enough" campaign in support of recommended cuts in Federal spending—again, on a nonpartisan basis.

Some of the Jaycees' major projects in recent years have included public education on alcohol and other drugs, energy awareness, CPR training, shooting safety, and muscular dystrophy fundraising.

The Jaycees have been active in the corrections field by maintaining over 400 prison chapters with a membership of nearly 17,000. The program is now in its 20th year, and cooperates with a job placement service for newly-released inmates.

Jaycees now number some 300,000 members in approximately 7,500 local chapters in communities across America. As a service organization, the Jaycees have done much to enhance the communities in which they serve, by following closely the creed that "Service to Humanity is the Best Work of Life."

By supporting this resolution, we will be honoring an organization that has given much toward the health and vitality of our communities. This will be a small expression of America's gratitude for the many significant contributions of the U.S. Jaycees.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this joint resolution.●

By Mr. BRADLEY (for himself and Mr. GRASSLEY):

S. 2895. A bill to reduce temporarily the duty on caffeine; to the Committee on Finance.

CAFFEINE DUTY REDUCTION

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I am introducing, along with the Senator from Iowa, Senator GRASSLEY, a bill to reduce the duty on caffeine for 1 year from 8.5 percent ad valorem to 6 percent ad valorem. This legislation represents a compromise on a House bill, H.R. 5811, which would reduce the tariff permanently to 5.1 percent. I understand that the administration and affected domestic interests have agreed to the compromise version, and the Trade Subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee has reported this version as part of an omnibus tariff bill, H.R. 6867.

The lesser, temporary duty reduction is proposed in order to give the European Community time to legislate a permanent reduction in its own ad valorem duty on caffeine. The temporary reduction should provide them with an incentive to bring their own rate down soon. It they do not, our rate will revert to its current level after 1 year. If they do cut their tariff on caffeine, the Congress may consider a reciprocal permanent reduction on the U.S. duty.

The current U.S. duty for caffeine is derived from a formula that converted the specific rate of duty under the valuation procedures which existed prior to our implementation of the Multilateral Trade Agreement, to their "ad valorem" equivalent, as provided for in these agreements. There is reason to believe that the conversion calculations failed to produce a true "equivalent" and resulted in a substantially higher duty that should have been the case. Since U.S. consumers of caffeine are dependent upon imports for at least one-half of their supply, the result of an inaccurate duty conversion may have been to increase caffeine prices for U.S. consumers.

Mr. President, this legislation represents a compromise accepted by all interested parties, to my knowledge, including the domestic producers of caffeine, and the administration. It is designed to open markets for U.S.-made caffeine, as well as afford U.S. consumers the benefits of competition. There is a good chance that enactment of this bill will elicit a timely duty reduction by the European Community, and the mutual reduction of barriers will benefit us all.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased today to offer with my distinguished colleague from New Jersey, Senator BRADLEY, a bill to reduce the tariff on caffeine.

By the Trade Agreement Act of 1979 (Public Law 96-39), a mandate was given to the International Trade Commission to develop ad valorem rates that would produce revenues substantially equivalent to the former specific rates of 25 cents per pound.

However, the result was an imposition of a duty equivalent to 42 to 43 cents per pound, or an increase of 68 percent over the previous rate of 25 cents per pound.

This legislation proposes to restore the duty intended under Public Law 96-39, the Trade Agreement Act of 1979.

Importation of significant quantities of caffeine is necessary due to the fact that domestically produced caffeine is at the present time insufficient to meet our Nation's needs. Since the intent of the duty rate was never intended to double the cost of caffeine, passage of this legislation should see a price decline for consumers of soft drinks and pharmaceutical products.

Thank you, Mr. President, for allowing me this time and I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2895

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subpart B of part 1 to the Appendix to the Tariff Schedules of the United States is amended by inserting in numerical sequence the following new item:

"907.18	Caffeine (provided for in item 437.02, part 3B, schedule 4).	6 percent ad val.	No change.	On or before 12/31/83".

SEC. 2. The amendment made by section 1 shall apply with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

By Mr. MATHIAS (for himself and Mr. SARBANES):

S. 2896. A bill to permit the Secretary of the Army to authorize the delivery of water from the District of Columbia water system to water systems in the Washington metropolitan area, in Maryland, and the purchase of water for the District of Columbia water system from certain systems; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

WASHINGTON METROPOLITAN AREA WATER SUPPLY

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the bill I am introducing provides the congressional authorization necessary to enable the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission (WSSC) to purchase water from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers Water Aqueduct (WAD) in Washington, D.C. The Commission needs the additional water to provide for the rapidly expanding needs of a growing Washington metropolitan area.

The proposed plan entails the construction of an interconnect between the WSSC and WAD. It has received the endorsement of both local jurisdictions, Prince Georges and Montgomery Counties. The plan would not affect the water supply system of the District of Columbia but would insure an adequate supply to the Maryland suburbs in the event of an accident or water shortage.

The only viable alternative to this plan would be for the WSSC to substantially increase its water capacity at the Potomac plant in Montgomery County. The price tag for expanding the Potomac plant is $60 million—double the amount needed by the corps water aqueduct to provide the WSSC with its extra capacity.

The legislation I am introducing would involve no Federal funds. The total cost of the project would be defrayed by the local users' fees.

Hearings, conducted before the Senate Governmental Affairs Subcommittee on Governmental Efficiency and the District of Columbia in October of 1979 showed that water shortages in the Washington metropolitan area pose threats for the future. Due to a growing population, total water demands are rising while the average flow of the Potomac remains unchanged. Lack of storage facilities and currently limited interarea exchanges of water supplies will only serve to exacerbate this growing problem.

It is necessary to insure that there is an efficient use of the available water supply in the Washington metropolitan area. The provision of interconnections between the water supplies and the encouragement of interbasin transfers of water are ways that this can be practically achieved.

A CRS study completed in 1981 predicted that by the year 2020 water supply demands for the Washington metropolitan area would reach 1,095 mgd (million gallons daily), while the population is expected to increase to 8 million. If such trends materialize, the problems of water supply may become serious. Enabling the WAD to sell water to the WSSC would help ameliorate the growing problem of water supply in the Washington metropolitan area and insure the efficient use of the water resources of the Potomac River.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2896

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Army, on the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, is hereby authorized in his discretion, upon request of any competent State or local authority in the Washington metropolitan area in Maryland, to permit the delivery of water from the District of Columbia water system at the Dalecarlia Filtration Plant, or at other points on such water system, to any such competent State or local authority. All of the expense of installing such connection or connections, and appurtenances, and any subsequent changes therein shall be paid by the requesting entity, which shall also pay those charges for the use of such water as may be determined from time to time, in advance, by the Secretary of the Army. Payments will be made at such time and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Army may prescribe. The Secretary of the Army may revoke at any time any permit for the use of water which may have been granted.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers, is authorized to purchase water from any competent State or local authority in the Washington metropolitan area in Maryland which has completed a connection with the District of Columbia water system. The Chief of Engineers is authorized to pay those charges for the use of such water as may be agreed upon in advance by the Secretary of the Army.●

S. 2897. A bill to require the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Veterans' Employment to establish an experimental program of job search training for unemployed veterans; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

UNEMPLOYED VETERANS' JOB SEARCH TRAINING EXPERIMENTAL PROGRAM ACT OF 1982

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I rise today to submit an inexpensive and cost-effective proposal. This proposal is aimed at enabling veterans to make the optimum use of their skills and training. Veterans have given much in the defense of this Nation, and it is my sincere hope that through this legislation many unemployed veterans will be better able to take their rightful place in society.

The armed services have invested much time and money advertising the job skills and training that a tour of military duty brings. My legislation, the Unemployed Veterans Job Search Training Experimental Program Act of 1982, establishes a career transition pilot program to teach unemployed veterans to represent themselves, their skills, and their experiences successfully in today's uncertain job market. My proposal will enable veterans to better achieve independence and job security while reducing the number of unemployed veterans that depend on the Government for support.

This pilot project consists of a 5-day program of workshops and individual counseling at Veterans' Administration facilities by a group of traveling career guidance professionals. Instruction and workshops will explore resume writing, job targeting, interview techniques, and salary negotiation. Veterans' Administration representatives will be present at all sessions. Together with participating veterans, they will be encouraged to establish ongoing local career guidance programs.

During this period of economic uncertainty, we must make the best possible use of this Nation's abundant human resources. The unemployed veteran constitutes an unfortunately underused human resource—a resource that this Nation can no longer afford to waste.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2897

(d) A representative of the Veterans' Administration shall participate in the administration and presentation of each seminar.

SEC. 4. (a) The Assistant Secretary shall evaluate the effectiveness of the experimental program established under section 3 based on the number of unemployed veterans who receive instruction under the program, critiques by such unemployed veterans on the usefulness of the instruction received, the number of unemployed veterans who obtain full time employment after receiving the instruction, and such other criteria as the Assistant Secretary, after consulting with the Administrator, considers appropriate.

(b) Not later than 180 days after the termination of the experimental program established under section 3, the Assistant Secretary, after consulting with the Administrator, shall prepare and transmit to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs of the Senate and the House of Representatives a report on the operation of the experimental program, together with the evaluation prepared under subsection (a). The Assistant Secretary shall include in the report such recommendations for additional legislation as the Assistant Secretary, after consulting with the Administrator, considers appropriate.

SEC. 5. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry the provisions of this Act.

By Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. PELL, Mr. DOLE, Mr. HATCH, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. GLENN, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. CANNON, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. HELMS, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. D'AMATO, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. DENTON, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. HAYAKAWA):

S.J. Res. 241. Joint resolution to provide for the designation of the week of December 12, 1982 through December 18, 1982 as "National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL DRUNK AND DRUGGED DRIVING AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am today introducing for myself and 28 other Senators a joint resolution to designate the week of December 12 through December 18, 1982, as "National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week."

Traffic accidents are the No. 1 cause of violent deaths in this country. In 1980, over 50,000 Americans were killed and many more suffered serious injuries due to traffic accidents. The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration estimates that between 40–55 percent of fatal accidents involve an intoxicated driver, and this figure reaches 55–65 percent in single vehicle crashes.

These statistics translate into a shocking one-quarter of a million Americans killed within the past decade because of alcohol-related crashes. Even this past weekend the Nation's awareness was once again raised as two prominent entertainers suffered injuries allegedly due to a drunk driver. In addition, the economic costs to society are immense, estimated at anywhere from $5 to $25 billion a year. Even the most conservative figure is far more than this society can afford and does not include the needless pain and suffering caused by drinking and driving.

A new problem of drugged driving is emerging from the unfortunate rise in drug use in our society, particularly among our youth. At a recent hearing of the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse, experts testified about the increasing incidence of driving after drug use, particularly marihuana, and described the problems inherent in testing drivers for drug use and studying the effects of drug use on driving ability.

Of increasing concern is the combination of drugs and alcohol and its impact on the incidence of traffic accidents. Surveys of our young people show that drinking and driving often accompany marihuana use. We have also been made aware that driving after the use of therapeutic drugs, either alone or in combination with alcohol, counter to the advice of physician, pharmacist, or manufacturer, may also create safety hazards on the roads. More research is needed to determine the effects of drugs on the incidence of traffic accidents, both alone and in combination with alcohol, and we need to alert the public to the risks of combining alcohol and drugs with driving.

It is clear that the public is now demanding changes in our approach to the problem of drunk driving, in large part due to the volunteer efforts of citizens groups such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD) and Remove Intoxiated Drivers (RID). These groups have most effectively drawn attention to the magnitude of the problem and the ineffectiveness of existing legislation and its enforcement.

In response to this public demand, the Senate recently unanimously approved legislation to assist State and local efforts against drunk driving. President Reagan has appointed a Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving which is working to heighten awareness of the problem and stimulate the pursuit of solutions. Many States and localities have appointed task forces to study the problem in their area and to develop a more comprehensive approach to the development of new solutions. Most States have examined their drunk driving statues this year and passed, or have pending, new legislation to increase penalties and strengthen enforcement of drunk driving laws.

It is important that we press forward in these efforts to develop new and creative approaches by combining the expertise of government, community groups, and voluntary organizations and bringing the unique talents of each to bear on this devastating national problem.

I believe that we should set aside 1 week annually as a "National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week." It is my hope that this week would provide a time when we could focus attention on the seriousness of the problem of drunk and drugged driving, examine the effectiveness of the various approaches developed at State and local levels, and make recommendations for needed changes in approach to the problem. This week would guarantee a forum to keep public attention focused on the deaths and injuries caused by drunk and drugged driving, and insure a means to continue to apply pressure for solutions.

Because there is a high incidence of traffic accidents during the Christmas and New Year's holiday period and it is a time of increased socializing which often includes excessive drinking, a most appropriate time for this awareness week would be the week beginning December 12, 1982. It is my hope that this week will be marked by radio and TV programs, articles in the print media, and local initiatives such as dial-a-ride or roadblocks, all aimed at raising the public awareness of the risks of drunk and drugged driving. Perhaps such a concentration of efforts by Federal, State and local government, community groups, and voluntary organizations will help reduce the toll from drunk and drugged driving at one of the most dangerous times of the year, and facilitate communication and cooperation between all of us in attacking this critical national problem.

I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this joint resolution. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

S.J. RES. 241

Whereas traffic accidents cause more violent deaths in the United States than any other cause, over 50,000 in 1980;

Whereas traffic accidents also play a substantial role in serious injuries in this country;

Whereas between 40-55 percent of drivers who are fatally injured have alcohol concentrations in their blood above the legal limit and this figure rises to 55-65 percent in single vehicle crashes;

Whereas the total societal cost of drunk driving has been estimated anywhere from $5-$25 billion a year, which does not include the human suffering that can never be measured;

Whereas there are increasing reports of driving after drug use and accidents involving drivers who have used marijuana or other illegal drugs;

Whereas more research is needed on the effects of drugs on driving ability and their impact on the incidence of traffic accidents, either alone or in combination with alcohol;

Whereas an increased public awareness of the gravity of the problem of drugged driving may warn drug users to refrain from driving and may stimulate interest in increased research on the effects of drugs on driving ability and the incidence of traffic accidents;

Whereas the public, particularly through the work of citizens groups such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD) and Remove Intoxicated Drivers (RID), is demanding a solution to the problem of drunk driving;

Whereas the President has appointed a Commission on Drunk Driving to heighten public awareness and stimulate the pursuit of solutions;

Whereas many states have appointed task forces to examine the existing drunk driving program and make recommendations for a renewed, comprehensive approach;

Whereas an increase in the national awareness of the problem of drunk and drugged driving may help to sustain current efforts to develop comprehensive solutions at the state and local levels; and

Whereas the Christmas and New Year's holiday period, with more drivers on the roads and an increased number of social functions, is a particularly appropriate time to focus national attention on this critical problem; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the week of December 12, 1982 through December 18, 1982, is designated as "National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week," and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that week with appropriate activities.

By Mr. JEPSEN (for himself and Mr. EAGLETON):

S.J. Res. 242. Joint resolution designating September 22, 1982, as "American Businesswomen's Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMERICAN BUSINESSWOMEN'S DAY

● Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, on behalf of the American Businesswomen's Association, I join my distinguished colleague from Missouri, Mr. EAGLETON, in sponsoring a joint resolution which would designate September 22, 1982, as "American Businesswomen's Day." This day would be dedicated to recognizing America's businesswomen for their achievements and advancements in helping to shape America.

The American Businesswomen's Association (ABWA) represents businesswomen in all 50 States and Puerto Rico with a membership of over 105,000 individuals. For more than 32 years, the ABWA has helped prepare women for leadership roles in business. This association is dedicated to the professional, educational, cultural, and social advancement of businesswomen.

Last year, the combined chapters of ABWA awarded more than $1,600,000 in scholarships to women. Many of the students were entering colleges or vocational schools for the first time. Some needed specialized courses in order to advance in their chosen career fields, and others were women seeking to update their skills in order to reenter the market after taking time out to raise families.

In addition, their national scholarship fund has provided a cumulative total of over $2,000,000 for educational scholarships.

Mr. President, I would especially like to commend Nancy Bruner, a resident of the great State of Iowa, for the important leadership that she has provided as president of the ABWA.

Women provide essential contributions in every phase of our society—in business, education, government, and other diverse fields, as well as in the home and church.

Therefore, Mr. President, the efforts of today's dynamic businesswomen deserve special recognition. I would therefore like to ask my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation which proclaims September 22, 1982, as National Businesswomen's Day.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 242

Whereas there are forty-three million working women integrally involved in determining the direction of both the private and public sectors of our Nation;

Whereas American businesswomen hold active, responsible, decisionmaking roles at all levels of business, and thus influence the direction of our Nation; and

Whereas the Congress recognizes the important contributions of American businesswomen to our Nation's continuing vitality: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That September 22, 1982, is designated "American Businesswomen's Day". The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 459—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. WARNER (for Mr. MCCLURE), from the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 459

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 1999. Such waiver is necessary because S. 1999, as reported, authorizes the enactment of new budget authority which would first become available upon the date of enactment.

The waiver of section 402(a) of such Act is necessary to permit Congressional consideration of S. 1999, a bill to provide financial assistance to the Wolf Trap Foundation for the Performing Arts for reconstruction of the Filene Center in Wolf Trap Farm Park. Such bill was not reported on or before May 15, 1981, in the case of fiscal year 1982, or May 15, 1982, in the case of fiscal year 1983, as required by section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for such authorizations.

The likelihood that the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources would report S. 1999 was reflected in its March 8, 1982 report to the Committee on the Budget pursuant to section 301(c) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974. However, at that time it was anticipated that passage of this bill would have little, if any, budgetary impact. Subsequently on April 4, 1982, the Filene Center was destroyed by fire. Therefore, the reconstruction activities for which an authorization of financial assistance is provided by S. 1999 were not anticipated at the time of the bill's introduction.

Enactment of this legislation is in accordance with the program of the President as set forth by letter of July 1, 1982, from Under Secretary of the Interior Donald Paul Hodel. Moreover, the conference agreement on H.R. 6863 (a bill making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, and for other purposes) provides, subject to authorization, initial budget authority for the activities provided for by S. 1999. The Senate thus has had adequate notice of this bill; its enactment is not expected to interfere with or delay the legislative process of the Senate.

Failure to enact S. 1999 would preclude expeditious reconstruction of the Filene Center so as to maintain continuity of service; it is in the public interest that such continuity of service be maintained.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT AMENDMENTS

AMENDMENT NO. 3265

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. CANNON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2375) to extend by 5 years the expiration date of the Defense Production Act of 1950.

COUNCIL ON CRITICAL MATERIALS

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I am filing today an amendment to S. 2375, the Defense Production Act Reauthorization that would establish a Council on Critical Materials in the White House.

This amendment is based on a variety of bills introduced in the past to help the U.S. Government deal more effectively, and take action to reduce, our import dependency for a wide range of minerals and materials. Specifically, this amendment is drawn from H.R. 4281, the Critical Materials Act of 1982, which was recently reported by the House Science and Technology Committee.

As House Report 97-761 notes, the legislation "represents the next logical step in the policy and administration processes provided by Public Law 96-479, the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980." Both the House Science and Technology Committee and the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation have held oversight hearings on the implementation of Public Law 97-479. While some constructive steps have been taken by the administration, we need to organize more effectively our Federal efforts, particularly this administration's inconsistent stockpile policies.

Presently, interagency coordination and leadership in the critical minerals and materials area is assigned to the Cabinet Council on Natural Resources and Environment. The Cabinet Council arrangement, while it may be effective in dealing with issues on an ad hoc basis, does not represent an effective ongoing mechanism. Nor does it provide for public, industrial, and congressional access and input.

In a recent Congressional Research Service analysis of the Materials Policy Act and the President's plan to implement the Act, CRS states:

The largest gap between the Act and the report is unquestionably one not of omission but of commission: the Administration's insistence that "national materials policy will be coordinated through the Cabinet Council on Natural Resources and Environment" (page 7), rather than through the Executive Office of the President, as consistently specified in the Act. The question of the central focus for such policymaking within the Executive Branch is perhaps the key question at issue, and it seems clear that the Administration and the Congress continue to differ on this vital point.

Furthermore, the House report concludes that:

In addition to those areas cited in the CRS analysis, the President's plan fails on a number of specific policy related issues:

(1) An emphasis on minerals and public land policy while ignoring other materials concerns in the final product or use cycle. This, it would appear, is a consequence, despite the Administration's disclaimer, of the fact that the Council on Natural Resources and Environment is operated essentially at a sub-Cabinet level through the Office of the Secretary of the Interior.

(2) The absence of specific proposals or programs on critical or strategic materials research and development, particularly programs for substitution, recycling, conservation, and new materials development.

(3) No permanent organization structure for coordination of materials and minerals policies or programs was presented as required by the law.

(4) No specific programs in the Department of Defense, Interior or Commerce were recommended as a result of their 18-month analysis.

Thus, Mr. President, I believe it is time to join with our House colleagues and take steps to buttress our Government's capability to anticipate and deal with critical minerals and materials issues. This is why I intend to offer this as an amendment to S. 2375, the Defense Production Act Reauthorization, and I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

In addition, I am today introducing this proposal as a separate bill, S. 2898, in order to facilitate its consideration by the Senate should it not be adopted as an amendment to the Defense Production Act legislation as currently contemplated in the House.

I ask unanimous consent that an excerpt of House Report 97-761, which includes a section-by-section analysis of the bill, be included in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Critical Materials Act of 1982".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the availability of adequate supplies of strategic and critical industrial materials continues to be essential for national security, economic well-being, and industrial production;

(2) research, development, and technological innovation are important factors which contribute to and affect the availability and use of materials;

(3) there exists no single Federal entity with the authority and responsibility for establishing critical materials policy and for coordinating and implementing that policy; and

(4) the importance of materials to national policies requires an organizational means for the coordination, within and at a suitably high level of the Executive Office of the President, of existing policies within the Federal Government.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to establish a Council on critical Materials under and reporting to the Executive Office of the President—

(1) to provide for necessary coordination of critical materials policies, including research and development, among the various agencies and departments of the Federal Government, and for the implementation of such policies;

(2) to bring to the attention of the President, the Congress, and the general public such materials issues and concerns, including research and development, as are deemed critical to the economic and strategic health of the Nation; and

(3) to insure adequate and continuing consultation with the private sector concerning critical materials, materials research and development, Federal materials policies, and related matters.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE COUNCIL ON CRITICAL MATERIALS

SEC. 3. There is hereby established a Council on Critical Materials (hereinafter referred to as the "Council") under and reporting to the Executive Office of the President. The Council shall be composed of three members who shall be appointed by the President and who shall serve at the pleasure of the President. Members so appointed who are not already Senate confirmed officers of the Government shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The President shall designate one of the members to serve as chairman. Each member shall be a person who, as a result of training, experience, and achievement, is qualified to carry out the duties and functions of the Council, with particular emphasis placed on fields relating to materials policy or materials science and engineering. In addition, at least one of the members shall have a background in and understanding of environmentally related issues.

RESPONSIBILITIES AND AUTHORITIES OF THE COUNCIL

SEC. 4. (a) It shall be the primary responsibility of the Council—

(1) to assist and advise the President in establishing a coherent national materials policy consistent with other Federal policies, and in carrying out activities necessary to implement such a policy;

(2) to coordinate Federal materials-related policies, programs, and research and development activities, including those related to critical materials;

(3) to review and appraise the various programs and activities of the Federal Government in accordance with the policy and directions given in the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980 (30 U.S.C. 1601), and to determine the extent to which such programs and activities are contributing to the achievement of such policy and directions;

(4) to formulate and recommend to the President national policies designed to improve conditions affecting the mineral and materials needs and resources of the Nation, and to meet the social, economic, and national security goals of the Nation;

(5) to advise the President of mineral and material trends, both domestic and foreign, the implications thereof to the United States and world economies and to national security, and the probable effects of such trends on domestic industries; and

(6) to make or furnish such studies, analyses, reports, and recommendations with respect to matters of materials-related policy and legislation as the President may request.

(b) In carrying out its responsibilities under this section the Council shall have the authority—

(1) to establish such special advisory panels as it considers necessary, with each such panel consisting of representatives of industry and other members of the private sector, not to exceed ten members, and being limited in scope of subject and duration; and

(2) to establish and convene such Federal interagency committees as it considers necessary in carrying out the intent of this Act.

(c) In seeking to achieve the goals of this and related Acts, the Council and other Federal departments and agencies with responsibilities or jurisdiction related to materials or materials policy, including the National Security Council, the Council on Environmental Quality, the Office of Management and Budget, and the Office of Science and Technology Policy, shall work collaboratively and in close cooperation.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT POLICY

SEC. 5. In addition to the responsibilities described in section 104, the Council shall have specific responsibility for overseeing and collaborating with appropriate agencies and departments of the Federal Government relative to Federal materials research and development policies and programs. Such policies and programs shall be consistent with the policies and goals described in the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980. In carrying out this responsibility the Council shall—

(1) review annually the materials research and development authorization requests and budgets of all Federal agencies and departments; and in this activity the Council shall, in cooperation with the Office of Science and Technology Policy, the Office of Management and Budget, and all other Federal office and agencies deemed appropriate, ensure close coordination of the goals and directions of such programs with the policies as determined by the Council; and

(2) assist the Office of Science and Technology Policy in the preparation of such long range materials assessments and reports as may be required by the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980, and assist other Federal entities in the preparation of analyses and reporting related to critical materials.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS AND REIMBURSEMENTS

SEC. 6. (a) Members of the Council who serve full time and the chairman of the Council, if not otherwise paid officers or employees of the Government, shall be paid at the rate of basic pay provided for level II of the Executive Schedule. The other members of the Council shall be paid at a rate per diem comparable to the rate of basic pay provided for level III of the Executive Schedule.

(b) The Council may accept reimbursement from any private nonprofit organization or from any department, agency, or instrumentality of the Federal Government, or from any State or local government, for reasonable travel expenses incurred by any member or employee of the Council in connection with such member's or employee's attendance at any conference, seminar, or similar meeting.

POSITION OF EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

SEC. 7. (a) There shall be within the Council an Executive Director (hereinafter referred to as the "Director"), who shall be chief administrator of the Council. The Director shall be appointed by the Council and shall be paid, if not otherwise a paid officer or employee of the Government, at the rate of basic pay provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule.

(b) The Director is authorized—

(1) to employ such personnel as may be necessary for the Council to carry out its duties and functions under this Act, but not to exceed twelve compensated employees;

(2) to obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5, United States Code; and

(3) to develop rules and regulations necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(c) Notwithstanding section 367(b) of the Revised Statutes (31 U.S.C. 665 (b)), the Council may utilize voluntary and uncompensated labor and services in carrying out its duties and functions.

RESPONSIBILITIES AND DUTIES OF THE DIRECTOR

SEC. 8. (a) In carrying out his functions the Director shall assist and advise the Council on policies and programs of the Federal Government affecting critical materials by—

(1) providing the professional and administrative staff and support for the Council;

(2) assisting the Federal agencies and departments in appraising the effectiveness of existing and proposed facilities, programs, policies, and activities of the Federal Government, including research and development, which affect critical materials availability and needs;

DEFINITION

SEC. 11. As used in this Act, the term "materials" has the meaning given it by section 2(b) of the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980.

Amend title of the bill to read:

A bill to provide for a Council on Critical Materials, for development of a continuing and comprehensive national materials policy, and for programs necessary to carry out that policy.

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

The "Critical Materials Act of 1981", H.R. 4281, represents the next logical step in the policy and administration processes provided by Public Law 96-479, the "National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980". H.R. 4281 establishes a Council on Critical Materials under and reporting to the Executive Office of the President for the purpose of developing and coordinating national materials policy and program plans within the Federal Government. Further, the Council will focus attention for the private and public sectors on materials-related issues considered critical to the Nation's economic and strategic well-being. Special attention is given to establishing materials research and development policies and programs consistent with the policies and goals of Public Law 96-479.

I. INTRODUCTION AND ISSUES

The availability of materials suitable for application is frequently a limiting factor in both the implementation of contemporary technologies and the development of more advanced technologies. For example, alloys of aluminum, chromium, cobalt, niobium, nickel, tantalum, and titanium are critical to the manufacture of modern jet engines. Only in the case of titanium is our import dependency less than 50 percent; for five others, more than 90 percent of our domestic consumption is met by imports—often from countries with divergent national interests to those of the United States. Similarly, high strength, corrosion resistant (hence, chromium-containing) materials are required for the production of natural gas from the hostile environment of deep, highly corrosive gas wells. In such other areas as power generation and transmission, energy conversion and storage, transportation, chemical processing, biomaterials for surgical implants, national defense, and, in short, in virtually every major industrial activity the availability of suitable engineering materials is crucial.

As a consequence, much discussion has taken place in the Congress regarding means of treating the Nation's non-fuel materials needs through domestic and foreign strategies. Discussion has also focused on using research, development and technological innovation to resolve many of these materials-related problems, hence reducing our vulnerability to interruptions in supply of critical and strategic materials. There is considerable research and development activity throughout the Nation and the world in the processing and properties of metallic, ceramic, polymeric, electronic and other materials. This activity encompasses such applications including, as well as the above, light-weight, fuel-efficient automobiles; the storage of nuclear wastes and hazardous chemicals; first-wall fusion reactor materials; high-temperature gas turbines; and microelectronics to name just a few. In the U.S., the Federal Government spends an estimated $1 billion annually on such research with $4.0 billion being spent by the private sector.

Thus, there is good reason to believe that the resolution of our materials import vulnerability could be reduced with proper development, coordination and implementation of a national critical materials policy, including a suitable research and development strategy. Within this general framework, there are areas of particular national concern:

(1) Defense

Our national defense and economic well-being depends strategically on more than twenty non-fuel minerals of which seven are imported at levels of 90 percent or more and the rest at levels of 50 percent or more of our annual needs. Included among the former are sources of manganese, cobalt, chromium, an the platinum-group metals of which the world's reserves lie largely in Southern Africa and the Soviet Union. Given the complex politics of importation, the Nation is particularly vulnerable in an economic and strategic sense to interruption in the supply of several of these elements. For instance, in the case of chromium, while there are potential metallurgical substitutes for chromium, there are no known elements which play the chemical role of chromium in corrosion resistant stainless steels, which are the backbone of our chemical processing industry, or in oxidation resistant alloys used in jet engines and high-temperature gas turbines.

(2) Domestic production

Our domestic minerals processing and metals producing industries are no longer as competitive in the world marketplace. For example, U.S. ferroalloy production, on which steelmaking is dependent, has decreased from 85 percent of domestic consumption in the 1960's to about 50 percent in 1980. In this instance, the Nation is now importing materials which our domestic industry was once capable of supplying. Without a domestic ferroalloy processing capacity, the availability of raw materials in the world marketplace takes on a different character in terms of the health of a vigorous steelmaking industry. This is particularly true in a nation in which steel-intensive technologies (the automotive industry, tubulars for oil and gas production and distribution, steel applications in the production of alternate fuels, etc.) abound. There is widespread concern about the long-term vitality of the domestic metals producing industry in general, emphasized by the steel industry's movement away from metals production activities into other more diverse areas. Similar concerns exist regarding processing and production in the titanium, aluminum and copper industries. The materials processing and producing capabilities of the Nation should be among the issues treated in providing a national materials policy, with specific consideration given to research and development, tax incentives, regulation, and import controls.

(3) Stockpiling

The bulk of the materials contained in the strategic stockpile was assembled more than twenty years ago. For 20 of the 61 families of materials included in the stockpile, the quantity available is at least 50 percent or more short of the goals established by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Alternatives to stockpiling include, on the one hand, substitution, conservation, recycling, advanced technology related to high performance materials, and surface modification for corrosion or wear resistance; and, on the other hand, incentives such as exist in the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2091 et. seq.). Obviously, further coordination at a comprehensive policy level would allow for more efficient and effective means of handling our present policies and programs regarding the stockpiling of critical materials.

(4) Corrosion

It has been estimated that about 4 percent of our GNP is lost annually due to metallic corrosion and that roughly 20 percent of this cost could be saved by making proper use of existing technology. In addition to the need for effective technology transfer in this area, we need to evaluate the impact of new technologies on our materials needs. For example, some metallic alloys produced by rapid solidification processing have unique mechanical, magnetic, electrical and chemical properties and may find application in areas ranging from chemical processing to national defense. The content of chromium required in alloys producted by rapid quenching to induce corrosion resistance is substantially lower than in alloys produced by traditional methods.

(5) Materials cycle

In addition to the mining of raw materials and minerals processing and refining, other stages of the total materials cycle must be considered in the development of national materials policy. At a time when our vulnerability to interruption in the supply of chromium and other materials is clear, it is imprudent to allow unlimited export of recyclable stainless steel scrap, each ton of which contains roughly 400 pounds of chromium. This emphasizes the need for a national materials policy in which coordination between government and industry is continually exercised. Similarly, research on materials processing should be stimulated, particularly innovative processing techniques such as rapid quenching, and advanced semi-conductor crystal growth techniques that would result in major improvements in manufacturing rather than incremental development of existing technology. Our Nation's vanishing lead in micro-electronics to Japan is in part a consequence of contrasting policies of our governments and Japanese industry's willingness to adapt and implement new technologies.

Finally, the Nation's materials, energy and environmental concerns are not unrelated. The large increases in energy costs have made the production of most materials more expensive. By the same token, advanced energy technology such as coal conversion, production of natural gas from deep wells, breeder and fusion reactors, solar electric energy, hydrogen energy systems, and fuel cells are all materials limited. Development of new domestic sources of minerals, particularly within public lands, must be weighted against long-term, multiple use of such lands and the critical (or lack of critical) nature of the minerals involved. The need for careful attention to the long-term balance between the production of critical materials, energy consumption and a clean environment continues to be persistent. Development and integration of materials policy and policy related to the Nation's energy and environmental concerns requires coordination which goes beyond the factional interests of individual agencies or missions.

II. PURPOSE

During the closing days of the 96th Congress, Public Law 96-479, the "National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980" was signed into law. Public Law 96-479 represented the first major statement on materials policy that had been developed in over three decades, and required the President to take a number of steps in addressing materials problems. These included among others the establishment of an organizational structure providing the following elements: Policy analysis and decision determination within the Executive Office of the President; continuing long-range analysis of materials used to meet national security, economic, industrial and social needs, the adequacy and stability of materials supplies, and the industrial and economic implications of supply shortages or disruptions; continuing private sector consultation in Federal materials programs; and interagency coordination at the level of the President's Cabinet. In addition, the Act called for a balancing of environmental, energy and materials polices and defined several initiatives on the part of the Secretaries of Commerce, Defense and the Interior and the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy to consider the resolution of a variety of materials related problems.

It appears clear, as described in Section III of this report, that the current Administration's response to Public Law 96-479 does not address major concerns of the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980. In short, the Administration appears to place heavy emphasis on minerals and public lands policy and little or no emphasis on other materials concerns in the product or user end.

The purpose of H.R. 4281, the "Critical Materials Act of 1981", a supplement to Public Law 96-479, is to reemphasize policy directives of the original legislation and to focus further on organizational concerns. In particular, the bill establishes a Council on Critical Materials under and reporting to the Executive Office of the President. Policy directions are determined as much or more so by organizational placement as any other feature of a policy-making body. It is no accident that the Council on Natural Resources and Environment, headed by the Secretary of the Interior, placed primary emphasis on minerals, mining and related public land policies with almost no attention to basic materials processing, conservation, substitution, recycling or new materials development. Such imbalances in the focus of materials policy can be expected regardless of which agency has responsibility and/or authority. It was for this reason that Public Law 96-479 called for, among other things, "policy analysis and decision determination within the Executive Office of the President". Such a level of policy determination would transcend the normal interagency competitiveness and provide the necessary balance in materials policy considerations. The Committee intends that the Council should be part of the operations of the Executive Office of the President, but flexibility regarding the organizational location of the Council is provided by the bill. In event the policy decision making shall remain at an executive level above any given individual Federal department or agency as specified in P.L. 96-479. It is not intended that the Council be restricted in any policy making role because of any possible identification with an individual Federal Department or agency.

The Council on Critical Materials, as proposed, would (1) provide for necessary, coordination of critical materials policies, including research and development, among the various agencies and departments of the Federal Government, and for the implementation of such policies; (2) bring to the attention of the President, the Congress and the general public such materials issues and concerns, including research and development, as are deemed critical to the economic and strategic health of the Nation; (3) insure adequate and continuing consultation with the private sector concerning critical materials, materials research and development, Federal materials policies, and related matters. The Council on Critical Materials would oversee the multitude of Federal materials programs—in materials research alone, there are over 14 agencies and departments involved with over $1 billion in programs—and act as the Federal government's focal point to analyze and evaluate materials policy as it would concern our energy, environmental, minerals, defense and foreign policies, among others. It would also provide to those groups important information and data concerning materials needs, problems and projections. Moreover, H.R. 4281 would focus attention on coordination and implementation of research and development activities aimed at stimulating industrial innovation and productivity and at developing new materials, substitution, conservation and recycling technologies to reduce the demand on critical and strategic materials.

III. ANALYSIS OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S RESPONSE TO PUBLIC LAW 96-479: NATIONAL MATERIALS AND MINERALS PROGRAM PLAN AND REPORT TO CONGRESS

In response to Public Law 96-479, the President released his "National Materials and Minerals Program Plan and Report to Congress on April 5, 1982. The plan, which was transmitted almost six months after its due date focuses on four major policy elements:

(1) Land availability

The plan proposes to open public lands to appropriate minerals exploration and development; in short, to determine the potential of the public lands with respect to minerals availability. Emphasis is placed on wilderness lands and withdrawal of other public lands in relation to minerals development and national needs given the "vast unknown and untapped mineral wealth" of the Nation. There is little evidence, however, to substantiate the existence of large amounts of critical or strategic minerals on public lands.

(2) Minerals and materials data collection

The plan emphasizes that minerals and materials information and analysis is critical in guiding policymaking affecting national defense, land use, taxation, trade, research and development, environmental protection and various aspects of both domestic and foreign policy. The proposed initiatives would strengthen the Department of the Interior's International Regional Resource Officer program as well as review domestic data collection but falls short of the requirements of P.L. 96-479 calling for long-term assessment of international minerals supplies.

(3) Materials research and development

The plan states that the National Economic Recovery and Tax Act of 1981 provides sufficient tax incentives to stimulate private sector research and development. Thus, all government funded research and development activities, except for mission specific Department of Defense programs, are stated to concentrate on long-term, high-risk, high-potential payoff projects with the best chance of wide generic application to materials problems and increased productivity. In short, government assistance is considered appropriate only where market forces are incapable of achieving clearly defined national objectives. The interagency Committee on Materials (COMAT) is reaffirmed as the federal research and development coordinating body, while policy resolution of materials research and development questions will be provided through the Cabinet Council on Natural Resources and Environment. The latter is at odds with the specifications of P.L. 96-479 which suggests that policy analysis and decisionmaking be accomplished within the Executive Office of the President and materials research and development analysis be conducted by the Office of Science and Technology Policy.

(4) Strategic and critical materials stockpile

The President's plan calls for a "major interdepartmental effort to improve the nation's preparedness for national mobilization" through the Emergency Mobilization Preparedness Board. Further emphasis is placed on Titles I and III of the Defense Production Act and on the Strategic and Critical Materials Stockpiling Act, the latter to include a comprehensive review of current materials being stockpiled. Title III funding authorization was not treated.

While the President's plan has been widely cited as "the first major statement by any President in thirty years addressing the nation's mineral dependency problems", there is considerable concern as to whether the proposed plan represents the necessary framework for the coherent national materials and minerals policy as required by P. L. 96-479. Analysis of the Congressional Research Service (CRS) of the President's report made the following point:

"Several policy areas appear to have been given major attention in the President's report: mineral development on federal lands, deregulation, Cabinet Council policymaking and coordination, and Administration economic policy. Yet these areas were given relatively little attention in the guidelines offered by the Act: land policy, Section 3(7) and 5(e)(3); deregulation, Section 4(8); and Cabinet Council coordination, Section 5(a)(1)(D). Thus, the report may be seen to some extent as a vehicle for promoting these current Administration policy issues, rather than as a complete response to the requirements of the Act. This view may be supported by the number of areas of concern that were raised by the Act but essentially ignored in the report: scientific and technical engineering manpower needs, especially for research and development in critical materials areas; the need for long-range assessments of minerals and materials needs and requirements, preferably for 5-10-25 years; the need for increased mining and metallurgical research capabilities by the U.S. Bureau of Mines; the need for greater attention to resource recovery, recycling, and waste materials disposal; and the need for an early warning system for materials supply and availability problems.

"However, the largest gap between the Act and the report is unquestionably one not of omission but of commission: the Administration's insistence that 'national materials policy will be coordinated through the Cabinet Council on Natural Resources and Environment' (page 7), rather than through the Executive Office of the President, as consistently specified in the Act. The question of the central focus for such policymaking within the Executive Branch is perhaps the key question at issue, and it seems clear that the Administration and the Congress continue to differ on this vital point."

In addition to those areas cited in the CRS analysis, the plan fails on a number of specific policy related issues:

(1) An emphasis on minerals and public land policy while ignoring other materials concerns in the final product or use cycle. This, it would appear, is a consequence, despite the Administration's disclaimer, of the fact that the Council on Natural Resources and Environment is operated essentially at a sub-Cabinet level through the Office of the Secretary of the Interior.

(2) The absence of specific proposals or programs on critical or strategic materials research and development, particularly programs for substitution, recycling, conservation, and new materials development.

(3) No permanent organizational structure for coordination of materials and minerals policies or programs was presented as required by the law.

(4) No specific programs in the Department of Defense, Interior or Commerce were recommended as a result of their 18-month analysis.

IV. SUMMARY OF TESTIMONY AND ADMINISTRATION POSITION ON THE BILL

Testimony was heard on H.R. 4281 before a joint hearing of the Subcommittees on Science, Research and Technology, and Transportation, Aviation and Materials of the Committee on Science and Technology on April 20 and 22, 1982. H.R. 4281 proposes the establishment of a Council on Critical Materials in the Executive Office of the President to advise the President on materials matters and to coordinate Federal interagency programs. While the location of this advisory body within the Executive Office of the President was supported in all nongovernment testimony by a variety of representatives from industry and academia and has been consistently recommended for over 30 years in preceding studies, the Administration opposed this approach in general and specifically the legislative approach of H.R. 4281. Although endorsing the need for effective materials and minerals policy coordination, the Administration felt that the Council required by this bill would bureaucratically impede materials and minerals policy coordination whereas the Cabinet Council, already in place, would assure that all interested departments and agencies were represented. The Administration would, therefore, prefer that policymaking reside with the Cabinet Council on Natural Resources and Environment which is chaired by the Secretary of the Interior. Other witnesses argued that the latter approach is considered inadequate in the sense that the Cabinet Council structure lacks the permanency crucial to maintaining continuity from one Administration to the next. Moreover, given the organization and political character of the Cabinet Councils, concern was expressed that the Council on Natural Resources and Environment would be unable to provide the objective analysis and decisionmaking required to treat the Nation's materials and minerals needs. Additionally, testimony expressed the concern that the revitalization of the Committee on Materials (COMAT), as proposed in the President's plan, would not be effective in providing the desired coordination of materials research and development activities on a Federal level. The need for central Executive Office coordinating and policymaking is underscored by the Administration's late response to Public Law 96-479 and lack of implementation as required by the Act. Finally, consultative ties with the private sector are minimal or nonexistent. Industry does not know how the Council on Natural Resources and Environment functions or how materials an minerals issues of importance might be brought to its attention by industry.

V. SUMMARY OF THE BILL

The importance of materials-related matters in national domestic and foreign policy requires an effective organizational means at the level of the Executive Office of the President with the authority and responsibility for establishing, coordinating and implementing critical materials policy. Thus, the bill establishes a three-man Council on Critical Materials under and reporting to the Executive Office of the President as that organizational entity.

The Council has the responsibility (1) to assist and advise the President in establishing and implementing a coherent national materials policy consistent with other Federal policies; (2) coordinate Federal materials-related policies, programs and research and development activities; (3) review and appraise the programs and activities of the Federal Government in accordance with the policy and directions given in the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-479); (4) formulate and recommend to the President national policies designed to improve conditions affecting the mineral and materials needs and resources of the Nation; (5) advise the President on domestic and foreign minerals and materials trends and their effects; and (6) provide for such studies, analysis, reports and recommendations with respect to questions of materials-related policy and legislation as the President may request.

The bill places special emphasis on the importance of materials research and development. The bill stipulates that the Council shall have specific responsibility for overseeing and collaborating with the appropriate agencies and departments of the Federal Government with respect to Federal materials research and development policies and programs. To this end, the Council will (1) annually review the materials research and development authorization requests and budgets of all Federal agencies and departments and, in cooperation with the Office of Science and Technology Policy (OSTP), the Office of Management and Budget, and other appropriate Federal agencies; and (2) assist OSTP with the preparation of long-range materials assessments and reports as required by law, and assist other Federal entities in the preparation of analysis and reports related to critical materials.

The Council, if appropriate, will appoint an Executive Director who will provide professional and administrative staff and support for the Council and to carry out the mandates of the Act, including a biennial report providing a domestic inventory of critical resources. The report will also provide an assessment of the prospective major critical materials problems which the Nation is likely to have, and advice as to their resolution.

VII. ANALYSIS OF THE BILL AND COMMITTEE VIEWS

This Act, which may be cited as the Critical Materials Act of 1982, provides for the organization of a Council on Critical Materials under the Executive Office of the President for the purpose of establishing, coordinating, and implementing national critical materials policy. Particular emphasis is placed on research, development and technological innovation as a means of reducing the Nation's materials import vulnerability while at the same time recognizing the importance of integrating materials policy related to the Nation's energy, environmental and other concerns.

A. Findings and purposes

Section 2(a) establishes that the availability of supplies of materials vital to national defense (strategic) and important to the Nation's industrial economy (critical) continue to be essential. Many materials and minerals may be appropriately placed in both categories. Research, development and technological innovation throughout the entire materials cycle (discovery, extraction, production, processing, use, recycling and disposal) represent opportunities to reduce our materials import vulnerability. There exists at present no single Federal entity responsible for establishing critical materials policy or for coordinating and implementing that policy. The Committee believes that the policymaking entity should be organized under and report to the Executive Office of the President in order to integrate such policy with that of environmental, energy, security or other pertinent national policy considerations. As noted in Section III of this report the Committee intends that the Council should be part of the operations of the Executive Office of the President, but flexibility regarding the organizational location of the Council is provided by the bill. In any event, the policy decision making shall remain at an executive level above any given individual Federal department or agency as specified in P.L. 96-479. The Committee does not intend that this Council be restricted in any policy making role because of any possible identification with an individual Federal department or agency. The Committee further does not intend that the activities of the council be duplicative of any related activities now underway in the Executive branch. Rather such activities should be subsumed under the Council's responsibilities.

Section 2(b) provides for and the Committee agrees with the establishing of a Council on Critical Materials under the Executive Office of the President (EOP). H.R. 4281 requires the establishment of a permanent Council on Critical Materials in order to transcend the normal interagency competitiveness and to provide for the necessary balance in materials policy decisionmaking. Section 2(b) specified that the Council on Critical Materials will: (1) provide for necessary coordination of critical materials policies including research and development, among the various Federal agencies and departments and for the implementation of such policies; (2) bring to the attention of the President, the Congress and the general public such materials issues and concerns as are considered critical to the social, economic and strategic health of the Nation; and (3) insure adequate and continuing consultation with the private sector concerning materials, materials research and development, Federal materials policies and related matters.

B. Establishment of the Council on Critical Materials

Section 3 specifies that the Council on Critical Materials, established under and reporting to the Executive Office of the President, shall be composed of three members, one of whom shall be designated chairman. The members shall be appointed by the President with the consent, as appropriate, of the Senate. It is the Committee's view that the members shall be duly qualified to carry out the purposes of the Council given their training, experience and achievement in fields relating to materials policy and or materials science and engineering. In addition, to provide greater balance with such policies as they concern environmental needs, the Committee directs that at least one member shall have a background and understanding in environmentally related matters. The Committee has reported language which gives the President the flexibility to appoint one or more members who might already be confirmed members of his Administration. In light of the possibility that more than one member may not have full time status, the Committee feels that the Executive Director should be a full time employee.

C. Responsibilities and authorities of the council

Section 4 describes the primary responsibilities of the Council, as follows:

(1) to assist and advise the President in establishing a coherent national materials policy consistent with other Federal policies, and in carrying out activities necessary to implement such a policy. It is the Committee's intent that, for example, policy related to the Nation's materials, energy and environmental needs should be considered and evaluated in integrated form. Likewise, given the complicated politics and questions of importation, materials, policies should be duly considered in foreign policy and national security questions;

(2) to coordinate materials-related policies, programs, and research and development activities, including those related to critical materials, within the Federal Government;

(3) to review and appraise the various programs and activities of the Federal Government in accordance with the policy and directions given the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-479), and to determine the extent to which such programs and activities contribute to the achievement of such policy and directions;

(4) to formulate and recommend to the President national policies designed to improve conditions affecting the mineral and materials needs and resources of the Nation, and to meet the social, economic and national security goals of the Nation. By social goals, it is the Committee's intent that the Nation's materials needs must be balanced with other national needs such as environment or energy. Such policies should consider, as well, measures for economic analysis and such financial, tax and regulatory incentives as may be necessary to stimulate industrial innovation and productivity in materials technologies but not to the detriment of environmental or energy needs;

(5) to advise the President of mineral and material trends, both domestic and foreign, of the implications to the economy of the United States and the world and to national security. The probable effects of such trends on domestic industries should also be considered. Given the Nation's import vulnerability—particularly with respect to critical and strategic materials such as chromium, cobalt, manganese, and the platinum-group metals—it is important that conditions in southern Africa, for example, where most of the world's reserves of materials are located, be carefully appraised; and

(6) to make or furnish such studies, analyses, reports and recommendations with respect to materials or materials-related policy and legislation as the President may request.

Section 4(b) authorizes the Council to establish such special advisory panels as it considers necessary in carrying out its responsibilities. Each such panel should consist of representatives from industry, academia, and other members of the private sector, not to exceed ten members, and is intended to be limited in scope and duration. The Committee feels strongly that such outside consultative ties be established in the conduct of the Council's business. In addition, the Committee feels strongly that nonprofit, private interest groups have an adequate opportunity to participate in the overall formulation of such policy. Similarly, the Council shall establish and convene such Federal interagency committees as it considers necessary in carrying out the intent of this Act.

Section 4(c) calls attention to the need for collaboration and cooperation between the Council and other Federal departments and agencies with responsibilities or jurisdiction related to materials or materials policy. The latter may include among others the National Security Council, the Council on Environmental Quality, the Office of Management and Budget, and the Office of Science and Technology Policy.

D. Research and development policy

In addition to the responsibilities described in Section 4, the Committee concurs that the Council shall have specific responsibility for overseeing and collaborating with appropriate agencies and departments of the Federal Government relative to Federal materials research and development policies and programs. In this context, Section 5 again emphasizes the need that such policies and goals are described in the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980, including providing a balance between materials, environmental and energy policies. In carrying out this responsibility, the Council shall: (1) annually review the materials research and development authorization and budgets of all Federal agencies and departments. In addition, in this context, the Council shall, and the Committee agrees, in cooperation with the Office of Science and Technology Policy, the Office of Management and Budget, and other Federal offices and agencies as deemed appropriate, ensure close coordination of the goals and directions of such programs with the policies as determined by the Council. Such a review process would ascertain any duplication, deficiencies in programs, opportunities for industrial innovation, and others; and (2) assist OSTP in the preparation of such long-range materials assessments and reports as may be required by the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980, as well as providing assistance to other Federal entities in the preparation of analyses and reports related to critical materials.

E. Compensation of members and reimbursements

Section 6(a) stipulates that members of the Council shall serve full time if appropriate. Such members shall be paid at the rate of basic pay provided for level III of the Executive Schedule while the chairman shall be paid at the rate provided for level II. Reimbursement from any private nonprofit organization or from department, agency, or instrumentality of the Federal Government for reasonable travel expenses incurred by any member or employee of the Council in connection with such member's or employee's attendance at any conference, seminar or similar meeting is also provided for in Section 6(b).

F. Position of the executive director

This section deals with the appointment by the Council of an Executive Director, who shall be the chief administrator for the Council. The Director shall be paid at the rate of basic pay provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule and is given the authority described in Section 7(b); namely, (1) to employ such personnel as may be necessary for the Council to perform its duties and functions under this Act, but not to exceed twelve compensated employees; (2) to obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of Section 3109 of title 5, United States Code; and (3) to develop such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act. Section 7(c) allows for the possibility notwithstanding Section 367(b) of the Revised Statutes (31 U.S.C. 665(b)), that the Council may utilize voluntary and uncompensated labor and services in carrying out its duties and functions.

G. Responsibilities and duties of the director

The Director shall assist and advise the Council on policies and programs of the Federal Government affecting critical materials by the following means, identified in Section 8(a):

(1) providing for professional and administrative staff and support for the Council;

(2) assisting the Federal agencies and departments in appraising the effectiveness of existing and proposed facilities, programs, policies, and activities of the Federal Government, including research and development, which affect critical materials availability and needs;

(3) cataloging, as fully as possible, research and development activities of the Government, private industry, and public and private institutions;

(4) monitoring and evaluating the critical materials needs of basic industry and the Government, including the critical materials research and development needs of the private and public sectors;

(5) initiating Government and private studies and analyses, including those to be conducted by or under the auspices of the Council, designed to advance knowledge of critical materials issues and develop alternatives, including research and development, to resolve national critical materials problems;

(6) issuing a biennial report providing a domestic inventory of critical resources with projections on the prospective needs of government and industry for these resources, including a long-range assessment, prepared in conjunction with the Office of Science and Technology Policy in accordance with the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980 and in conjunction with such other Government departments or agencies as may be considered necessary, of the prospective major critical materials problems which the United States is likely to confront in the immediate years ahead and providing advice as to how these problems may best be addressed; and

(7) recommending to the Congress such changes in the current policies, activities, and regulations of the Federal Government, and such legislation, as may be considered necessary to carry out the intent of this Act and the "National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980".

Section 8(b) allows that the Director, in exercising his responsibilities and duties under this Act, (1) may consult with representatives of science, industry, labor, State and local governments, and other groups; and (2) shall utilize to the fullest extent possible the services, facilities, and information (including statistical information) of public and private agencies, organizations, and individuals.

H. Authority

Section 9 authorizes the Council:

(1) to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary for its operation;

(2) to enter into contracts and acquire property necessary for its operation to such extent or in such amounts as are provided for in appropriation Acts;

(3) to publish or arrange critical materials information that it deems to be useful to the public and private industry to the extent that such publication is consistent with the national defense and economic interest;

(4) to request available information from private and public sources which it considers necessary in the discharge of its duties if—

(A) in the case of a request for information from a private source, the furnishing of such information will not create an undue burden or hardship on such sources; or

(B) in the case of a request for information for a public source, the furnishing of such information is permitted by law; and

(5) to exercise such authorities as may be necessary and incidental to carrying out its responsibilities and duties under the Act.

I. Authorization of appropriations

Section 10 authorizes appropriations to carry out the provisions of the Act in the sum of up to $1,000,000 for the first fiscal year and such sums as may be necessary thereafter.

J. Definition

Section 11. As used in this Act, the term "materials" has the meaning given it by section 2(b) of the National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980.

VIII. LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF THE BILL

H.R. 4281, Critical Materials Act of 1981, was introduced by Mr. Fuqua for himself and Mr. Glickman, Mr. Walgren, Mr. Brown of California, Mr. Santini, Mr. Roe, Mrs. Bouquard, Mr. Flippo, Mr. Young of Missouri, Mr. McCurdy, Mr. Dymally, Mr. Bedell, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Breaux, Mr. Daniel, Mr. Rahall, Mr. Hollenbeck, Mr. Forsythe, Mr. Ritter, Mr. Young of Alaska, Mr. Lujan, Mr. Bevill, Mr. Rudd, Mr. Skeen, and Mr. Lehman, on July 27, 1981. The bill was referred to the Committee on Science and Technology and subsequently to the Subcommittee on Transportation, Aviation and Materials.

Testimony associated with the implementation of P.L. 96-479, "The National Materials and Minerals Policy, Research and Development Act of 1980," was heard before the Committee on Science and Technology on July 28, 1981. The purpose of this hearing was to review the progress of the Executive Branch in preparing the response called for in P.L. 96-479 as well as to consider related legislation, H.R. 4281 in particular, which was introduced prior to the hearings. Oversight hearings on P.L. 96-479 and H.R. 4281 were held on April 20 and 22, 1982, before the Subcommittee on Transportation, Aviation and Materials and the Subcommittee on Science, Research and Technology. Witnesses from the President's Office of Science and Technology Policy, the Departments of Commerce, Defense and the Interior, and the Office of Technology Assessment. Representatives of national materials professional societies and industry were also heard during these sessions.

On July 29, 1982 the Subcommittee on Transportation, Aviation and Materials met for the purpose of marking up the bill. The bill, as amended, was passed by voice vote and ordered reported to the full Committee for further action.

On August 11, 1982, the Committee met for the purpose of marking up the bill. After further amendment, the bill was ordered reported as amended by a roll call vote of 37 yeas and 1 nay.

The following is a list of witnesses who testified at the above hearings:

July 28, 1981:

Dr. William O. Baker, Chairman of the Board (retired) Bell Laboratories.

The bill authorizes to be appropriated up to $1,000,000 to carry out the provisions of the Act for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and such sums as may be necessary thereafter.

X. EFFECT OF LEGISLATION ON INFLATION

In accordance with Clause 2(l)(4), Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, this legislation is assessed to have no inflationary effect on prices and costs in the operation of the national economy.

XI. CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT INFORMATION

The bill provides for new authorization rather than new budget authority and consequently the provisions of section 308(a) of the Congressional Budget Act are not applicable.

Under a separate section of this report, a five-year current programs estimate is provided in response to the requirement of section 403 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

FRAUD HOTLINE UPDATE

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, in the bleak terrain that is the Federal budget picture, there are few bright spots that are cause for cheer. The Washington Post wrote about one of them today, however, when it featured an article on the General Accounting Office (GAO) and its nationwide, toll-free fraud hotline. Operated by GAO's fraud task force, the hotline has been responsible for saving millions of American taxpayer dollars each year, and in doing so, clearly justifying the one-half of a million dollars annually it cost to maintain the operation.

The purpose of the hotline is clear. Instances of waste, fraud, and abuse in the Federal Government can be corrected, prevented, or punished more readily if citizens can report such suspected instances as quickly and easily as possible. This kind of reporting can best be done through a nationwide, toll-free hotline telephone number which guarantees anonymity to the caller if he or she wishes. In the case of the GAO hotline the nationwide number is 800-424-5454; for the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area, the number is 633-6987.

Almost 4 years ago, as chairman of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on the Legislative Branch, I proposed the establishment of such a hotline. Along with the support of my former colleague on the subcommittee, now Health and Human Services Secretary Richard Schweiker, and the cooperation of then-Comptroller General Elmer Staats, the hotline was launched in January 1979.

Now, 44 months and 41,000 calls later, the hotline has not only proven its efficacy, but, as the Washington Post article notes, this legislative initiative has prompted the establishment of similar operations within a number of Federal agencies.

Ideally, there should be no need for such hotlines, for, ideally, there should be no waste, fraud, or abuse in the conduct of our Federal Government. It is present, however. And now, when nearly every sector of American society is suffering through the worst economic conditions in generations, it is more important than ever to save every Federal budget dollar where possible, and to prevent every penny of waste where practical.

GAO's nationwide, toll-free fraud hotline is doing just this. I am glad that the Post has taken notice of the hotline and its worth to our Government and its citizenry.

I should point out, too, that such efficiency is not an accident. The fraud task force which oversees the hotline is especially dedicated to its task and maintains good records on its operation. The trends and totals in the hotline calls have been useful guides in the development of other legislation designed to promote efficiency and prevent waste, fraud, and abuse in Federal agencies.

Comptroller General Charles Bowsher, who succeeded Elmer Staats in the post last year, has provided the hotline and the fraud task force with the same firm support as his predecessor. With such support from the top and with such dedicated personnel in the operation itself, I am sure we can look forward to continued good results from the hotline.

Mr. President, I ask that the Washington Post article, complete with its listing of various Federal agency hotline numbers, be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THEY LET THEIR FINGERS DO THE SQUAWKING

(By Pete Earley)

The first call came six minutes after Les Krings began his two-hour shift answering the General Accounting Office's national fraud hotline.

The caller, a woman in the Midwest, said a relative should be arrested for collecting Social Security disability benefits while holding a full-time job.

"She decided to call because she was tired of hearing her brother-in-law brag about how much jewelry he could buy his wife with the benefit checks," said Krings, a GS12 who takes a break once a month from other auditing assignments to answer the hotline telephone.

During the next hour he received three more calls. Two callers wanted to know what the GAO had done with information they had already phoned in. The third, an Ohio man, complained that he had had to discuss "extremely personal matters" in a crowded room when he had applied for free legal aid recently.

"Sometimes," Krings said, "we play the role of a psychiatrist."

Since Jan. 18, 1979, GAO employes have received more than 41,000 tips from the public on their phone line. Some of the calls, particularly those left overnight on the agency's three answering machines, can cause them to shudder—such as the caller who left a 90-minute diatribe against the government, complete with expletives.

But there have been some gems, according to Gary Carbone, the GS-14 who oversees the project. Based on GAO hotline tips:

The General Services Administration discovered that it had wasted $330,000 by renting 18,000 feet of office space in New York City that went unused for nearly two years. It canceled the lease.

Two University of Wisconsin professors were convicted of misusing $160,000 in federal grant money and extorting an undisclosed sum from their students. Both recently were sentenced to three years in prison.

A New Jersey prison superintendent and key aides were forced to resign after they were linked to a parole-selling scheme.

The hotline was the brainchild of Sen. Jim Sasser, a member of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the GAO. The project, budgeted at $500,000 for fiscal 1982, has the equivalent of four full-time employes of its own and draws on another 32 employes from the fraud prevention and audit oversight section at GAO to answer the phones.

Seventeen other federal agencies also have started hotlines. Most of their callers are government employes reporting waste, fraud and mismanagement.

At the GAO, however, 70 percent of the tips come from the public. That means it gets more calls than does any other agency, averaging 70 per day. But many of the tips cannot be followed up, Carbone said, because tipsters often are not sure which federal agency they are talking about—or even if federal funds are involved.

A common tip, Carbone said, is what hotline staffers call the "woodchopper"—a complaint that a neighbor, co-worker, friend or relative is receiving disability payments yet is strong enough to mow the lawn or chop wood. Such tips are hard to check out unless the caller knows what kind of federal benefit the person is receiving. Often there is a valid explanation for what the tipster saw, Carbone said, but some of the tips have led to convictions.

Carbone said his office has never done a complete statistical survey of its hotline calls. "They come in so fast we just haven't had time," he said. But earlier this year Carbone examined the 41,000 calls the agency has received during office hours since the hotline began.

The most common tip (1,259 of those tallied) involved Social Security benefits, followed by allegations of tax cheating and welfare and food stamp fraud.

Carbone said 11,676 tips had enough information and appeared serious enough to investigate. After additional screening, the GAO pared those to 7,481 tips—706 alleging "mismanagment" and 5,775 intentional wrongdoing.

The tips were forwarded to the inspector general at the appropriate agency, but Carbone said the GAO has never done a study of what happened to them after that. The GAO asks the IGs to respond within 60 days, but usually the IG simply says the complaint is still being investigated.

It now takes the GAO 90 days to review a tip and then forward it to a federal agency, Carbone said, unless the accusation involves a high-ranking official or a contract that is about to be signed. Then the time is cut to a week.

In rare instances a tipster will try to misuse the hotline, Carbone said. A caller will accuse a federal employe of wrongdoing, then call his boss or a local reporter and tell them the employe is being "investigated by the GAO."

Krings said his favorite hotline story is about a woman who tried to turn in her daughter for collecting more food stamps than she deserved.

The woman, Krings said, said the daughter had stopped giving her a percentage of the stamps. Before she hung up, she asked if she would get a reward.

WHERE TO CALL ABOUT WASTE AND FRAUD

Here are the telephone numbers for reporting waste and fraud to various federal agencies, according to the General Accounting Office. Some of the numbers are hotlines, others are the office of the agency's inspector general. The first number listed is the local number, the second, a nationwide toll-free number.

THE OMNIBUS VICTIM/WITNESS PROTECTION ACT

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD a letter from Alice Rivlin, Director of the Congressional Budget Office dated September 10, 1982. When Report 97-532 on S. 2420, the Omnibus Victim/Witness Protection Act was filed, the necessary budget analysis was not yet available. I have consulted with Senator THURMOND, who has given me his permission to have the CBO letter for Report 97-532 made part of the record.

The letter follows:

U.S. CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, D.C., September 10, 1982.

Senator STROM THURMOND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to section 403 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the Congressional Budget Office has reviewed S. 2420, The Omnibus Victims Protection Act of 1982, as reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, August 19, 1982. For the purpose of this estimate, it is assumed that this bill will be enacted by October 1982.

Title I requires that presentence reports prepared for federal district judges contain a victim impact statement, assessing the financial, social, psychological, and medical impact of the offense on identifiable victims. Based on information from the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, and assuming that about 20 percent of presentence reports would require such statements in 1983, CBO estimates that the cost of this program would be about $300,000 in 1983, increasing to $500,000 by 1987.

Section 201 of the bill provides criminal penalties for the intimidation of or retaliation against witnesses and victims. CBO has no basis for estimating the amount of fines the government might receive as a result of these provisions.

Section 202 broadens the authority of the Attorney General to provide witness protection, authorizes the Attorney General to seek reimbursement of witness protection expenses from state or local governments, and permits certain civil actions to prevent or restrain intimidation of a victim or witness. The extension of protection to the new categories of witnesses is at the discretion of the Attorney General, and would necessitate either a reduction in expenditures for protection of other types of witnesses, an increase in funding for witness protection, or additional reimbursment from a state or local government, when appropriate. Thus, the extent to which the broadened authority will be used, and whether any additional costs will be incurred, cannot be determined at this time.

Title IV authorizes individuals to sue the federal government for injuries or death caused by persons who escape or are released from federal custody where the government has been grossly negligent. Data are not available on the number of individuals victimized by federal escapees or released federal prisoners. Because it is not possible to predict the number of escapees or judicial findings of gross negligence associated with such victimization, CBO has no basis for estimating the costs to the government of enactment of this provision.

Title V requires the Attorney General to develop and implement Department of Justice guidelines for fair treatment of crime victims and witnesses. Based on information from the Department of Justice, CBO estimates that developing the guidelines would require approximately 3 staff-years, at a cost of $125,000 in fiscal year 1983. Because the guidelines have not as yet been promulgated, CBO has no clear basis for estimating their implementation costs. The Committee has stated its intent that the guidelines should not require the creation of new services beyond the various departments' budgetary capacity. However, the bill specifies a minimum of 9 objectives for the guidelines, and some costs could be incurred in order to meet these objectives, subject to appropriation action. For example, if the 95 U.S. Attorneys' offices were to devote an average of only one additional paralegal each to implement the guidelines, the cost would be approximately $3 million annually.

The other titles of the bill are expected to result in no significant cost to the federal government.

Should the Committee so desire, we would be pleased to offer further details on this estimate.

Sincerely,

ALICE M. RIVLIN, Director.●

CANADIAN PUGWASH SUPPORTS NUCLEAR WEAPONS FREEZE

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of my colleagues to the declaration made recently by the Canadian Pugwash Group, part of the worldwide Pugwash movement, which is composed of some 2,000 scientists. This movement grew out of a conference of scientists held at Pugwash, Canada, 25 years ago, which was inspired by the manifesto of Bertrand Russell and Albert Einstein to address the perils of the cold war and the nuclear arms race. Then, as now, the Pugwash movement represented concerned scientists determined to insure that the technological fruit of scientific progress not be made into the instrument of human extinction. In the words of these experts, expressed 25 years ago and reaffirmed with urgency this summer:

Mankind is confronted with a choice: We must halt the arms race and proceed to disarmament, or face annihilation.

At their recent meeting, the Canadian Pugwash Group concluded that:

The only sure way of halting the arms race is by freezing the testing, production, and deployment of nuclear weapons and their delivery vehicles by the two superpowers.

I welcome this unequivocal and authoritative endorsement of a nuclear weapons freeze. It underscores the need to respond to the overwhelming challenge of the present peril by pursuing an immediate, mutual, and verifiable freeze over nuclear weapons.

I commend this statement to my colleage, and request that it be printed in full at this point in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

DECLARATION BY THE CANADIAN PUGWASH GROUP ON THE 25th ANNIVERSARY OF THE HOLDING OF THE FIRST PUGWASH CONFERENCE AT PUGWASH, CANADA, IN JULY 1957

A quarter of a century ago a small group of 22 distinguished scientists from 10 East-West countries, assembled in Pugwash, Nova Scotia, on the invitation of Mr. Cyrus Eaton, to seek ways of ending the Cold War, preventing a hot war and avoiding a nuclear holocaust. They were inspired by the Russell-Einstein Manifesto pointing to the dangers of a nuclear war that could put an end to the human race.

That meeting gave its name to the Pugwash Movement which has spread around the world and now encompasses some 2000 scientists from 75 countries.

Today, on the invitation of Canadian Pugwash, another small group of scientists, including signers of the Russell-Einstein Manifesto and participants in the first Pugwash Conference, have gathered in Pugwash to commemorate the 25th Anniversary of that first meeting. There follows the statement adopted by the Canadian Pugwash Group.

During the intervening years the nuclear peril facing the nations and the peoples of the world has escalated and is now much greater than it was 25 years ago. Nine multilateral treaties and thirteen bilateral American-Soviet treaties and agreements on arms limitation have failed to halt the arms race which continues to escalate. The arms race, and in particular the nuclear arms race, is proceeding in a more dangerous way than ever before. The threat it poses to human survival knows no parallel in all history.

Increasing numbers of scientists and the public realize that peace and security cannot be found in the vast and continuing accumulation of weapons of destruction or in the current concepts of deterrence. Unfortunately, however, others, including some in position of authority, speak of fighting, surviving and even winning a limited nuclear war, a protracted nuclear war or an all-out nuclear war. We believe that these illusions verge on insanity and can only lead to a mad race to oblivion.

We agree with and fully support the declaration of 1978 of the United Nations General Assembly's First Special Session on Disarmament: "Removing the threat of world war—a nuclear war—is the most acute and urgent task of the present day. Mankind is confronted with a choice: we must halt the arms race and proceed to disarmament or face annihilation."

There now exist some 50,000 nuclear weapons whose destructive power is more than one million times greater than the bomb that destroyed Hiroshima. Not only is the number of weapons increasing but, what is worse, the nuclear arms race is now mainly a qualitative race rather than a quantitative one. The rapid pace of technological innovation and the development of new, more accurate and more devastating weapon systems so far exceeds the slow pace of arms control and disarmament negotiations as to make a mockery of the efforts to halt and reverse the arms race. The threat of nuclear annihilation, either by design or as a result of accident, desperation, miscalculation, or panic, grows greater year by year.

In these circumstances, the only sure way of halting the nuclear arms race is by freezing the testing, production and deployment of all nuclear weapons and their delivery vehicles by the two superpowers. Such a freeze is a necessary first step to major reductions in the stock piles of these weapons and toward the goal of their eventual elimination. Indeed, a reduction in the number of nuclear weapons and their delivery systems, without a freeze, could be meaningless. The modernization of older weapon systems and the development of even more horrible and threatening new ones could completely negate the effect of any reduction in numbers. A technological freeze is as necessary as numerical reductions, and even more urgent. Moreover, if small nuclear delivery vehicles, such as cruise missiles, are produced and deployed in large numbers, it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to verify their limitation and reduction. Thus, time is indeed running out on efforts to halt and reverse the nuclear arms race.

Recently there have been several hopeful developments as people all over the world have become alerted to the dangers of the nuclear arms race. Millions have rallied to demand a stop to the arms race, and a great human cry for a nuclear freeze is surging around the world.

Another hopeful development is the growing demand that additional Governments pledge[1] not to be the first to use nuclear weapons. Declarations of no-first-use by all the nuclear weapon powers would be tantamount to declarations never to use these weapons. We believe that any imbalance in conventional forces is not of such dimensions as to prevent the making of no-first-use pledges; the making of such pledges, however, could be more readily agreed to if there were agreement on mutual balanced conventional forces in Europe.

It is also encouraging that several scientific inventors of some of the most sophisticated nuclear weapon systems ever conceived by the mind of man now oppose their use and urge their abolition.

[1] Such pledges were made by China in 1964 and by the U.S.S.R. during the Second U.N. Special Session on Disarmament in 1982.

In the light of these developments, we believe that the scientists of the world—and particularly those who are members of the Pugwash Movement—have a duty to help inform and educate the governments and peoples of the world about the dangers of the nuclear arms race and to explore ways of improving international security in order to avoid a nuclear war.

The members of the Canadian Pugwash Movement and the distinguished guests invited to join them at this 25th Anniversary Commemorative Meeting at Pugwash, Canada, call on the Pugwash Movement and the scientists of the world to intensify their efforts and to rededicate their energies and activities to the abolition of the threat of nuclear war and to the establishment of a just and secure world order.●

THE MOSCOW HELSINKI GROUP IS PRESSURED TO END ITS WORK

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I recently received the gloomy news that the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group has halted its activities. Elena Bonner, wife of renowned Soviet dissident Andrei Sakharov, issued a statement to journalists saying that the cruel persecution of the human rights group forced a halt to its activities. The group had been formed in May 1976 by a group of Soviet citizens dedicated to promoting compliance by their Government with the Helsinki Final Act. Collecting and disseminating information on violations of the human rights provisions of the Final Act, these courageous individuals selflessly risked persecution. The threat of arrest and imprisonment did not deter them from their noble pursuit. Other Helsinki Monitoring Groups were also formed in Ukraine, Lithuania, Georgia, and Armenia. The members of these groups were soon harassed. arrested, sentenced to labor camps, put in special psychiatric hospitals, and otherwise persecuted for their activities. Of the 17 individuals who comprised the Moscow group, 10 are imprisoned, 4 have either been allowed or forced to emigrate, and only 3 remain in Moscow. On Monday, one of the last three members of the group still at liberty, Sofya Kalistratova, was threatened with the charge of anti-Soviet activity. In these difficult circumstances, the group was forced to abandon its work.

I wish to draw my colleagues' attention to the fate of Malva Landa, an imprisoned member of the Moscow Helsinki Group. For 20 years, Landa worked as a geologist and for 10 years as editor of various geological publications. Because of her political activities, she was forced to do manual labor for several years preceding her retirement.

Landa's parents were Jewish, and her father perished in Stalin's camps. Landa's own activism can be dated back to 1971 when she became involved in the human rights movement in Moscow. After Ginzburg's arrest in February 1977, she assumed trusteeship of Solzhenitsyn's Russian Public Fund for the Aid of the Families of Political Prisoners.

On May 31, 1977, Landa was sentenced to 2 years of internal exile under articles 99 and 150 of the RSFSR Crininal Code, "Negligent destruction or damaging of State property and personal property." These charges related to a fire, probably set by the police, that occurred in her apartment in December 1976. After serving 8 months of her term, she was amnestied in commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the October revolution.

She has been the organizer of numerous protests against arrests on political charges and is very active in circulating samizdat materials and information on camp conditions. Landa had been subjected to numerous interrogations, house searches, and detentions during her visits to Moscow. On March 26, 1980, she was sentenced to 5 years of internal exile for anti-Soviet slander.

Mr. President, we cannot forget Malva Landa and the other brave human rights activists. As a member of the U.S. Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, which monitors compliance with the Helsinki accords, I can assure you that I will continue to speak out on behalf of those imprisoned for holding dear the human rights ideals in the Helsinki Final Act. The Soviet Government, which is flagrantly violating both the letter and spirit of the Helsinki accords, must not be allowed to think that the dissolution of the Moscow group will distract our attention from further violations of the rights of the Soviet peoples. The Soviets must understand that the idea of human rights is one that will continue to flourish despite their repressive actions.●

THE ABORTION CONTROVERSY

● Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, all too frequently, because of the controversy surrounding an issue, many pertinent facts are glazed over or misstated. Columnist William F. Buckley, Jr., recently wrote a column addressing some misinformation relating to the abortion controversy.

I ask that the column which appeared in the Washington Post on August 25 be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

PRO-ABORTION BLATHER

(By William F. Buckley, Jr.)

The Planned Parenthood people have been featuring a full-page ad of a bed, with three people under the covers sitting upright, unsmiling. On the left the young woman, in her nightie. On the right, the young man in his pajamas. Between them, dressed in a business suit, a grim-faced middle-aged man. The headline: "The Decision to Have a Baby Could Soon Be Between You, Your Husband and Your Senator."

The brief textual message warned about a bill in the U.S. Senate that "could deprive you of your most fundamental personal rights: the right to have the number of children you want. When you want them. Or to have none at all." And it continues: "Sponsoring the bills are Jesse Helms, Orrin Hatch and other right-wing U.S. senators who will stop at nothing to impose their particular religious and personal beliefs on you."

Now, we live in an age when people will publicly swear to it that to be refreshed you need only a glass of Coca-Cola or to be nourished a cup full of Wheaties; and we smile at our own commercial exuberance. But along the way a lobby crystallized that began to insist on certain restrictions. They tend to crowd under the generic heading of truth-in-selling. What galls is that the very same people who are mobilizing to resist outrageous hyperbole by cornflakes vendors sponsor, and tolerate, the kind of disingenuous, hypocritical blather for which Planned Parenthood should be driven out of business.

To reason from the disapproval of abortion an aggressive desire to regulate the size of a family is as reasonable as to charge that any senator who opposes infanticide aggresses against the sovereign right of the parents to decide on how large a family to have.

And then the sly business about senators who "will stop at nothing to impose their particular religious and personal beliefs on you." What is that supposed to mean? What beliefs is a legislator supposed to act upon? Elvis Presley's? If a legislator believes that it is religiously wrong, let us say, to kill one's aged grandparent, is he exercising sectarian aggression in acting on that belief by voting against euthanasia? Are we supposed to ask: what is the religion of the Planned Parenthood people? And are the "acting" on that religion in insisting that the newly discovered (1973) right to terminate the life of an unborn child be guaranteed by the federal government?

What gets you about the pro-abortion people, when all is said and done, is their persistent refusal to face up to the only serious question involved in this heated controversy. It is as if, 150 years ago, slaveowners had taken out full-page ads asking whether you wanted Congress to decide whether you could own property. No, no, no, the abolitionists said. It isn't a question of whether the people should be permitted to own property. It is a question of whether black people can qualify as property. Well, the right-to-life people are saying no, no, no, the question isn't how large a family the parents desire. The question is whether the implementation of that right should include the right to kill a substance that is more accurately described as human life than as animal life.●

PORT DEVELOPMENT

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I would like to discuss the issue of port development, as it relates to our trade obligations with our allies.

I, along with my colleague from New York, Senator DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN, sponsored S. 1692, the National Harbor Development and Maintenance Act. Other Senators have also introduced legislation which deals with ports development and maintenance. Mr. President, each of these bills would result in the establishment of some user fee or tax. Any legislation should be designed so that such fees or taxes are consistent with the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs (GATT). The GATT is a carefully negotiated international agreement which defines the limits to fees and taxes imposed on international commerce. Its major purpose is to prevent the signatories from taking any action which would provide hidden or indirect protection to domestic production.

In order to assure ourselves that S. 1692 was consistent with GATT, Senator MOYNIHAN and I wrote to the Honorable William Brock, U.S. Special Trade Representative. We asked Ambassador Brock to define the articles of the GATT which would affect port user fees or taxes. We also asked how a variety of changes in proposed legislation would affect GATT.

Ambassador Brock's response is very detailed and I would like to share it with my colleagues in its entirety. However, I believe it would also be useful to summarize the major points covered by the response to our letter.

The following is a brief description of the two articles of the GATT which relate most directly to port development and maintenance.

Article III imposes restrictions on taxes. It requires that any tax structure not discriminate against imported products. Revenues raised from a tax covered by article III would have to be deposited into general tax revenues, not a trust fund. Taxes which could cause GATT problems are:

First, taxes which directly discriminate against imports. These include:

Taxes only on imports; or Higher taxes on imported products than on exported products or domestic trade.

Second, taxes which indirectly discriminate against imports. These include:

Tax structures which impose higher tax rates for products which are generally imported (such as TV's) than for products which are generally exported (such as grain).

Ad valorem taxes, which will most likely result in higher taxes for imported, high value commodities, as compared to lower value, export commodities, such as grain or coal.

Article VIII relates to fees; that is, assessments to pay for a specific service, such as dredging. If revenues are to be deposited into a trust fund, it is highly likely that, from the perspective of GATT, such assessments will be considered fees. Article VIII requires that fees be related to the cost of service provided.

Fees which could result in GATT problems are:

First, ad valorem fees or differentiated fees for various products. This is because the value of a product is not related to the need for dredging.

Second, fees at a specific port which are not directly related to the cost of dredging that port.

I must point out to my colleagues that the higher a fee is, the more intense the potential GATT problem will be. For example, if a fee were based only on current maintenance costs, the fee would average 18 cents per ton of commercial traffic. It is likely that another country would not go to the trouble of objecting to such a relatively small fee, even if it is contrary to the provisions of GATT.

On the other hand, if fees were to be based on construction, they would be considerably higher. The possibility of a protest or retaliatory action will substantially increase. It is also important to note that the criteria established for imposition of fees or taxes apply not only to the Federal Government, but also local or State entities.

I am pleased that enactment of S. 1962 would not appear to conflict with major provisions of the GATT. That is not true of other legislation or legislative proposals. Ambassador Brock's letter more clearly defines these conflicts. At this point, I ask unanimous consent that Ambassador Brock's letter be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

THE U.S. TRADE REPRESENTATIVE,
Washington, D.C., June 17, 1982.

Hon. JAMES ABDNOR,
U.S. Senate, Committee on Environment and Public Works, Washington, D.C.

DEAR JIM: Thank you for your letter of March 15, 1982. We appreciate your desire that any dredging legislation not adversely affect our compliance with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT).

A basic purpose of GATT is to prevent the imposition of new measures which provide hidden or indirect protection to domestic production. Two of the most important GATT provisions which accomplish this purpose are Articles III and VIII. Article III applies to the nondiscriminatory application of taxes and other regulations which relate to matters generally applicable to both imported and domestic products. Article VIII limits charges affecting foreign trade, other than duties and other than taxes covered by Article III, to the cost of services rendered to such trade by the bodies applying the charges.

Because of the exception in Article VIII for taxes covered by Article III, both Article III and Article VIII would probably not be applicable to the same fee. However, either one or the other of these two Articles would be relevant to any fee relating to imports. Whether a particular fee would be considered a tax under Article III, or a charge under Article VIII, will be considered in the attached memorandum relating to particular legislative proposals. Article VIII also applies to exports as well as imports, but Article III applies only to imports.

The basis for a user fee for dredging that would be most defensible under GATT would appear to be a port-specific fee based on the gross tonnage or draw of the vessels using the port where the dredging is done. The least defensible would be any fee based only on imported cargo. Other bases likely to raise serious GATT problems would be fees applied to all cargo on an ad valorem basis or on a specific basis but at different rates for different products. Furthermore, it is believed that it would be more difficult to defend under GATT a fee imposed at all ports to cover the cost of dredging at particular ports, than it would be to defend a fee imposed only at the port where the dredging is done.

Because of the complexity of the problems relating to the application of GATT provisions to various types of user fees, it would be desirable to set forth in section 5 of S. 1692 somewhat more specific rules for the imposition of such fees by non-Federal interests. Moreover, it might also be advisable to provide for review of, and concurrence in, the proposed fees by a Federal authority, as the Trade Representative.

The more general aspects of the relevant GATT Articles will be outlined first in the attached memorandum, and then the various provisions, or potential provisions, in dredging bills set forth in the memorandum attached to your letter will be considered in light of such GATT provisions.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM E. BROCK.

IMPLICATION OF DREDGING USER FEES IN RELATION TO THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE (GATT)

GENERAL ANALYSIS OF RELEVANT GATT PROVISIONS

Two provisions of GATT designed to prevent hidden barriers to foreign trade which are most likely to apply to user fees for dredging are Article III and Article VIII.

Article III opens with the following basic principle:

"1. The contracting parties recognize that internal taxes and other internal charges, and laws, regulations and requirements affecting the internal sale, offering for sale, purchase, transportation, distribution or use of products, and internal quantitative regulations requiring the mixture, processing or use of products in specified amounts or proportions, should not be applied to imported or domestic products so as to afford protection to domestic production."

Paragraph 2 of the Article deals with taxes and provides that the broad non-protective principle of the first paragraph shall apply to all taxes which affect imports:

"2. The products of the territory of any contracting party imported into the territory of any other contracting party shall not be subject, directly or indirectly, to internal taxes or other internal charges of any kind in excess of those applied directly or indirectly to like domestic products. Moreover, no contracting party shall otherwise apply internal taxes or other internal charges to imported or domestic products in a manner contrary to the principles set forth in paragraph 1."

Several commercial treaties of the United States contain national treatment provisions comparable to the first sentence of paragraph 2.

Article VIII opens as follows:

"1. (a) All fees and charges of whatever character (other than import and export duties and other than taxes within the purview of Article III) imposed by contracting parties on or in connection with importation or exportation shall be limited in amount to the approximate cost of services rendered and shall not represent an indirect protection to domestic products or a taxation of imports or exports for fiscal purposes.

"(b) The contracting parties recognize the need for reducing the number and diversity of fees and charges referred to in sub-paragraph (a).

(c) The contracting parties also recognize the need for minimizing the incidence and complexity of import and export formalities and for decreasing and simplifying import and export documentation requirements."

The first subparagraph contains an important general rule which would apply to any user fee which relates in any way to importation or exportation (unless Article III were found to apply to it). The other two subparagraphs contain principles which, although not legal rules, could well be relied on to interpret or apply legal rules.

Article II of GATT applies to the importation of products on which tariff concessions have been granted. This Article contains a comparable rule against any new "duties or charges of any kind" on the importation of such products (par. 1(b)), except "fees or other charges commensurate with the cost of services rendered" (par. 2(c)). This Article II rule, which is quite comparable to that in Article VIII, applies to most United States imports.

Article XXIII of the GATT permits a contracting party to press a complaint against another contracting party with respect to any action which it considers has "nullified or impaired" "a benefit accruing to it directly or indirectly" under GATT, whether or not "such action conflicts with the provisions of the Agreement" (par. 1(b)). This gives the opportunity for an investigation, a panel finding, recommendations for modification of the action which is the subject of the complaint, and possibly (although almost never formally utilized) the authorization of retaliation against such action. These could all apply even though no legal rule had been violated. However, in such a complaint procedure a complaint might to some extent rely on the general principles (such as those in the latter part of Article VIII:1).

Another GATT provision that is relevant to charges which may be imposed by non-Federal authorities is Article XXIV:12, which provides:

"12. Each contracting party shall take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure observance of the provisions of this Agreement by the regional and local governments and authorities within its territory."

Since any non-Federal authority would be acting pursuant to Federal authorization, this provision appears to require that such authorization be limited to the collection of fees which are consistent with GATT.

From the perspective of GATT, fees should not place a greater burden on imports than on like or competitive domestic products (Art. III). Consequently, user fees should not burden either imports or exports more than the approximate cost of channel maintenance or construction services for which the fees are charged, taking into account all vessels and cargo which utilize the services. This problem of not exceeding the cost of services rendered is likely to be greater if fees collected at one port are used to finance dredging at another port (Art. VIII).

Dredging user fees most likely to be consistent with GATT would appear to be fees based on gross tonnage or draw of vessels, which are imposed, without differentiation between types of cargo, at the port where the dredging was done. Whether Article III or VIII applies, the type of fee most likely to be inconsistent with GATT would be a fee imposed only on imports or exports, (except that Article III does not apply to exports). A uniform specific fee on all cargo loaded and unloaded at the port (or also in transit through it) without any differentiation between types of cargo, would be somewhat more defensible than an ad valorem fee. If Article VIII applies, an ad valorem fee would often have much less relationship to dredging services than a fee based on weight or volume. There might be considerable opportunity for complaints from other contracting parties that any variations in the rate of a fee (either ad valorem or specific) according to products involved would have a protective effect (in the sense of Article III) or would result in some products bearing more than the cost of services rendered (in the sense of Article VIII).

S. 1692 would authorize non-Federal agencies to impose fees. under Article XXIV the authorization should limit the agency's discretion in order to prevent it from imposing a fee inconsistent with GATT. You might want to amend S. 1692 to set the general standards of non-discrimination against cargo in foreign trade, and to require that fees be related to the cost of services rendered, with a provision for Federal Government review of the proposed non-Federal regulations. Finally, port specific user fees are less likely to be contrary to Article VIII of GATT than uniform fees applicable to all ports. This is because shippers which use the ports imposing the fees are paying for the benefits which they have received from the dredging at such ports.

It is not clear whether certain types of fees would be treated under GATT as a tax under Article III or a user fee under Article VIII. The decison would likely be based more on the incidence of the charge and the use of the proceeds than on the language of the law establishing it. For example, if a charge is collected at all ports but the proceeds are paid into a trust fund which will be used to pay the costs of particular dredging projects, use of the proceeds for such a specific purpose might well result in the charge being viewed as a fee to which Article VIII applies.

REPLIES TO SPECIFIC QUESTIONS RAISED REGARDING APPLICATION OF GATT TO PARTICULAR LEGISLATIVE PROVISIONS

Port specific user fees (S. 1692) and effect on GATT

I. Operation and Maintenance Dredging User fees collected by appropriate non-Federal interest to recover a specified percentage of the costs of dredging a deep draft channel or harbor (14 feet or deeper) including associated administrative expenditures; up-front financing and contract management by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers; annual lump sum payment by non-Federal interest to the Secretary of the Army. Fees established by non-Federal interest, pursuant to state law, with general authority granted by Congress. (S. 1692 does not specify type of fee.) [S. 1692:I]

Port specific user fees would be more defensible under GATT than those imposed at all ports for dredging at only certain ports. However, it would be desirable for the legislation to contain standards which the non-Federal authority would apply so that the fees would be consistent with GATT. There should probably also be requirements for some Federal review of non-Federal proposals for the same purpose.

Including the proposed standards in the legislation authorizing the fees would have some limiting effect. If there is no provision for Federal review, further limitations in the legislation might be desirable, such as precluding fees only on cargo in foreign trade loaded or unloaded, and perhaps also precluding ad valorem fees or different fees on different types of cargo.

It is assumed that, for purposes of A to C below, the fees would apply alike to foreign and domestic trade.

Options not specified by S. 1692:

A. Tonnage-based fees on cargo [S. 1692:I:A].

From the standpoint of both Article III and Article VIII, a tonnage-based fee, uniform on all types of cargo (whether loaded or unloaded, or remaining on a vessel in transit through the port), would appear the best way to assess the fee, if it is to be on the cargo rather than on the vessel.

B. Value-based fees on cargo [S. 1692:I:B].

As indicated above, an ad valorem fee on cargo would probably not be defensible under Article VIII, because it would put an unjustifiably heavy burden on imports of high value products (as jewelry) compared with low value (as grain). From the standpoint of Article III, if the high value products were not generally transported domestically by ship, such a fee could have a protective effect contrary to Article III.

C. Fees on vessels based on registered tonnage or draw [S. 1692:I:C].

Fees based on draw of the vessels would appear to be the most defensible under GATT. The deeper the draw, the more the vessel benefits from the dredging and therefore it would be paying for the services rendered to it. To a somewhat lesser extent the same general approach would apply to fees based on gross tonnage. If one could prove that most vessels with large gross tonnage or draw were engaged in foreign rather than domestic trade, it might be argued under Article III that the fee had a protective effect. However, it is likely such a fee on vessels would come under the provisions of Article VIII (cost of services rendered) rather than Article III (nondiscrimination against imports).

D. Fees on import and export cargo or vessels [S. 1692:I:D].

Placing the user fee only on foreign trade would clearly be inconsistent with the GATT, whether the fees were found to conflict with Article III or Article VIII. It would directly discriminate against imports in favor of domestic commerce, and would require imports and exports to pay the entire cost of benefits which were also used by domestic trade.

To the extent that all or most of the burden of the fee is on imported cargo the fee would probably be considered to be a tax under Article III. This is because there would also be domestic products brought into the port on which the fee might similarly have been applied. Imposing fees on cargo in foreign trade alone would be in violation of that Article because it would not be similarly imposed on cargo in domestic trade. If it were to be considered a fee under Article VIII, it would clearly be contrary to that Article, since imports would be paying the full costs of dredging, which would benefit domestic trade, and exports, as well. To the extent that all or most of the fee is on vessels which principally carry imports or exports, other countries could also argue, under both Articles III and VIII, that this constituted an indirect discrimination against imports and had a protective effect on domestic production. It is also possible that an argument could be made that, under Article VIII, imports or exports were bearing a disproportionate share of the cost of dredging. However, whichever Article was applicable, the argument against the fee would be weaker than if the fee were only on the cargo in foreign trade.

What has been said with respect to imports under Article VIII would also apply to a fee only on exports. Since Article III does not apply to exports, and there is no comparable export provision in GATT, there might well be no GATT problem if such a fee was not found to come under Article VIII.

II. New construction dredging.—User fees collected by appropriate non-federal interest to recover costs of dredging improvement project including associated administrative expenditures. [S. 1692:II:1st par.]

The discussion of fees covering operation and mantenance costs would generally apply to new construction. However, since new construction costs would be considerably greater than those for maintenance, any fees which placed a disproportionate burden on foreign trade might be more likely to result in a GATT complaint and a finding of inconsistency with a provision of the Agreement.

All project costs incurred by non-federal interest; revenue would remain with the non-Federal interest; fees set, pursuant to state law; general authority granted by Congress. [S. 1692:II:2d par.]

In relation to recovery of the cost of new construction, the agency is likely to be providing for higher fees, it is probably more important to include standards in legislation which would limit the discretion of the non-Federal authority to set fees, and to give a Federal agency authority to review the regulations.

A. Fees to reflect the service and benefits provided to each commercial vessel or cargo laden therein; all vessels eligible (S. 1692) [S. 1692:II:A].

As indicated under S. 1692:I:C above; port specific fees on vessels based on their gross tonnage or draw would be the most defensible user fees under GATT. As stated under [S. 1692:I:A, a port specific fee uniformly applicable to all cargo in vessels using the port, whether loaded, unloaded, or in transit, would be unlikely to cause a GATT legal problem. However, if the fee were ad valorem, or specific at different rates for different types of cargo, it might accord indirect protection to certain domestic products (see above under S. 1692:I:B).

B. Fee system left to discretion non-Federal interest without "service and benefits" limitation (not in S. 1692): [S.1692:II:B].

As explained under S.1692:I, delegation of authority to a non-Federal body, without any limitations on the discretion of the body, could lead to GATT problems under Article XXIV. Moreover, problems are probably more likely because of larger dredging costs, and consequently larger fees, for construction.

1. Tonnage-Based Fees on Cargo [S.1692:II:B:1]:

As indicated under S.1692:I:A, this would be the best way to assess the fee if it is to be on the cargo rather than the vessel.

2. Value-Based Fees on Cargo [S.1692:II:B:2]:

As indicated under S.1692:I:B, the ad valorem basis for the fee would probably be the least defensible basis, except for a system which would openly discriminate against foreign trade. Moreover, there would probably be more likelihood of a complaint in the event of a larger fee for new construction than for maintenance.

3. Fees on Vessels Based on Registered Tonnage or Draw [S.1692:II:B:3]:

Gross tonnage or draw, as a basis for the fee, would be the best basis, as explained under S.1692:I:C.

National uniform fees (S. 2217)

Operation, Maintenance and New Construction Dredging at Deep-Draft Ports.

A. Uniform Federal tax on each type of cargo unloaded from any vessel at all deep draft ports (14 feet or deeper), which may vary according to the type of commodity, to be paid by vessel owner; rates promulgated as regulations by Secretary of Treasury; discretion left to Secretary on effect of tax rate on international trade; tax only on cargo unloaded from any vessel [S.2217:A].

The bill calls the fee a tax. However, because of its use to cover the cost of dredging at particular ports, it might well be considered a fee under Article VIII. If such a fee were applicable to all ports, countries exporting large quantities of goods to ports where minimal dredging, for which the fee was imposed, was done would be likely to complain that such imports were paying the cost of services rendered to other ports where the major dredging was done.

Moreover, if the rate of the fee varies according to the type of cargo unloaded, a strong case could be made that the cargo subject to the higher fee was paying, in addition to the cost of services rendered to it, part of the cost of services rendered to the cargo subject to the lower rate. Moreover, since the justification for dredging is related to the size of the vessels using the port, a charge based on the value of the cargo would have little or no relation to the cost of the services rendered to such cargo.

If the charge were considered to be a tax, imposed uniformly only on all cargo unloaded at any deep draft ports, it might not be questionable under Article II if it applied equally to both domestic and imported cargo.

However, if the fee were imposed on a specific basis with differentiation between types of products, it might well be challenged as resulting in indirect protection of domestic production. Such a differentiation could possibly place an excessive burden on types of imported products which are highly competitive with domestic production, thereby resulting in indirect protection to domestic production. Applying the fee to cargo unloaded at all ports would presumably reduce the level of the fee at ports where major dredging is being done, and consequently might somewhat diminish the likelihood that a complaint would be brought.

Other options not specified by S.2217:

1. Tax only on imports [S.2217:A:1].

As discussed under S.1692:I:D, if the fee were applied only to imports would raise the most serious problem of clear inconsistency with both Articles III and VIII.

2. Tax only on exports [S.2217:A:2].

Although Article III does not apply to exports, Article VIII does. Placing the cost of new dredging operations only on exports would clearly exceed the cost of service rendered to exports under the provisions of the latter Article.

3. Tax on all cargo from any vessel [S.2217:A:3].

The GATT implications of applying a fee to all cargo unloaded, whether imports or domestic trade, has been discussed under S.2217:A.

4. Dedicated percentage of customs revenue [S.2217:A:4].

The imposition of no new fee, but the use of a proportion of revenue collected from customs duties applied consistent with GATT, would raise no legal problem under the Agreement. It might possibly make the United States more reluctant to negotiate new or further tariff reductions in the future.

B. Aggregate revenue from all ports collected in a Federal Trust Fund; Fund, subject to appropriations, shall pay for all operation and maintenance costs at deep-draft ports beyond that required to maintain depth of greater than 14 feet; and 90 percent of Congressionally authorized improvement project costs at specific ports up to depths of 45 feet. [S.2217:B].

The comments under S.2217:A discuss the apparent inconsistency with the cost of service limitation in GATT of collecting fees, even though referred to as taxes, at all ports to pay for maintenance and improvement at only certain ports. The payment of the charges into a trust fund to be used for dredging at particular ports appears to indicate that the charges would be user fees under Article VIII.

C. State port user tax imposed on all items loaded onto any vessel at a port in such state and unloaded from such vessel at foreign port (export only); tax on vessel owner and at uniform rate suggested by Secretary of the Treasury; revenue paid to General Fund of Treasury. [S.2217:C].

The GATT problems with non-Federal taxes on exports only have been noted at the end of the discussion under 1692:I:D. There would also be the problems of uniform fees imposed at all ports to pay for services at only some, the desirability of criteria for the suggestion by the Secretary of the Treasury.●

REMARKS OF GOV. WILLIAM JANKLOW CONCERNING WATER FOR ENERGY DEVELOPMENT AND GROWTH

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, on June 8, 1982, South Dakota's Gov. William Janklow addressed a forum at the University of Colorado School of Law in Boulder, Colo., concerning the issue of water for energy development and growth. The Governor's remarks are indicative of the realistic and progressive position of the State of South Dakota on this important issue. His oral remarks were accompanied by an impressive display of charts and graphs which cannot be reprinted in the RECORD, but my staff will be pleased to reproduce them for anyone who would like copies.

I ask that the Governor's statement be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

REMARKS OF WILLIAM J. JANKLOW, GOVERNOR, STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA, PRESENTED TO NEW SOURCES OF WATER FOR ENERGY DEVELOPMENT AND GROWTH, INTERBASIN TRANSFERS, AT UNIVERSITY OF COLORADO SCHOOL OF LAW, BOULDER, COLO., JUNE 8, 1982

SOUTH DAKOTA AND THE ETSI EXPERIENCE

Introduction

In this paper I would like to take the opportunity to remove from the emotional arena South Dakota's experience with ETSI Pipeline Project and its coal slurry pipeline proposal and to explain to fellow practioners of the legal profession, in the context of a rational examination, what it is South Dakota and ETSI have done. In doing so, I am confident that the attendees of this conference, as fellow professionals, will agree that South Dakota was placed in a position that a decision had to be made and action had to be taken. I am also confident you will agree that the decision South Dakota made was the correct one under the circumstances. In presenting these remarks here today, I would like to discuss South Dakota's impression of why coal slurry pipelines are becoming a force in the coal transportation market, why the Missouri River is an attractive water source from the standpoint of both ETSI and South Dakota, why South Dakota was drawn into this relationship with ETSI, what the basic contract between South Dakota and ETSI provides, what it is the downstream states are complaining about, and what the law of the 1944 Flood Control Act and Federal law respecting inter-basin transfers really is.

Why coal slurry?

In an address to the American Public Power Association delivered on May 7, 1980 Mayor Lyla Cockrell of San Antonio related her city's experiences in its attempts to convert from natural gas to coal in its municipal electric utility. Mayor Cockrell indicated that things went very smoothly in designing the equipment to convert to coal and in obtaining long-term coal contracts from Sun Oil Company at its Cordero Mine near Gillette, Wyoming. With respect to the transportation of that coal from Wyoming to Texas, however, the Mayor related an entirely different story.

"Unfortunately, this story is not the same for the railroad freight rate. When we were looking for coal leases . . ., the railroad at point of origin, quoted us a price of $7.90 a ton for hauling the coal 1630 miles from Wyoming to Texas by unit train, with [San Antonio] furnishing some $30 million dollars of coal cars. Subsequently, when the commitment was made to the Cordero mine, [the railroad] withdrew its offer and began quoting prices of as high as $16 a ton. When no agreement could be reached we were ready to stockpile coal. We petitioned the Interstate Commerce Commission to set a rate, and they did so in October, 1976, at $10.93 a ton. In the next two years, several freight rate increases were granted until the rate reached $12.42 a ton. It became apparent that railroad lobbyists were hard at work. Then, on December 1, 1978, the ICC granted a rate increase to $16.12 per ton. Eight additional rate increases since that time have driven the freight rate to $20.25 per ton. There have been five increases since October 1 of last year!"

These remarks by the Mayor of San Antonio are sufficient argument to explain why some people feel there is a need for competition in the coal transportation market.

ETSI believes that it has a competitive advantage over railroad transportation because of the capital intensive nature of coal slurry pipelines. Chart I is a graph taken from a presentation by Frank Odasz, of ETSI given to the Interstate Oil Compact Commission in 1981. It represents the claim by ETSI that 70% of a coal slurry pipeline's operating costs go to debt service and are fixed. Only 30% of slurry pipeline operating costs are variable and, therefore, are subject to inflation. Railroads on the other hand currently have only 15% of their operating costs fixed and 85% of their operating costs are variable and are subject to inflation. As Chart I shows, during an inflationary period the mode of transportation with the highest percentage of fixed cost gains a considerable competitive advantage. Under ETSI's calculations, at a 5% rate of inflation as is represented by the 1979 GNPD, the cumulative savings in operating costs over a 30 year period represents $32 billion.

From our perspective, we are receiving arguments from both sides. The railroads claim that slurry lines are so expensive that they will never get off the ground and, in fact, the first coal slurry line ever constructed, they claim, was put out of business by railroad competition. ETSI on the other hand claims that the first slurry line located in Ohio did, in fact, compete with railroad transportation but stopped its operation for other unrelated reasons. Our only conclusion is that the first coal slurry line resulted in the railroads' initiating unit train transportation for coal and consequently lowering rates for coal customers.

Why Missouri River water?

Chart II is an outline map of the Missouri River Basin. It covers all of Nebraska and portions of nine other states. The basin covers ⅛ of the total land area of the United States and also extends into Canada. On an average annual basis and based upon 1970 estimated levels of depletion, the annual flow of the Missouri River at Sioux City, which is the traditional dividing line between the upper and lower basin, is 21 million acre-feet of water per year. The River is a gaining river and by the time it empties into the Mississippi River just upstream from St. Louis, the average annual flow is approximately 54 million acre feet of water per year. The net gain, therefore, averages 33 million acre feet of water per year between Sioux City and the river's mouth.

This is a substantial amount of water in comparison to amounts projected to be necessary for energy development. The natural flows of the Missouri River, however, have been enhanced by the construction of 6 reservoirs on the mainstem of the river itself. Four of those reservoirs are located in South Dakota, 1 in North Dakota and 1 in Montana. The total storage capacity of those reservoirs is approximately 74 million acre feet of water. Chart III shows the actual level of storage in those reservoirs during 1981 and the projected storage levels during the remainder of 1982. On the right hand side of the chart, the bottom line represents a storage forecast if precipitation for the remainder of the year is in the lower 10% of the historical experience. The next to the bottom line represents the storage forecast if precipitation for the remainder of the year is in the lower quartile, the middle line represents the storage forecast for median precipitation, the next to the top line is the forecast for upper quartile precipitation, and the top line is the forecast for precipitation in the top 10% of the historical experience. As the Chart shows at the beginning of March in 1982, there were still approximately 52 million acre feet of water in storage in the main stem system on the Missouri River. This represents more than 2 years' average flow of the Missouri held in storage in South Dakota, North Dakota and Montana.

The purposes of these dams is navigation, flood control, irrigation and hydropower development. Chart IV shows a comparison in year 1975 of the actual flows of the Missouri River at Sioux City, Iowa, with the flows that would have naturally occurred in the absence of the mainstem reservoirs. Flood stage at Sioux City is approximately 90 thousand cubic feet per second. As you will note, for most of the months of May, June, and July the Missouri River at Sioux City would have been at or above flood stage. Because of the dams, however, this water was held back and at no time did the actual flow ever exceed flood level. Furthermore, the natural flows during the last portion of the navigation season in September, October, and November would have fallen below those flows necessary to maintain navigation on the Missouri River. Actual releases from the dams, however, maintained flows at a level very close to 65,000 cubic feet per second and a full service navigation season was provided up until the end of November. A similar chart for 1980 and 1981 is presented in Chart V. Chart VI shows the power generated by the Missouri River mainstem system. The receipts from this power are used to repay the federal government for its investment in the power and irrigation portions of the mainstem reservoirs.

Chart VII shows the flood damages prevented by the mainstem reservoirs. As of 1981, the cumulative savings in flood damages estimated by the United States Army Corps of Engineers is 1.537 billion dollars. This total exceeds the money invested by the United States Government in the mainstem dams for flood control purposes. These benefits are received almost entirely by the downstream states. Note that 1978 represented a savings of $450 million of flood damages that never occurred. In exchange for this flood protection downstream, the State of South Dakota gave up approximately 530,000 acres of prime farm land that is now under water and is contributing little or nothing to the South Dakota economy.

Chart VIII shows the navigation on the Missouri River through 1982. The top protion of the bar represents navigation tonnage moving in an upstream direction. The remainder of the bar represents navigation tonnage moving in a downstream direction. As is evident from the fact that little or no navigation occurred in the years prior to 1954 when the first dams were closed, this navigation would not be taking place without the construction of those dams.

The question arises from South Dakota's standpoint: Who is benefiting from the construction of these reservoirs? They were all authorized in the Flood Control Act of 1944. In addition to the flood control and navigation benefits downstream which have been realized, the 1944 Act also provided and authorized the irrigation of 806,000 acres of land in South Dakota, 1 million acres of land in North Dakota and a similar amount in Montana. Those irrigation developments have, to the largest extent, never been achieved. Not one gallon of Missouri River water is being used for irrigation in South Dakota under a facility authorized by the 1944 Flood Control Act. In exchange for this, the overwhelming majority of the power generated in South Dakota on these dams is exported out of state. Chart IX shows the distribution of power from South Dakota dams during federal fiscal year 1980. This allocation changes slightly from year to year but its basic point that other states receive more power benefits from the dams constructed in South Dakota than does South Dakota continues to be true year after year after year.

While the loss of 530,000 acres of land in South Dakota is providing substantial navigation, flood control and power benefits for our neighboring states, South Dakota itself is receiving little or no benefit in a substantial economic sense from the construction of those reservoirs. Chart X is a representation of water used in the member states of the Western Governor's Policy Office. As will be noted, no state in that organization uses less water than South Dakota. In fact, our sister State of Nebraska who is complaining loudly about South Dakota's relationship with ETSI is one of the larger water users among the western states. This chart shows in a graphical manner why at the time South Dakota was confronted with a need to make a decision on ETSI, it was felt that the State should do those things which will enable it to gain benefits from the development under the 1944 Flood Control Act that other states downstream from us have been receiving for the last 20 years.

One thing that was reserved to the State of South Dakota was the right of the upper basin states to allocate water pursuant to their state laws. In fact, the 1944 Flood Control Act is notable as an expression by Congress of State's rights in the allocation of waters during an era when TVA and the Boulder Canyon Project Act represented substantial steps in the opposite direction—total federal control of the allocation and use of water resources. Chart XI shows the language of Section 1(b) of the 1944 Flood Control Act. That section was enacted into law at the insistence of the western states and is commonly known as the O'Mahoney-Milliken amendment. Its plain language is that states lying wholly or partially west of the 98th meridian (South Dakota and the upper basin states) have the right to allocate the waters in their states for beneficial consumptive uses even if such allocation represents an impairment in navigation uses of the river.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I ask that the text of the O'Mahoney-Milliken amendment be printed at this point in the Governor's statement.

The text of the amendment follows:

FLOOD CONTROL ACT OF 1944

SECTION 1. (b) The use for navigation, in connection with the operation and maintenance of such works herein authorized for construction, of waters arising in States lying wholly or partly west of the ninety-eighth meridian shall be only such use as does not conflict with any beneficial consumptive use, present or future, in States lying wholly or partly west of the ninety-eighth meridian, of such waters for domestic, municipal, stock water, irrigation, mining, or industrial purposes.

Mr. ABDNOR. I ask that the remainder of the Governor's statement be printed in the RECORD.

The Governor's statement continues:

It is interesting to note that there was no doubt in the mind of Congress when this provision was enacted that this is exactly what Congress intended. In fact, Senator Milliken stated during the hearings on the 1944 Flood Control Act:

"As I pointed out the other day, you take navigation here. The people are figuring on a 9 foot channel or a 12 foot channel and, assuming, Congressman, that that reflects a conflict of water use—I don't know whether it will or not; the figures are so conflicting here that I cannot reach a decision. But assume that it would. In the meantime they have built their barges, they have built their docks, they have established their track sidings. They have built their wharves, they have built all their accessories, and then they would be claiming to be a vested interest recognized by Congress. Now these are the things that we got to guard against." (Hearings on H.R. 4485, Senate Commerce Committee, 78th Congress, 2d Sess., at 605.)

In addition, remarks from other Congressmen indicated clearly that they understood the meaning of this provision. Representative Lemke of North Dakota simply stated, "We are not going to take water from the people in the states where it originated so that some fellow may float a yacht down the lower Mississippi Valley, while the people and their cattle in the upper regions go hungry on account of the lack of food and water." (Cong. Rec., 78th Cong., Second Sess., page 4213) Representative Dirksen from Illinois stated, "Now come the folks from this area, where water is a priceless commodity, and say that before we take away all their water for navigation purposes to sustain a barge or a vessel that may haul commodities, we believe preference should be given to beneficial consumptive." Id. at 4215. Senator O'Mahoney himself stated that "the purpose has been at all times to protect the historic and traditional rights of the people of the west to use the waters rising in the west in a manner that has been recognized by law and by court decision for almost 100 years." Id. 8420. There can be little doubt that the meaning of the O'Mahoney-Milliken amendments was to guarantee to the states the right to allocate waters within their boundaries without regard to the impact of such allocation on navigation.

Why ETSI and South Dakota?

In 1974 the Wyoming State Legislature authorized the Wyoming State Engineer to issue groundwater permits from the Madison formation to ETSI. Those permits, as eventually issued, entitled ETSI to withdraw an average of 15,000 acre feet of water a year from the Madison formation. Individual yearly withdrawals could go up to 20,000 acre feet per year as long as the long term average was not violated. Chart XII is taken from the Bureau of Land Management Environmental Impact Statement on the ETSI Coal Slurry Pipeline. It shows the relative location of ETSI's proposed well field in Niobrara County. The well field is located immediately adjacent to the South Dakota-Wyoming border. The concentric lines on the chart indicate the number of feet in drawdown that would be experienced by the potentiometric head in the lifetime of the ETSI project. It will be noted from the chart the City of Edgemont's water level would drop approximately 275 feet. This would necessitate the drilling of new wells not only for Edgemont but for numerous ranchers and other communities in the area. In addition, flow in the Fall River which runs through the municipality of Hot Springs would be reduced to such an extent that Hot Springs wastewater treatment costs would increase by approximately $100,000 per year. Finally, the flow reductions would also affect environmental and esthetic values in streams in the Black Hills of South Dakota. The Black Hills are located within and around the Madison outcrop in Custer, Pennington, Lawrence and Meade Counties in South Dakota. This potential use of groundwater in Wyoming presents an unacceptable threat to existing uses of water in the State of South Dakota. In order to prevent this potential damage, the State found itself facing long and protracted litigation that may have preserved the status quo but would not have presented any net gain to either South Dakota, Wyoming or ETSI.

In addition to the need to eliminate ETSI's threat to South Dakota's Madison Aquifer water supplies, there exists in that area of South Dakota between the Oahe Reservoir and the Black Hills a very real need for good quality drinking water for both livestock and humans. In fact, some communities and ranches in this area have naturally occurring contents in their water supplies that are 3 to 30 times the EPA primary drinking water standard. It has long been the dream of western South Dakota residents to bring Missouri River water westward to cure these and other deficiences in their water supplies but physical and, ultimately, economic barriers prevented this from happening. It soon became apparent to the western residents of our State that the only practical means of achieving their dream was through a massive subsidy either from the Federal government or from the emerging energy industry in Wyoming.

Finally, as is apparent from the preceeding section of these remarks and the accompanying charts, South Dakota has received little that was authorized under the Pick-Sloan Plan that has provided so much benefit in navigation, flood control, and hydropower to the downstream states. While Nebraska which gave up virtually no land to the Missouri River Reservoirs has received 222,800 acres of Pick-Sloan irrigation projects, not one acre of South Dakota land is irrigated from the Missouri River by a Pick-Sloan diversion. With cost sharing rapidly becoming the word of the day in Federal water development, it was apparent that South Dakota's chances of obtaining Pick-Sloan irrigation development were going to get slimmer unless she developed a revenue source comparable to that provided by Nebraska's irrigated economy and Wyoming's, Montana's and North Dakota's coal, oil and gas reserves.

South Dakota's relationship with ETSI prior to 1981 had a long and stormy history. As far back as 1974, ETSI and South Dakota have been cussing and discussing the potential for an arrangement that would avoid a showdown over the Madison Formation. In 1977, the South Dakota Legislature passed a bill authorizing the grant of a water right for Oahe Reservoir water to ETSI that ETSI could have used merely as a backup for its Madison Aquifer source. That bill was vetoed and an attempt to override it failed in the State Senate by one vote.

It was not until May of 1981 when ETSI's South Dakota Counsel happened to run into me in the Capitol cafeteria one day that I mentioned an interest in avoiding what seemed to be inevitable litigation. The resulting conversation grew into more formal negotiations, and it was not until this process began that it became apparent that ETSI was willing to look to the Oahe Reservoir as a primary source of water instead of a backup and hold its Madison Formation water rights in reserve to be used only if Missouri River water were physically or legally available. In our negotiations we attempted to pursuade ETSI to give up its Madison Formation water rights, but it soon became apparent that no deal containing that condition could be struck.

Once ETSI's willingness to use Missouri River water as a primary source became apparent, the other main provisions of the contract to provide water to western South Dakota communities along the pipeline and money to the State's Water Facilities Construction Fund were hammered into place after long and arduous negotiations, a special session of the South Dakota Legislature, and longer and more arduous negotiations to actually draft the technical agreement. Once this agreement began to take shape and it appeared that our goals with respect to preserving the Madison Formation, providing water to western South Dakota communities, and obtaining money for water development were actually achievable, it became impossible for South Dakota to reject this virtual bird in the hand in favor of protracted and uncertain litigation that might possibly accomplish only one of our goals.

The deal

Charts XIII, XIV, XV, XVI and XVII outline the basic agreement between the South Dakota Conservancy District, which is the contracting entity for the State of South Dakota, and ETSI. The basic $9 million payments which begin with construction of the coal slurry pipeline proper are indexed to the GNPD (gross national product deflator). Our calculations show that if the GNPD behaves over the next 50 years exactly as it did during the last 50 years, the indexed payments could total approximately $1.4 billion over the life of the contract.

Negotiating this contract and structuring the arrangement presented several unique and stickly legal problems. The first was the provision of the South Dakota State Constitution which prohibits the legislature from granting to any private concern any special privilege, franchise, grant, or immunity whatsoever and prohibits the legislature from enacting any special legislation where the same purpose can be accomplished through a law of general applicability. We have preserved the legality of this transaction in this regard by enacting a statute of general applicability which allows the South Dakota Conservancy District to apply for and to obtain water rights for the purpose of transferring them for consideration to third persons for ultimate use in energy development both in and out of South Dakota. The general provisions of the agreement as presented here in Charts XIII through XVII were, in fact, presented to the legislature. In reality, however, the legislation made no specific mention of ETSI and the South Dakota Conservancy District could, in fact, have applied for and transferred the water rights to energy users other than ETSI. Nothing in the legislation mentioned ETSI, and nothing except our desire to prevent the legislation from being repealed in the January, 1982, Legislative Session required us as a matter of law to consummate the proposed arrangement with ETSI.

In addition, the application by the South Dakota Conservancy District for a water right passed through the same legal and administrative procedures as any other water right application in South Dakota. The approving body, the South Dakota Water Management Board, held over 40 hours of administrative hearings on this permit application alone. The application was submitted to the same rigorous tests and scrutiny that this Board administers to all other permit applications, and the Board, as a result, voted unanimously to approve the permit noting that ETSI as ultimate recipient of the permit had the present intent to appropriate the water, that the project was feasible, that unappropriated water was available, and that the proposed project was clearly in the public interest of the citizens of South Dakota.

The other major theoretical problem involved the basic ability of the State to convert its interest in water held for ultimate use by individual members of the public into other assets, namely cash. Our legal analysis is that, among other things, the arrangement described above whereby the Conservancy District obtains the water right and the consideration for its transfer is placed in a trust fund for water development administered by the Conservancy District preserves this transaction in this regard. Water rights, after all, are sold every day in many of the western states. If private individuals that can do this with property acquired from the State, an independent authority created by the State for water development purposes should be able to do the same.

In addition, a great deal of attention was paid to the legal rights of the states downstream from South Dakota. After analysis of the pertinent provisions of the Flood Control Act of 1944 discussed above and a review of some of the facts pointed out in the next section, it was determined that South Dakota's allocation of Missouri River water to a coal slurry pipeline originating in Wyoming stood on firm legal ground vis-a-vis downstream states.

What are the other States complaining about?

On a substantive basis, the downstream states claim ETSI and, even more so, additional diversions of this type will impair their claimed rights to Missouri River water for navigation, municipal, domestic, irrigation, pollution assimilation, fish and wildlife, recreational, and esthetic purposes. On a legal basis, their complaints apparently center around their claim that ETSI is an inter-basin transfer and also around Section 6 of the Flood Control Act of 1944 which authorizes the Army Corps of Engineers to enter into contracts for surplus water for municipal and industrial purposes.

Chart XVIII compares the average ETSI withdrawal at the rate of 50,000 acre feet per year with the discharge of the Missouri River at the Oahe Dam near Pierre, South Dakota. As you will note, ETSI's withdrawal represents only 0.28% of the average annual 1981 discharge of the Oahe Dam. In contrast to this, most measuring devices have an inherent error of 5%. The result is that it would take more than 17 ETSI's at 50,000 acre feet per year each to create a withdrawal from the Oahe Reservoir large enough to be measured at Pierre, South Dakota. Because of contributions to the Missouri River downstream from Pierre, the effect of 17 ETSI's still could not be measured with any certainty when the river passes through Sioux City, Iowa.

As a further comparison, it should be noted that each year at the end of the navigation season releases from the Gavins Point Dam, which is furthest downstream on the Missouri, are cut from approximately 32,000 cfs to about 15,000 cfs for the purpose of conserving water in storage and concurrently to maintain stream flows for municipal, domestic, and other uses including water quality downstream. Whether such large releases during the off season are necessary for downstream purposes is problematic. The Corps of Engineers, however, has determined that releases of this magnitude can be made without impairing other requirements and purposes of the reservoirs. This cut-back in flow lasts for approximately 4 months until the beginning of the next ensuing navigation season and represents a reduction in Missouri River flow of approximately 53%. We are unaware of any inability of the Missouri River to meet downstream desires other than navigation during this period when its flow above Sioux City is cut to 47% of navigation season releases. The Missouri River, after all, is a gaining stream and picks up, on an average, 33 million acre feet of water every year below Sioux City in addition to an average contribution of 21 million acre feet of water from the watershed above Sioux City.

Another interesting figure comes from a report written by the Missouri River Basin Commission, a joint federal-state entity governed by Federal agency representatives and representatives appointed by the governors of all 10 Missouri River Basin states, and published in December, 1978 at the request of the now nearly defunct Water Resources Council. That report, entitled "Upper Missouri River Basin Water Availability Assessment for Coal Technology Requirements," addressed the water necessary, and its availability, for probable energy development in the States of Wyoming, Montana and North Dakota. In its baseline assessment, the Missouri River Basin Commission projected that, by 1985, 150,706 acre feet of water per year would be necessary to meet coal development requirements in these States. 30,488 acre feet of this total would be used for coal slurry pipelines. By the year 2000, the Commission projected that 237,481 acre feet per year with 78,056 acre feet per year going to coal slurry pipelines would be necessary for energy development. These figures are interesting not because they represent relatively large amounts of water, but because the total amount projected for the year 2000 even if it were all diverted from the Oahe Reservoir could still not be accurately detected by a gauge in the stream below the Oahe Dam. The projected 2000 demand is less than one-half of the annual evaporation from the Oahe Reservoir and should certainly be no cause for alarm in light of the 53% reduction in stream flow that occurs every fall at the close of the navigation season.

With respect to the inter-basin transfer issue, the legal questions here are easily resolved. The United States Supreme Court has on three separate occasions declared a diversion's status as an inter-basin transfer to be irrelevant from a legal perspective. New Jersey v. New York, 283 U.S. 336 (1931); Connecticut v. Massachusetts, 282 U.S. 660 (1931); Wyoming v. Colorado, 259 U.S. 419 (1922). I am sure these cases will be examined in great detail during this conference, and I need not repeat that exercise here. I do, however, draw your attention to Justice Holmes' opinion in New Jersey. In that case the State of New York proposed the diversion of 600 million gallons of water a day from the Delaware River into the Hudson River Basin. New Jersey's complaint against this proposed diversion resembles nothing more than a script for the cries currently being made by downstream states against South Dakota's proposed diversion for ETSI. It was in New Jersey that Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote his famous line, "A river is more than an amenity, it is a treasure." 283 U.S. 342. Shortly thereafter, Justice Holmes made it abundantly clear that the issue of an inter-basin transfer is truly irrelevant and serves only as a make-weight argument. Justice Holmes said, "the removal of water to a different watershed obviously must be allowed at times unless States are to be deprived of the most beneficial use on formal grounds. In fact, it has been allowed repeatedly and has been practiced by the States concerned." 283 U.S. 343. Justice Holmes then went on to allow a diversion from the Delaware River basin in the amount of 440 million gallons daily. According to the best information available to us, this amounts to 6% of the average flow of the Delaware River. As was discussed earlier, nothing approaching that high percentage of Missouri River flows is currently being contemplated for diversion to energy industry use.

In addition, it is a bit difficult to understand how the States of Nebraska and Missouri, for instance, can, in all honesty, complain about inter-basin transfer. Nebraska, while engaging in no inter-basin transfers itself, is downstream on the Platte River and is the direct of indirect beneficiary of at least 3 inter-basin transfers from the Colorado River Basin into the Platte River Basin. The largest of this amounts to 505,000 acre feet of water yearly in the Denver, Colorado area. If these inter-basin transfers were not being made it is difficult to predict how much worse the water disputes between Nebraska and its upstream neighbors on the Platte would be.

Missouri takes this process one step further and actually exports water out of the Missouri River Basin at the town of Springfield. This diversion consists of a water supply intake within the City of Springfield and within the Missouri River Basin and a wastewater outfall within the City of Springfield lying outside the Missouri River Basin. South Dakota acknowledges that Springfield's diversion of water out of the Missouri River Basin may be necessary in order to distribute water from one side of the City to the other. It does not appear to us, however, that Missouri's necessity is any less than South Dakota's need to use industrial water development to subsidize delivery of Missouri River water to western South Dakota towns where the radium concentrations exceed the EPA limits by a factor of 30. The inter-basin transfer at Springfield amounted to 16,800 acre feet in 1978, a diversion of the same order of magnitude as that proposed by ETSI. A similar inter-basin transfer of water is conducted by the City of Butte, Montana in its municipal water supply. All in all the Missouri Basin States Association has identified four inter-basin transfers importing water into the Missouri River and two inter-basin transfers exporting water from the Missouri River Basin. (Chart XIX) The net result is that the Missouri River Basin is a net gainer of approximately 644,000 acre feet of water yearly. It is difficult to undestand how Missouri River Basin States can be complaining about inter-basin transfers when all of the basin states and particularly those riparian to and downstream from the Platte River, have been the beneficiaries of such actions for a long period of time.

Finally, with respect to the inter-basin transfers, I submit that ETSI is not an inter-basin transfer in the traditional sense of that word. Water is not being used to develop resources located outside of the Missouri River Basin. It is Missouri River water that is used to develop a Missouri River Basin resource-Wyoming Coal. Water is consumed and the beneficial use is initiated within the Missouri River Basin near Gillette, Wyoming.

Logic dictates that there is little difference between this use of Missouri River water to develop in-basin coal and the use of water by an Omaha brewery which may ship its products into eastern Iowa or the actual export of raw water out of the basin to the extent of 54 million acre feet per year at the mouth of the river above St. Louis. With respect to this last figure, the additional water released from Gavins Point Dam during the navigation season during 1980 amounted to approximately 8,100,000 acre feet of additional water released for navigation purposes. Navigation tonnage during 1980 totaled 3,009,612 tons. The cargo carrying efficiency of this navigation water was, therefore, 0.37 tons per acre foot of additional water released. ETSI on the other hand will deliver in its first pipeline 37,500,000 tons of coal with only 20,000 acre feet of water. The carrying capacity of water to be used by ETSI is 1,875 tons per acre foot. The water use efficiency of ETSI's first coal slurry pipeline, will, therefore, be nearly 507,000 percent greater than that of the increased water released for navigation during the 1981 season. This comparison, it should be noted, includes only the increased flows released from the upper basin at Gavins Point Dam and does not include any of the 33 million acre feet of contributions occurring below that point.

Finally, with respect to the argument that Section 6 of the 1944 Flood Control Act requires water service contracts out of the mainstem reservoir to be executed by the Corps of Engineers, it can only be said that those who are making this claim ought to review their legislative history and the very nature of the Pick-Sloan program. Section 6 states:

"That the Secretary of War is authorized to make contracts with States, municipalities, private concerns, or individuals at such prices and on such terms as he may deem reasonable for domestic and industrial uses for surplus water that may be available at any reservior under the control of the War Department: Provided, That no contracts for such water shall adversely affect than existing lawful uses for such water."

A reading of this Section begs two questions: What is surplus water? And is the authority granted the Army Corps of Engineers under Section 6 exclusive? With respect to the first question the Army Corps of Engineers have a regulation which states "The term surplus water means water trapped or stored in a reservoir project which is not utilized to fulfill an authorized project purpose." ER 1105-2-20 (28 Jan. 1982). If that is the Army's definition of surplus water, it is clear from the legislative history that the water to be used by ETSI is not surplus to any project purposes.

The Oahe Reservoir, which is the source of water for the ETSI project was originally authorized by the Flood Control Act of 1944. Section 9(a) of that Act authorized the construction of the Oahe Reservoir as described in Senate document No. 191, 78th Congress, 2nd Session (April 1944). At pages 115-116 of that document, the Oahe Reservoir is described as containing storage to irrigate an area of 750,000 acres along the James River in South Dakota. Page 117 of the document lists additional smaller pumping units which could also be served out of the Oahe Reservoir and other reservoirs in South Dakota. The dam, therefore, was authorized and constructed with an irrigation function for service to at least 750,000 acres of irrigation. At the present time, diversions to serve only approximately 190,000 acres of the full potential capacity have been subsequently authorized by Congress. This leaves a surplus reclamation capacity in the Oahe Reservoir capable of serving somewhere in the neighborhood of 560,000 acres. It is unlikely that this reclamation capacity nearly all of which is still carried as a function of the Pick-Sloan project will be used for irrigation until further specific diversions are funded by Congress. Under Section 9(c) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939, the Secretary of Interior is authorized to make interim use of reclamation projects if he determines that such use will not interfere with the irrigation function of the project. It is clear in this case that where in excess of 500,000 acres of irrigation capacity awaits further Congressional action in order to be utilized, the amount allocated to ETSI will not present any interference with irrigation development in South Dakota over the next 40 to 50 years.

The bottom line is that ETSI's water is not surplus to the reclamation function of the Pick-Sloan Plan but is being utilized as an intergral part of that function. In fact Section 9(c) of the 1944 Flood Control Act specifically requires the Secretary of the interior to operate the reclamation portions of the Pick-Sloan development under Federal Reclamation Law, and the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 is a portion of the general body of Federal Reclamation Law.

In answering the first question in this matter it is easy to see that the second question is also answered. The Army Engineers' authority to contract surplus water is inapplicable in this case and, therefore, is not exclusive in its application.

Conclusion

In this paper I have presented a basic outline of the nature, history, and extent of South Dakota's Involvement with ETSI Pipeline Project and its proposal to develop a coal slurry line from Wyoming to Arkansas and Louisiana. It is South Dakota's position that the actions taken were not only reasonable under the circumstances but were also perfectly legal and within the envisioned purposes of the Pick-Sloan program when it was originally authorized in 1944.

I do not rest, however, on our own analysis of the reasonableness of South Dakota's actions. The downstream states have received practically all of the benefits that they bargained for in the passage of the 1944 Flood Control Act. South Dakota and her upstream sisters on the other hand, have received practically none of those benefits. An Iowa economist funded by the Iowa General Assembly to analyze the impact on Iowa of Missouri River diversions, essentially concluded the same thing. It is apparent from his remarks included in the last two charts of this presentation that when South Dakota's action is subjected to rigorous analysis even her opponents must agree with what South Dakota did in establishing her relationship with ETSI. The Iowa report written by David Osterberg concludes with a final word on ETSI.

"A FINAL WORD ON ETSI

"The ETSI slurry pipeline, the subject of many recent newspaper articles, has come as a warning shot to Iowa. Coming in a low water year when navigation has been reduced, talk of decreasing the flow made citizens and policy-makers aware of all plans to make the Missouri into a smaller river.

"Governor Janklow of South Dakota has claimed that the new pipeline will remove water equal to one-tenth the annual evaporation on Lake Oahe and that downstream users should "quit being selfish" about the Missouri (UMC 1981, p. 8,9). There is merit on both counts: (1) if 50,000 fewer acres flowed past Sioux City in a year, river gauges would have trouble measuring the loss; (2) South Dakota has a claim on water from the River. Iowa has gained the benefits of flood control, farmland creation, navigation and cheap hydropower. Iowa has also suffered the destruction of thousands of acres of wildlife habitat and recreation areas and has a continuing serious problem with degradation. However, Iowa has received the benefits promised. South Dakota has not.

"South Dakota receives power from the Missouri River dams and enjoys four "Great Lakes" which are reputed to have the best walleye fishing south of Canada. However, South Dakota has not received the irrigated acres it was promised to make up for the 500,000 now under the four Corp-built lakes.

"All Basin states would like to see the Missouri used within the Basin. This remains true even after the ETSI deal. South Dakota agreed to the ETSI pipeline first because it prevented ETSI from taking groundwater from the Madison formation and drawing down the potable water sources of South Dakota towns bordering the ETSI pump field in Wyoming. Second, the pipeline will carry water to western South Dakota towns along its path. South Dakota is protecting its water resources."●

THE KGB FORCES A HALT TO THE WORK OF THE MOSCOW HELSINKI GROUP

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, 2 days ago, the world learned that the repressive tactics of the Soviet Government have brought another casualty to the international human rights movement: Elena Bonner, wife of banished Andrei Sakharov, announced that the Moscow Helsinki Group was halting its operations due to "cruel persecution" by the Soviets. Since this remarkable citizens' group began its work in May 1976—despite arrests and other harassment—it has produced over 200 reports based on information from Soviet citizens in various parts of the U.S.S.R., which document the Soviet human rights situation. Therefore, although the Moscow Helsinki Group has been forced to end its work, it has left a rich legacy of information which has broadened Western understanding of the Soviet Union.

Apparently, it was the threat of criminal prosecution of 75-year-old retired lawyer, Sofya Kalistratova, which was the immediate cause for the demise of the Moscow Helsinki Group. Kalistratova, a distinguished defense lawyer, who during her career defended such leading human rights activists as Gen. Pyotr Griogorenko and Vladimir Bukovsky, suffers from a weak heart and could not survive a term of imprisonment. The Moscow Helsinki Group has suffered 10 arrests and 4 forced emigrations; only 3 elderly members of the Group remained at liberty; Elena Bonner, Naum Meiman—who has been trying in vain to emigrate to Israel for many years—and Sofya Kalistratova.

I would like to take this occasion to call my colleagues' attention to the fate of one of the imprisoned members of the Moscow Helsinki Group, Anatoly Marchenko. Marchenko, a worker and self-educated writer, has long been active in an important cause: the need to improve working people's rights in the Soviet Union. Too long has their voice been silent. It was partially due to the writings and activities of Anatoly Marchenko that their problems have begun to be heard.

Born the son of illiterate parents in 1938, Anatoly Marchenko served his first prison sentence from 1960 to 1966 for trying to flee across the Soviet border into Iran. After his release, he wrote "My Testimony," the first documentation of political camps and prisons in post-Stalinist times, which was translated into 18 languages. In 1968, he was sentenced to 2 years in camp for alleged passport violations and "anti-Soviet slander" after he wrote letters defending the Czechoslovak liberalization campaign in 1968.

On March 31, 1975, Marchenko was sentenced to 4 years of internal exile for alleged violation of the rules of administrative surveillance imposed following his release from prison. A member of the Moscow Group from its inception, Marchenko followed its activities from his place of exile in Irkutsk oblast—and, despite a local procurator's attempts to concoct a criminal case against him to prevent his return to the Moscow area—Marchenko was released from internal exile in September 1978. Marchenko's 11 years in camps, prisons, and exile have left him in very poor health. He is partially deaf, lame, and has had two operations for a chronic bleeding stomach ulcer. In 1980, Marchenko published "From Tarusa to Chuna," a description of his period of internal exile.

During Marchenko's Siberian exile, AFL-CIO leader George Meany invited him in December 1977 to attend an AFL-CIO convention in Los Angeles. In response, Marchenko sent the AFL-CIO an open letter, "On the Life of Soviet Workers." Excerpts follow:

The principle of paying wages for work has been distorted into paying rewards for service to the state according to governmental rank. This principle is taken to ridiculous extremes, since there are permanent shortages of basic goods and services . . . This principle of hierarchical distribution of goods extends to everything: from whether or not a worker "deserves" a sheet for his dormitory bed, to whether or not a cottage is supplied with toilet paper . . .

Such conditions for the workers of our huge country are possible only because Soviet citizens are without any rights. In the USSR, government, labor unions and police are all links in the chain which fetters our people. All organizations, including the church, are subordinate to, and controlled by, a small ruling group. Let sixty years of Soviet experience serve as a warning to other nations.

Arrested again on March 17, 1981, Anatoly Marchenko was sentenced on September 4, 1981, to 10 years of special regimen camp plus 5 years of internal exile for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda." Since then—in flagrant violation of Soviet law—his wife, Larisa Bogoraz, has been forbidden to visit or receive any news from her husband. Even the Soviets should recognize that Marchenko's family has the right to be in contact with him. Instead, the Soviet authorities have decided to try to isolate Anatoly Marchenko from the outside world, trying in vain to make him become merely a cipher among the estimated 5 million Soviet citizens engaged in forces labor.

At a time of increased international concern about the issue of forced labor in the Soviet Union—and the question of how forced labor is being used to build the gas pipeline to Europe—I think the Soviets are showing how much they fear the voices of people such as Anatoly Marchenko and the other members of the Moscow Helsinki Group and their counterparts throughout the Soviet Union, including Helsinki monitors in Ukraine, Lithuania, Armenia, and Georgia. We in the West, particularly as members of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe will continue to speak out for these voices of justice in the Soviet Union.

At this time, Mr. President, I think we should all pause and give thought to the freedoms we enjoy and observe the heroic efforts of the freedom-striving Helsinki group members of the Soviet Union. In addition to those mentioned, let me now list those who have suffered a worse fate.

IT DIDN'T READ OR SOUND LIKE WHAT I SAW AND HEARD

● Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, Melvin Stukenberg, executive vice president of the Iowa-Nebraska Farm Equipment Association, recently wrote a very perceptive column in the August issue of the Retailer.

Mr. Stukenberg, who is editor of the magazine, addressed the reporting on President Reagan's recent visit to Iowa to talk to the National Corn Growers Association. The headline over his column sums it up pretty well: "It Didn't Read or Sound Like What I Saw and Heard."

I ask that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial referred to follows:

IT DIDN'T READ OR SOUND LIKE WHAT I SAW AND HEARD

The National Corn Growers Association was very kind and sent to me an invitation to visit their recent annual convention. Since the featured speaker on the first day of their meeting was the President of the United States, I took advantage of their hospitality and attended the afternoon session.

The corn growers from across the United States as well as guests such as myself filled nearly every seat in the Veterans Auditorium, and we were not disappointed as the President had a very fine message for the entire agricultural sector of our economy. He received frequent and vigorous rounds of applause throughout his message from this group of farmers who is having some very tough times due to the economy of the entire country.

The President did not offer any easy solutions to the present plight of the nation's agriculture, but he did dwell on the export situation and the importance of it in getting prices back to a profitable level. He called attention to the continual decrease in the rate of inflation, and the fact that interest rates are declining and are already far below the 20% rate that we knew several months ago.

That evening when I returned home and read the paper and listened to the report of the President's speech on the six o'clock news, I was beginning to wonder if the reporters attended the same meeting that I had. They were reporting that the farmers gave the President a luke warm reception, while my observation was that the reception was so loud and long that it was hard for him to start his presentation. The reporters said that the farmers were certainly disappointed that the President did not offer some new and fantastic program to solve all problems overnight. My observation was that nearly every statement he made was applauded with vigor.

The reporters interviewed several farmers, and after they were unable to find a negative remark there, they went outside to interview the protesters who were there. The protesters were less than fifty in number but the amount of news coverage they received made it appear that they nearly outnumbered the fourteen or fifteen thousand people who were very supportive of the President.

This incident reminded me of the many times that I have listened to the President or some other leader, and then listened to the commentators afterward tell me what they think I should have heard. I feel that I have a fair knowledge of the English language, and I can usually understand what I have heard. I am getting more than a little tired of people trying to manage the news, and trying to get us to believe as they do.●

REALISM ON CUBA

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, for more than two decades our relations with Cuba—a nation only 90 miles from our shores—have resembled relations with some distant and unknown land. They have been filled with mutual ignorance, hostility and distrust.

Yet Cuba is a "known quantity. It is a country we have had to deal with over the past 20 years, if only because of a wide range of serious differences and problems between us. For 5 years American diplomats have been stationed in Havana and Cuban diplomats have been stationed in Washington, despite the freeze in our diplomatic relations.

Obviously, very important and extraordinarily difficult issues continue to divide our two governments—and the road to normalization under the best of circumstances will be difficult. What is puzzling, however, is the Reagan administration's policy, which is making those circumstances even more difficult. This administration has turned its back on up to 2,000 political prisoners the United States had previously promised to process for entry; it has violated requirements of U.S. law for the reunification of divided families; it has underminded diplomatic openings which could have led to the return to Cuba of the criminals and other excludable persons who came illegally to Florida during the Mariel boat crisis. Cuba was willing to talk last year, but we were not.

Authoritative documentation of these facts is contained in a series of thoughtful and compelling articles by Mr. Wayne Smith, who served as Chief of the U.S. Interests Section in Havana from 1979 until his retirement last month. As the New York Times pointed out in an editorial on September 8, the key policy question raised by Mr. Smith is why the United States should not apply to Cuba the same cautions but realistic approach called for in dealing with the Soviet Union or any other adversary. The Reagan administration has failed to demonstrate why it is in our national interest to reject diplomatic means to resolve at least some of the issues between the United States and Cuba—even while it pursues a diplomatic dialog with the Soviet Union and other states that pose serious threats to our interests.

I would like to share with my colleagues some of the recent writings of Mr. Smith, one of our foremost authorities on United States-Cuban relations—as well as the New York Times editorial praising his work. I ask that they be printed at this point in the RECORD.

THINKING THE UNTHINKABLE ON CUBA

It is Wayne Smith's angle of vision that makes so devastating his understated critique of American policy toward Cuba. It is not every day that a career diplomat risks criticism by spilling the beans, including in this case some black Cuban ones suggesting that the Reagan Administration ignored openings for serious negotiations.

Mr. Smith was director of the State Department's Office of Cuban Affairs from 1977 to 1979 and chief of the U.S. interests section in Havana from 1979 until his resignation last month. He can't be convincingly shushed with the usual if-you-knew-what-we-know litany.

From his perspective, the supposedly rock-hard evidence of massive Cuban arms shipments to El Salvador isn't very solid. "If the guerrillas had received all the arms reported by U.S. intelligence, the Salvadoran Army would be outgunned 20 to 1," he observes in a Foreign Policy article. It will take a lot of white papers to plug the holes that sentence punches in the official rationale for dramatic increases in U.S. arms aid to El Salvador.

But Mr. Smith finds nothing uniquely foolish in the Reagan Administration's Cuba policy. Instead he finds it hackneyed in its stridency, its knee-jerk deference to domestic politics and its resistance to genuine negotiations. Successive Presidents have been unwilling to concede that the Castro regime can't be gotten rid of, short of war. "No incantations will make it disappear," Mr. Smith writes. "To reduce it by fire and sword would cost far more in blood, treasure, and world opprobrium than the problem warrants."

Yet successive Presidents continue to believe that somehow a great power should be able to deal expeditiously with a tiny island ruled by a Marxist zealot. They have resorted to embargoes and bluster, or worse. The best that can be said for the latest sterile gimmick—the proposed Radio Marti—is that it's better than another Bay of Pigs.

Mr. Smith argues that Washington should apply to Cuba the same cautious but realistic approach it applies to the Soviet Union. He maintains with some authority that the much-publicized Reagan Administration soundings in Havana weren't serious, and that three chances for real negotiations, beginning in early 1981, were passed up.

Only rarely do career diplomats go public with this kind of argument, and Wayne Smith won't be thanked by Mr. Reagan for speaking plainly. But the rest of us are in his debt; he has opened a revealing window in Foggy Bottom's stuffiest room.

IT IS NOT IMPOSSIBLE TO DEAL WITH CASTRO—REALISM IS REQUIRED

(By Wayne S. Smith)

WASHINGTON.—Cuba continues to have much the same effect on United States Administrations that the full moon reputedly had on werewolves. Perhaps there is no sprouting of hair, but a certain frothing at the mouth and loss of rationality are notable. Indeed, Cuba is such an emotional issue that clear and objective analysis is extremely rare. The Reagan Administration follows the pattern.

Certainly there is nothing new in its approach to Cuba. On the contrary, it seems determined to make past mistakes all over again, and again and again. It came to office striking fierce postures and warning that no option was excluded, not even blockade or invasion. In expecting Fidel Castro to be cowed, the Administration displayed an abysmal insensitivity to history.

For 20 years, Mr. Castro has successfully defied United States-sponsored invasion, assassination attempts, clandestine Central Intelligence Agency radio stations and efforts at destabilization. The Administration's posturing simply implies more of the same. There is no reason to believe such tactics will work any better now than in the past.

To be sure, as the Administration came to office, it faced serious problems in Central America that involved the Cubans. Firm but careful admonitions aimed at pointing the Cubans, the Sandinistas and others in the direction of real negotiations and peaceful solutions would have made good sense. Demonstrably, however, that was not the Administration's purpose. Having blown the situation out of all proportion by describing it as a major East-West test of wills, it was determined to demonstrate in no uncertain terms that it could "stop Communism in its tracks." It wanted confrontation, not negotiations.

In early 1981, the Administration acknowledged that Nicaraguan support for the guerrillas in El Salvador had been drastically reduced. Clearly, Nicaraguans' accommodation of the United States' concerns meant that they valued a continuing relationship with us, thus giving us useful negotiating leverage. Rather than using such leverage to good advantage, we threw it away. The Sandinistas had acceded to our demands, at least in part, but we cut off economic assistance anyway. We abandoned diplomacy in favor of confrontation and clandestine destabilization programs. The democratic opposition in Nicaragua—the very people we should have wished to help—told us this would simply make matters worse. It did.

We also rebuffed Cuban overtures. The Administration was not even willing to sit down to discuss an issue of such keen interest to us as the return of criminals and others ineligible for entry dumped on us during the Mariel sea-lift. The Cubans suggested discussions. We turned them down.

Our only tentative nod in the direction of dialogue came with Alexander M. Haig, Jr.'s meeting with Carlos Raphael Rodriguez, Vice President of Cuba, in Mexico last December, and Mr. Castro's meeting with Gen. Vernon Walters in Havana last March. But these were only preliminary contacts made for the purpose of reiterating Washington's position—and, apparently, of turning aside pressures for serious negotiations. Neither meeting changed the equation in the slightest. By late spring, it was clear that there was to be no follow-up. The Administration was intent upon increasing pressures against, not negotiating with, the Castro regime.

Having thus turned our back on diplomacy, and with very little in the way of leverage to exert against Havana—little, that is, that we have not already tried—we are left in the same blind alley we have been in for the past 20 years.

If future United States policies are to have more success than those of the past, we must overcome emotionalism. Our policy must be geared to clear, realistic objectives and must result from careful thought, not kneejerk reactions. For example, a principal objective should be to reduce Soviet influence in Cuba. Yet, confrontation works directly against that goal. Mr. Castro cannot loosen his relationship with Moscow so long as he is threatened by Washington.

Our best hope of moderating Cuban foreign policy is in demonstrating over a period of time that compromise is in Havana's interest. In the final analysis, serious negotiations and a process of gradual engagement are the only sensible options open to both countries. Neither the historical record nor an objective analysis of the existing situation suggests that this is impractical. Indeed, gradual engagement is the one approach that has never been given a fair chance.

We cannot, however, expect miracles. No quick fix is possible. Mr. Castro is a convinced revolutionary and many of his objectives are antithetical to our own. Relations are likely to remain adversarial for a long time to come. But the areas of conflict could be reduced and a more satisfactory relationship gradually worked out. It is not impossible to deal with Mr. Castro. Sooner or later, Washington must do so, not because we like him but in order to advance our goals and interests.

The United States should apply to Cuba the same cautious yet realistic approach used toward the Soviet Union and other adversaries. As Secretary of State, Mr. Haig observed recently that while Americans could not expect any rapid reconciliation of United States and Soviet interests, the United States had to work toward that objective. Why not adopt the same attitude toward Cuba? The process would be slow and full reconciliation probably beyond grasp. But if we were at least moving in the right direction, that would be a vast improvement over the pass.

TURNING A DEAF EAR TO THE CUBANS

(By Wayne S. Smith)

Shortly after the inauguration, the Reagan Administration indicated it would place less emphasis on human rights. In the case of Cuba, it has more than kept its word; it has given them no attention at all.

The Carter Administration had its weaknesses. Its objectives were often confused and its efforts at implementation incoherent. This was certainly true of its approach to the Cuban problem. Still, despite its faults, it scored undeniable gains in the field of human rights. It brought about the release of all American and of thousands of Cuban prisoners. Families were reunited through the issuance of preference immigrant visas. Husbands and wives, parents and children, who had not seen one another in years, were brought together.

By contrast, the Reagan Administration's record is zero. It has done nothing. Not a single political prisoner has been released as the result of anything the administration has said or done. On the contrary, it has callously, and in my view shamefully, turned its back on the some 1,500–2,000 ex-political prisoners the United States had previously committed itself to process for entry.

Many of these ex-prisoners were in front of the Interests Section in Havana on May 2, 1980, having come back to ask how much longer it might be before we could begin processing them. I went outside that morning to inform them that we had just received the necessary information and would begin processing that very same day. A few minutes later, they were attacked by a pro-Castro crowd. In the ensuing melee, some 400 people sought refuge inside our building. There they remained until September. With the Interests Section thus virtually closed, the processing of ex-political prisoners had to be postponed, but we had fully expected that once our 400 houseguests were gone (virtually all found their way safely to the United States) and we could reopen our doors, our first priority would be these ex-prisoners. We reckoned without the Reagan Administration. It refused to honor the May 2 commitment. The ex-prisoners have been left in limbo. As one of them said in a letter to me last year, "The U.S. has not only abandoned us, it has dishonored its word." He was right.

Grudgingly, the administration recently agreed to accept a handful of released Cuban political prisoners who had managed to get to Costa Rica. Fine. But what about all those still suffering in Cuba?

And what about the divided families? These are people who are eligible for preference immigrant visas. Their documents are in order and the Interests Section could have begun processing them over a year ago. But, as in the case of the political prisoners, the Reagan Administration has said no. There is no jurisdictional basis for this refusal. It is likely to stand up only until some of the families take it to court. The State Department has not even been able to explain the rationale on which the refusal is based—either to the Interests Section or to key senators whose right to know is unchallenged. For example, in a letter last January, Senator Edward Kennedy (D. Mass.), pointed out that the State Department had no authority under law to halt the processing of preference visas in Havana; he therefore demanded an explanation. To date, he has received no reply.

On an off-the-record basis, various officials have suggested that the refusal to authorize preference visas is based on 1) a reduction in the Interests Section staff, and/or 2) the need to hold such visas as a bargaining chip until the Cubans agree to take back the some 2,000 excludables dumped on us during Mariel. Both assertions are specious. The interests Section staff was reduced by one consular officer subsequent to and as a result of the decision against authorization, not the other way around. Further, while the Castro regime has offered several times since January 1981 to discuss the return of the excludables, the Reagan Administration has refused. It hardly makes sense to preserve a bargaining chip for negotiations in which one refuses to participate.

The Reagan Administration's Cuba policy, looked at in its broadest terms, is a failure. It has neither intimidated Castro nor otherwise moderated his behavior. If anything it has made matters word. That much might have been predicted. That the administration has turned its back on Cuban citizens it had an opportunity to help, however, is more difficult to understand. The numbers involved are limited and these are people to whom we have a clear obligation. The administration's refusal to honor that obligation opens it to charges of talking out of both sides of its mouth, or worse.

DATELINE HAVANA: MYOPIC DIPLOMACY

(By Wayne S. Smith)*

There are encouraging signs that Ronald Reagan's administration may follow a more sensible policy toward the Soviet Union than indicated by his campaign rhetoric. Unfortunately no such realism is evident with respect to Cuba; rather the administration seems determined to make past mistakes all over again. Its approach to the Cuban problem is as hackneyed as it has been unsuccessful and evokes a painful sense of déjà vu.

No American administration has devised an effective policy toward Fidel Castro's Cuba. Initial U.S. attitudes, formed in the atmosphere of intense hostility of the early 1960s, have changed little. When it comes to Cuba, the United States seems locked in a time warp. As a result U.S. policies have frequently worked against what their objectives should have been. Reduction of Soviet influence, for example, must be a principal goal; yet U.S. policies have had exactly the opposite effect.

At least in part, this intellectual sclerosis results from three idiosyncrasies that distort U.S. perceptions of the Cuban problem. First, many Americans believe in a quick fix where in fact none exists. This belief may be a holdover from the 1960–1961 period when Americans considered the Castro regime an aberration to be quickly disposed of, much as they had disposed of the regime of left-leaning President Jacobo Arbenz in Guatemala. In part, too, it may reflect a residual disdain for so-called banana republics and a concomitant belief that the United States, as a great power, should be able to resolve quickly any problem posed by little countries to the south. Each administration has persisted in the search for a panacea overlooked by its predecessors. The search is based on a delusion. The Castro regime is there to stay. No incantations will make it disappear. To reduce it by fire and sword would cost far more in blood, treasure, and world opprobrium than the problem warrants.

Second, successive administrations have taken a procrustean approach to the problem of defining Cuban intentions and policies. Cuba is frequently viewed through the lens of Washington's own policy miscalculations and domestic political needs.

*Wayne S. Smith, senior associate of the Carnegie Endowment, served in Cuba, 1958–1961, was director of the State Department's Office of Cuban Affairs, 1977–1979, and chief of the U.S. interests section in Havana, 1979–1982.

Former President Carter's handling of the discovery in August 1979 of the Soviet brigade in Cuba exemplifies the process of self-victimization through false images that often results. The brigade had been in Cuba for a long time and posed no real threat to the United States. But for domestic political reasons administration officials portrayed it as new evidence of Soviet-Cuban aggressiveness so threatening that a U.S. failure to react would be extremely dangerous. Moscow and Havana were testing the United States, the argument ran; accordingly, the administration demanded the brigade's withdrawal. The Soviets and Cubans, of course, had no intention of removing it at Washington's command.

Virtually out of thin air the Carter administration had spun a public relations problem with which it then had to live. The status quo later became acceptable after all, but not before the administration had done tremendous harm to its own credibility and to important American priorities. The SALT II treaty was shelved and détente dealt a mortal blow. The Soviets and Cubans were not, in fact, testing the United States at all. The administration simply chose to portray the situation in those terms and was then hoist with its own petard.

Third, Cuba arouses peculiarly strong emotions in the United States. In part, these emotions are due to Cuba's geographic proximity. Certainly they are also fueled by the personality of Castro. Many Americans grind their teeth in rage at the sight of him on their TV screens. Congressmen who can discuss in rational terms future diplomatic relations with Albania or Vietnam angrily exclude that possibility for Cuba. By contrast, a small but equally committed minority idolize Castro as the antiestablishment figure par excellence. Dispassionate analysis between these extremes is extraordinarily rare.

If future U.S. policies toward Cuba are to be more successful than those of the past, they must flow from long-range strategies geared to clear, realistic objectives; they must result from careful thought, not knee-jerk reactions; and they must deal with concrete issues. So far, the Reagan administration has shown no inclination toward such clarity of purpose.

REAGAN'S RIGID POSTURE

In his resignation statement on June 25, 1982, former Secretary of State Alexander Haig, Jr. complained that the administration had moved away from the "careful course" laid out earlier. No such course was ever apparent with respect to Cuba. On the basis of its own statements, the Reagan team remains confused as to whether it even has a Cuba policy. For almost a year after taking office, Haig sidestepped questions about the new U.S. posture toward Cuba. A full policy review was in process, he explained, and he did not wish to make any statements that might prejudice its conclusions. On January 27, 1982, a State Department spokesman admitted he had no idea when the study might be completed. More recently references to it have virtually disappeared.

Nor have the goals and assessments been clear. The administration began by excluding normalization of relations even as a distant objective. But in May 1982 Haig reversed course, saying that the United States would welcome normalization if the Cubans would cease intervening in other countries. President Reagan, however, speaking on April 30, took still another position: The United States would normalize relations only if Cuba severed its ties with the Soviet Union. Two weeks later the State Department's director of Cuban affairs stated that Cuba would never loosen the relationship it has with the Soviet Union.

Despite this public confusion over policy and objectives, the administration's posture toward Cuba is evident. Stated succinctly, its initial position was that the United States would not even talk to the Cubans until they ceased all interventionist activities in Latin America and withdrew their troops from Africa. If they refused to do so, Washington would exclude no option, including a U.S. blockade or invasion of Cuba. Meanwhile, the administration adopted measures to signal its displeasure and to underline that there could be no business as usual. Thus it refused visas to Cuban officials, did not invite the head of the Cuban interests section in Washington to diplomatic functions in violation of a specific bilateral agreement, and tried to stop a congressional delegation from attending a meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Union in Havana. The administration refused to talk to Cuban officials even about a matter as intensely interesting to the United States as the return of criminals and other excludable persons dumped on U.S. shores during the 1980 Mariel sea-lift. Havana offered several times to discuss the matter. Washington would not even respond, although Haig sought to give the impression that Cuba was refusing to negotiate.

The prospects for success of an approach that precludes all compromise are ordinarily questionable. But at least initially, a strong argument could be made that the new administration's tough stance made some sense. Washington faced an urgent problem in Central America. As the Reagan administration came to office, the guerrillas had launched an all-out offensive against the ruling junta in El Salvador. This offensive was unsuccessful, but it was not immediately clear whether Cuba and Nicaragua, which had supported the insurgents, would press for a new offensive or diminish their efforts. Menacing statements from the new U.S. administration were therefore cogent and sensible. But Washington's purpose should have been to convince Havana and Managua that their continued efforts carried high risks, and that it made more sense to trim their objectives and negotiate.

In fact, both Cuba and Nicaragua were already moving in that direction. At first, convinced of the guerrillas' broad popular support in El Salvador and of the need to present the new Reagan administration with a fiat accompli, the Cubans had stepped up their assistance in November 1980, anticipating the January 1981 offensive. When the offensive failed, however, the Cubans and Nicaraguans re-evaluated their positions. Very shortly after Reagan's inauguration, arms shipments declined. Moreover, the Cubans signalled a desire for improved relations and a disposition to exchange views on the situation in El Salvador. While restraint there would have to be mutual, they said, they favored a political settlement.

The U.S. interests section in Havana reported these démarches to Washington, and I urged in several cables that we respond to Cuban overtures, if only to emphasize the strength of U.S. feelings. The Department of State never responded in any way.

The Nicaraguans, dishearted by the guerrillas' failure and concerned about losing U.S. economic assistance, also drastically reduced support to the guerrillas and signalled a desire for improved relations with the United States. But diplomatic initiatives were not in the new administration's game plan. It had come to office vowing to get tough; and the risks to the United States of a policy of confrontation seemed minimal to officials in the new administration. The junta in El Salvador had just defeated the guerrillas without U.S. military assistance. Those new to power in Washington expected that with U.S. aid the Salvadoran government could score a complete victory relatively quickly. Some also expected that threats alone would intimidate Castro and the Nicaraguans. Against this background, the United States opted for military victory in El Salvador and ignored the Cuban and Nicaraguan overtures. Washington acknowledged that arms shipments from Nicaragua had declined but cut off economic assistance anyway.

Shortly after the inauguration Haig defined the violence in Central America as a case of external aggression: U.S. actions in El Salvador were aimed at drawing a line against Soviet-Cuban expansionism. A Department of State white paper released in February 1981 claimed to demonstrate that "the insurgency in El Salvador [had] been progressively transformed into a textbook case of indirect armed aggression by Communist powers through Cuba."

The white paper, however, became a source of acute embarrassment to the administration, primarily revealing shoddy research and fierce determination to advocate the new policy, whether or not the evidence sustained it. Some of the supporting documents turned out to be forgeries. Others were of such vague origin as to be worthless. None of the documents linked the USSR to the supply of guerrilla forces in El Salvador or demonstrated that the violence there was a case of external aggression rather than an internal conflict.

Although concern over Cuban involvement in any turmoil so near the southern border of the United States is justified, U.S. policy would have been more effective had it addressed the turmoil in in its proper context. Treating the situation as a major East-West test of wills, however gratifying to the administration's confrontational instincts, did not and still does not contribute to a sensible solution.

ATTEMPTS AT INTIMIDATION

A promising opportunity to negotiate from a position of strength in the late winter and early spring of 1981 was lost. Had the clear-cut political and military victory Washington sought really been as firmly within its grasp as it seemed to believe, the administration would have deserved support. Warnings at the time suggested and subsequent events have demonstrated, however, that no such victory was in sight. Now, over a year later, the United States is caught in an open-ended spiral of escalating tensions and continuing violence.

Neither the record nor prudent diplomacy suggests that Reagan should have taken Castro's word at face value. Washington has as much reason to distrust Havana as the latter does Washington. But Castro did indicate a willingness to seek accommodation, and the United States had little to lose by seriously exploring the possibilities with him.

The late spring of 1981 brought another opportunity to negotiate. The Nicaraguans, the Hondurans, and the Costa Ricans met to discuss reduction of tensions and border guarantees. The Cubans, also concerned over rising regional tensions, stated they would favor mutual security guarantees and would be willing to play a positive role in bringing them about. The U.S. embassy in Managua and I strongly recommended to the State Department that the United States pursue this opening. I also urged engaging Mexico in the process. During a visit to Washington a short time later, I was told there was no interest in such a negotiating process.

Having rejected the thesis that it might get further by talking to Castro, the United States continued to escalate pressure against Cuba and to create uncertainty in Havana about American intentions. The pressures consisted principally of tightening the embargo against Cuba and establishing Radio Mart, but the administration recognized these as long-term measures. It expected immediate impact from the increased uncertainty fostered by U.S. policy. The administration continued to believe that it could intimidate Castro. Accordingly the United States stimulated speculation that it might take military measures. It also allowed Cuban exiles in Florida to resume paramilitary training. Whether the training had the support of the CIA is not clear. It was certainly at odds with the administration's emphasis on controlling terrorism and may have been illegal. Nevertheless, the administration condoned this training, seeing it as a useful adjunct to the war of nerves against Castro.

Why Washington expected Cuba to crumble under tough talk is difficult to understand. A senior policy maker explained in July 1981 that the new administration was convinced its predecessors had not fully explored the possibilities of exerting pressure on Castro. It was determined that all options should be tried. My reply to this, in a letter dated that same month, was that Castro had seen it all before. Neither harsh words nor harsh measures has ever succeeded. Hence unless the United States was prepared to carry its threats to their logical dénouement, it had best not issue them at all. Bluffs would not work, for Castro was certain to call them.

That is precisely what happened. Between January and November 1981, Washington strongly threatened military measures; the Cubans said they were willing to open discussions but would never knuckle under to intimidation. To emphasize the point, Castro organized a People's Militia, which he claimed would put 500,000 Cubans under arms. He tightened military ties with Moscow—the last thing the United States should have wished to bring about—and brought in large quantities of arms. On July 30 Haig cited these shipments as new proof of Cuban aggressiveness and claimed Washington had solid evidence that some of these weapons were being transshipped to Central America. The administration never produced any such solid evidence. As for the size of the shipments, surely the United States could not expect the Cubans to disarm in the face of U.S. threats.

In late October the situation took on a new dimension. Several developments occurred that the Cubans believed were related. First, on October 19 syndicated columnists Rowland Evans and Robert Novak claimed without supportable evidence that a 500-600 man Cuban special force was infiltrating El Salvador from Nicaragua. The column alone would not have concerned Havana, but a senior State Department official raised the matter with the Soviets as something Washington took most seriously, implying that it might feel forced to respond. Second, U.S. naval maneuvers were to be held near Cuban waters. Third, and most important, on October 29 Haig said the review of U.S. policy options regarding Cuban was almost ready to be sent to the president. Claiming the review contained evidence of Cuban intervention in Central America, he said the United States planned to take action.

The Cubans took Haig at his word, concluding an invastion was imminent. Castro mobilized Cubans to defend their island to the last man and defied the United States to do its worst. Policy makers in Washington were surprised. Although they themselves had rattled the sabers, they did not understand why the Cubans were mobilizing. Still at first they did not consider the development a bad sign. One U.S. official said: "The Cubans are genuinely nervous—and that's not all bad."

As tensions increased, however, Washington quickly sheathed its own sword. During his November 10 news conference, Reagan responded to a question concerning U.S. intentions toward Cuba by saying, "We have no plans for putting Americans in combat any place in the world." As the full implications of Castro's mobilization sank in, reaction in Washington became more somber. Clearly if Castro was willing to defy what he had seen as an immiment invasion, then the U.S. campaign of escalating threats was doomed to failure. Castro had carried the game to its last move and refused to back down. He had called Washington's bluff. On November 15 Castro claimed the Yankees had again retreated in the face of Cuba's determined resistance. Cuba began to demobilize. From that point on, the administration downplayed threats and gave more emphasis to long-term pressures, particularly Radio Marti. Washington increasingly took the position that since Castro refused to accede to its demands, the United States would take measures to raise the cost to him.

Meanwhile, the episode ending with Cuban mobilization began to cause concern among many Americans. Some, including a few congressmen, wondered if the administration had indeed been planning military action. Few Americans really wanted to go that far; nor did they favor military involvement in El Salvador. A congressional resolution on March 2, 1982, calling for negotiations in El Salvador, clearly reflected that outlook.

CONFLICTING SIGNALS

The invasion scare also made the Mexican government nervous. In early November Mexico privately urged the United States to try talking to the Cubans. On February 21 President José López Portillo publicly called for efforts to reduce tensions throughout the area and for direct talks between the United States and Cuba on the one hand and between the United States and Nicaragua on the other.

Apparently to neutralize pressures from these various directions, the administration agreed to a Mexican proposal that Haig speak with cuban Vice President Carlos Rafael Rodriguez. The two met secretly in Mexico City on November 23, 1981. Nothing concrete came of the encounter. They simply restated well-known positions. Still, the meeting was taken as a possible icebreaker. Speculation was further stimulated four months later when Catro's meeting in Havana with U.S. Ambassador at Large Vernon Walters became known.

But not all the signals from Washington were positive. Indeed, most of the rhetoric remained as tough as ever. Shortly after his secret meeting in November with the Cuban vice president, for example, Haig charged again that Cuba threatened world peace and stability. On December 14 Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Enders presented to the Senate Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs a white paper charging that Castro had returned to the export-of-revolution policies of the 1960s. The paper implied that only tough measures would deter Castro's aggression. It did not mention Cuban offers to negotiate or reductions in arms shipments to El Salvador.

The conflicting signals puzzled the Cubans, but they temporarily persuaded themselves that the Haig-Rodriguez and Walters-Castro encounters might presage a more forthcoming American attitude. The Cubans informed the United States in December that they had ceased shipping arms to Nicaragua, perhaps reflecting a softening of their own position in order to improve the atmosphere for negotiations. Since April 1981 the Cubans had denied shipping weapons to El Salvador. My response to them had always been that while that might be true, some of the arms they sent Nicaragua were reaching El Salvador. Their assertion that the Havana-Managua pipeline had also been turned off therefore seemed a major breakthrough. The Cubans indicated no change in their principles and reserved the right to provide anything Nicaragua needed to defend itself. The Nicaraguan armed forces were well stocked, however, and now had supply arrangements with third countries such as France. The Cuban assertion was duly reported to Washington, which ignored it.

The Cubans actively publicized their readiness to negotiate seriously. In early April 1982 a senior Cuban official told a group of U.S. scholars and journalists in Havana that Cuba wished to play a positive role in bringing about a comprehensive settlement in Central America, provided the United States would also show restraint and work toward mutually satisfactory solutions. The offer's package was as noteworthy as its substance. There were no preconditions of any kind; rather the Cubans were ready to sit down at the bargaining table immediately. Also important, they would discuss all issues, multilateral and bilateral.

A few days after this proposal, a cuban official confirmed to me Cuba's seriousness of purpose: "We want a peaceful solution in Central America. We understand your security concerns and are willing to address them. If you are willing to meet us halfway and to deal with us on the basis of mutual respect, there is no reason we cannot at long last begin to put aside this unproductive animosity between us. We are as weary of it as you are."

Again, it was not a matter of accepting anything on faith, but a question of seriously exploring the possibilities at no risk to the United States. But steps taken by the administration in mid-April dealt prospects for negotiations a sharp blow. First, the United States informed the Cubans that the 1977 fishing agreement would be allowed to lapse. The material impact of the measure was slight, since Cuban fishing in U.S. waters was insignificant. The agreement, however, was produced by the first American-Cuban negotiations in 1977 and in a symbolic sense was closely associated with the idea of détente between the two. Its cancellation was therefore taken as a clear signal that the United States had no further interest in better relations.

Second, American citizens would no longer be allowed to make any financial transactions related to tourism in Cuba. Few Americans vacationed in Cuba to begin with, and the Cubans would simply increase the number of exiles permitted to return every month to visit families to make up the loss of hard-currency earnings. Hence the only concrete result of the measure was to infringe upon the rights of U.S. citizens to travel abroad.

From the administration's own narrow interests, there were strong arguments against negotiations with Cuba. Talks with Cuba would further erode the conservative base at home weakened by the opening of arms talks with the Soviets. Moreover, the administration had worked itself into a blind alley in Central America. The electoral solution in El Salvador had solved nothing, as it produced a right-wing government that immediately closed off any possibility of negotiations with the rebels and began actions certain to lose popular support. So long as fighting continued in El Salvador, Washington would be in no position to begin serious talks with Nicaragua or Cuba. Having insisted that the violence in El Salvador resulted from Soviet-Cuban expansionism, the United States could not be perceived as negotiating with what it considered the source while the expansionism continued.

The rationale put forward by the administration to explain its reluctance to negotiate, however, remains quite different from that outlined above. Washington articulated, separately and in tandem, three objections to negotiations, each of which is flawed.

First, it said that Cuban aggressiveness remains unabated and Cuban arms shipments to Central America have not been reduced. But U.S. evidence of arms shipments—especially during the period of Cuban peace overtures—has never been solid. While some arms have been sent from Cuba to El Salvador, the quantities are almost certainly far less than alleged. If the guerrillas had received all the arms reported by U.S. intelligence, the Salvadoran army would be outgunned 20 to 1.

The question in any event was not so much whether some Cuban equipment was still in the pipeline as how the United States could best go about halting the flow and defusing the situation. Discussions might have offered a productive alternative where confrontation failed. With the door closed to negotiations, the situation has continued to deteriorate.

Second, the administration said that it had tried to talk to the Cubans but had found them so uncompromising that further discussions were clearly futile. This claim was deliberately misleading. Neither the Haig-Rodriguez nor the Walters-Castro meetings were serious probes. At the first, Haig simply stated U.S. views and Rodriguez stated Cuba's. At the second, Walters outlined a number of issues of concern and asked whether the Cubans would be disposed to discuss them. They answered affirmatively. They were not, in other words, unresponsive. Yet, the United States spread the word that it had found the Cubans rigid in their positions. However, it also pointed to the meeting as proof of U.S. willingness to talk.

Thus the talks were, from the administration's perspective, simply a way to parry domestic and foreign criticism. The possibility of future encounters cannot be excluded, especially if public pressures mount. But unless there is some basic change in the U.S. attitude and approach, future meetings are likely to be as sterile as earlier ones.

Third, Washington's efforts to question the utility of negotiations from a historical point of view make such a change unlikely. Enders, for example, insisted to a House Subcommittee on March 25, 1982, that while the United States did not reject talks in principle, "the record is daunting." He elaborated:

"In 1977 we started talking seriously to the Cubans, saying we wanted to create conditions in which the legacy of the past—the embargo and the political tension—could be overcome. We suggested a gradual withdrawal of the more than 20,000 Cuban troops from Angola. . . . While we talked, Cuba went into Ethiopia."

This statement reflects a misreading of history for the sake of expediency. True, this administration's two immediate predecessors claimed an unappreciative Cuba ignored conciliatory gestures and stabbed them in the back. But a closer examination of the record does not bear out such partisan charges.

President Ford's administration did make overtures to Cuba in the first part of 1975. And in November, with the arrival of large numbers of Cuban troops in Angola to assist the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA), then Secretary of State Henry Kissinger announced the termination of conciliatory gestures toward Havana. In an outburst on February 28, 1976, Ford described Cuba's decision as a flagrant act of aggression and Castro as an international outlaw.

The fact is, however, that the United States had done more to provoke the fighting in Angola than the Cubans. Washington encouraged Holden Roberto and the National Front for the Liberation of Angola (FNLA) to ignore the agreement to share power with Agostinho Neto's MPLA and Jonas Savimbi's National Union for the Total Independence of Angola signed in Portugal in January 1975. In March 1975 the FNLA and 1,200 regular Zairean troops entered Angola, where CIA advisers and West European mercenaries later joined them in a drive against Luanda. Havana, in response, sent advisers to assist the MPLA.

In August and October South African troops invaded Angola with full U.S. knowledge. No Cuban troops were in Angola prior to this intervention. In November, responding to the MPLA's appeals, Havana began airlifting troops to Angola. The United States immediately protested and called Castro an outlaw.

U.S. officials were myopic to have expected the Soviets and Cubans to permit a cheap U.S. victory in Angola. But that Castro did not turn his back on the MPLA did not signify his lack of interest in improving relations with the United States. Were that true, U.S. encouragement of Zairean and South African incursions would also have meant that U.S. overtures to Castro were cynical in purpose. He may have thought so but, pragmatically, was willing to keep the two issues separate and to pursue rapprochement even though the United States backed forces in Angola opposed to Cuba's friends.

The point is not that the United States should have ignored Cuban troops in Africa but that those troops might never have been deployed to Angola had the United States pursued a more intelligent course to begin with. The Angolan situation does not prove that talking to the Cubans is unproductive. On the contrary, the United States would have fared better had it discussed Angola with the Cubans and other interested parties with a view to upholding the 1975 agreement.

CUBAN CONFUSION

The Carter administration's approach to Cuba ultimately differed little from those of its predecessors. There were some early talks on fishing rights and maritime boundaries. Travel opportunities improved and interests sections in Havana and Washington were opened. The end of rapprochement began, however, not with Ethiopia or Mariel but much earlier. On November 17, 1977, a high ranking U.S. official claimed a new study revealed a recent, dramatic build-up of Cuban forces in Angola. In fact, no such build-up had taken place. True, an ongoing reduction of Cuban troops had stopped and some had returned to Angola in the spring of 1977 because of tensions with Zaire and an abortive coup in May. The United States had known about and understood the reasons for this development and had nevertheless opened its Havana interests section in the fall. The Cubans were therefore baffled by the administration's statement; when no explanation was forthcoming, they concluded the episode served an immediate domestic purpose: The Carter administration was striking a tough posture toward Cuba to facilitate passage of the Panama Canal treaties through the Senate.

The Cubans had dealt with the United States in good faith until that point but from the November 17 statement forward, rapprochement went sour. In January 1978 the Cubans went into Ethiopia in force. The conviction that U.S. professions of concern over Angola were hollow probably encouraged the Cubans to underestimate American reaction to the intervention. But in the final analysis, a more substantive error led to their action in Ethiopia. In July 1977 the United States had agreed to supply Somalia with arms. This decision was sensible, for Somalia was breaking away from its Soviet and Cuban patrons. The administration's mistake was in not making absolutely clear to the Somalis that the arms were for defensive purposes only and that the United States would not help them pursue their claim to the Ogaden region of Ethiopia. The Somalis interpreted the arms agreement as support for their irredentist ambitions and shortly thereafter invaded Ethiopia. As in Angola, the Soviets and Cubans were not disposed to permit the United States a cheap victory. They had already lost Somalia through defection; they were determined not to see their Ethiopian ally fall in the wake of a Somali invasion. Hence they decided to commit Cuban troops and Soviet equipment to Ethiopia's defense. The Somali surge was turned back.

The arrival and continued presence of Cuban troops in Ethiopia are counter to U.S. interests, but to call their deployment aggression is to take the situation out of context. Had the United States taken greater care, the Somali invasion and the subsequent Cuban intervention might never have taken place. American policy makers must consider more carefully the consequences of their moves before they make them.

The Carter administration's whole approach to Cuba was confused. Its experiences hardly provide a good test of what serious dialogue might produce. Even so, the brief relaxation under Carter produced more positive results than have any previous or subsequent policies. Most Cuban political prisoners and all Americans in Cuban jails were released. Cuban exiles were allowed to return to visit their families. Havana offered to cooperate with the United States in efforts to stop the drug traffic. It also expressed a willingness, which the United Stated did not have the wit to exploit, to help defuse certain international crises. The increasingly strained relations bottomed out in the spring of 1980 with the Mariel exodus, which the Carter administration helped bring about through its inertia and then handled ineptly.

Neither the historical record nor an objective analysis of the existing situation suggests that a policy of relaxing tensions with Cuba is impractical. Indeed, it is the one approach that has never been given a fair chance. What the United States has tried and what the Reagan administration is attempting all over again—threats, pressures, and philippics—has not worked. It is time to turn to a policy of gradual engagement. Such a change will not be easy. The administration had an opportunity in 1981 to negotiate from strength and in a more congenial atmosphere. It threw that opportunity away. The U.S. position in Central America has deteriorated, especially in the wake of the Falklands crisis. The Cubans, having been rebuffed, are now in a temper. Nevertheless serious negotiations are the only sensible path open to the two sides. Americans should not expect miracles. Castro is a convinced revolutionary and many of his objectives are antithetical to U.S. goals. U.S.-Cuban relations are most likely to remain unfriendly for a long time to come. But the areas of conflict could be reduced and a more satisfactory relationship gradually worked out. It is not impossible to deal with Castro. Indeed, sooner or later Washington must do so, not because Americans like him or because they wish to be perceived as nice fellows, but in order to advance U.S. interests.

Principal U.S. objectives in Cuba should be to reduce Soviet influence; to moderate Cuban actions abroad; and to encourage a liberalization process in Cuba itself. Yet, clearly, confrontation works directly against the first and third goals. Castro can neither loosen his relationship with the Soviet Union nor relax discipline at home as long as he must fear the appearance of Marine divisions on his beaches. It is unrealistic to expect that Cuba could or would wish to sever ties with Moscow. A reduction in Soviet dominance, however, is no less in Cuba's interest than in America's. In the final analysis, a reduced Soviet presence in Cuba is also in Moscow's interest. And Washington's best hope of moderating Cuban foreign policy is in demonstrating over time that compromise is in Havana's interests.

Having defined U.S. goals, American officials must devise a policy of gradual engagement to achieve them. In order to improve the atmosphere and build confidence in one another's good faith, negotiations should begin with free travel, cultural exchanges, and discussion of some of the more routine problems between the two countries. The process must be carefully orchestrated, and it must be clear to the Cubans that if they want the United States to address their concerns they must address U.S. concerns as well. Successful dialogue will be firmly based on the principle of reciprocity. Cuba will only stop supporting subversive groups in Central America if the United States also ceases to do so. CIA backing for the armed groups operating against Nicaragua from Honduras must cease, as should the training in Florida of exiles bent on attacking Cuba. As a senior Cuban official stated to me recently: "We are perfectly willing to agree to rules of the game, but they must apply to you as well as to us."

The United States should apply to Cuba the same cautious yet realistic approach it employs toward the USSR and other adversaries. Haig noted recently that while Americans could not expect any rapid reconciliation of U.S. and Soviet interests, the United States had to work toward that objective. Why should the United States not apply this attitude to Cuba as well? The process may be slow, but at least moving in the right direction would be a vast improvement over the past.●

GAO'S "EARLY OBSERVATIONS ON BLOCK GRANT IMPLEMENTATION"

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, recently, the General Accounting Office released a report entitled, "Early Observations on Block Grant Implementation," No. GGD-82-79, August 24, 1982. This excellent report illustrates some of the potential difficulties that may arise in the implementation of the administration's New Federalism proposals.

The first phase of the new block grant programs was incorporated into the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981. Nine block grants were created which consolidated numerous separate categorical programs. These nine block grants gave the States substantially more authority over the use, distribution, and fiscal control of Federal funds. Along with the new responsibility, however, substantial reductions in funding occurred compared with what the programs would have received at the previous year's levels.

The comprehensive GAO study, which encompassed 13 States, concluded that reasonable progress was being made in the early stages of the block grant transition. This is apparently due to the States' own energetic and successful efforts, because, as the report mentions, "Federal agencies have been adhering to a policy of minimal involvement in block grant administration."

GAO reported that early implementation efforts in the States that were visited, largely centered around coping with Federal funding reductions. Of the block grants that were operating at the time of the review, only the social services program had undergone major revisions by the States, and it appears that budgetary constraints necessitated these changes. In contrast, few changes were made in the health block grants and community services programs, because ongoing categorical outlays—"pipeline moneys"—from prior project grant awards provided States with a financial cushion in these areas. This cushion served to mitigate the adverse effects of these funding reductions.

We should approach the block grant issue with a great deal of caution, since GAO predicts that more wide-ranging modifications will occur next year, and I believe that these will be reflected in major service reductions; especially if funding remains at these drastically reduced rates.

Proponents of the block grants noted that reduced Federal requirements and increased programmatic flexibility would allow States to maintain services with less resources. The GAO report notes that it was too early to draw any definitive conclusions on this theory, but noted that some State officials offered their early impressions that any savings produced by block grants would not compensate for the budget reductions. Moreover, State officials said that the assumption of greater responsibilities not previously administered by States would actually lead to increased costs.

Mr. President, I commend this report to my colleagues, and welcome its addition to the continuing debate on the wisdom and structure of New Federalism. GAO will be continuing their work in this area, and this will be invaluable to the Congress and enable us to fully assess the risks and benefits involved in the delegation of authority to the States. I ask that the digest of the GAO report be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The report follows:

[Comptroller General's Report to the Congress]

EARLY OBSERVATIONS ON BLOCK GRANT IMPLEMENTATION

DIGEST

The 13 States GAO visited were making reasonable progress in the transition to block grant administration. Involvement with the predecessor programs helped States accommodate the shift even though there was little time before implementation and the uncertainty of block grant appropriations complicated planning. Budget reductions accompanying the block grants also prompted concerns and adjustments. Ongoing outlays from prior categorical awards, certain legislative restrictions and other factors, however, initially limited the number of major changes from most previous programs. States can be expected to institute more programmatic and administrative changes as the transition continues to unfold.

Block grant oversight and accountability mechanisms were evolving at the time of GAO's study. State legislatures were moving to become more involved in block grant decisions, and States were establishing procedures to obtain public participation and to audit block grant expenditures. Concurrently, Federal agencies have been adhering to a policy of minimal involvement in block grant administration. Certain questions, however, have arisen concerning matters such as the amount of information that would be available on State block grant activities and the applicability of Federal laws in addition to the block grant legislation.

PRIOR STATE INVOLVEMENT HELPED EASE TRANSITION

The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 assigned States primary administrative responsibility for nine block grants. Six became effective on October 1, 1981: Social Services; Low-Income Home Energy Assistance; Maternal and Child Health Services; Preventive Health and Health Services; Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Services; and Community Services. The Education, Primary Care, and Small Cities block grants were not operating at the time of GAO's review, and States were using the added time to assess the merits of State administration or to plan for implementation. Almost all of the 13 States were administering the operating block grants, with the exception of the Community Services program which 5 had deferred.

The transition to most of the operating block grants was eased considerably by States' previous experience. States already received the vast majority of funds under the predecessor programs and had various ties with program recipients. Consequently, the need to make major administrative adjustments immediately was reduced for most block grant programs. Because States' prior involvement in the Community Services program was not as extensive, in general more decisions were required. (See pp. 9 to 13.)

While States' experience helped ease the transition, officials in most States believed that the process could have been enhanced by more timely and reliable data. Recognizing the short time available, in a number of cases State officials were generally satisfied with the information they received and cited certain Federal actions as particularly helpful. In several instances, however, officials stated that the lack of adequate information about funding and other matters complicated planning, particularly in cases where funds previously had gone to non-State entities. (See pp. 15 to 19.)

SEVERAL FACTORS INFLUENCED THE NUMBER OF EARLY PROGRAM CHANGES

During early implementation, a major concern was coping with budget reductions. For the three operating health block grants and the Community Services program, however, several factors fostered stability and limited the number of major changes made immediately. Most notably, ongoing Federal outlays from 1981 awards under the predecessor categorical programs provided additional time and resources for adjusting to the reduced funding levels. Almost all of these programs were project grants, or had a project grant component, funded for at least a 12-month period. Because they became effective at various times in the Federal fiscal year, many in the last quarter, these projects already were funded well into fiscal year 1982. (See pp. 21 to 23.)

The limited scope of early adjustments under the health and community services block grants also was influenced by statutory requirements for continued funding of certain grantees and services, and the short time frame preceding implementation. Moreover, States rarely had transferred funds from one of these block grants to another block grant as allowed by the legislation. Generally, States retained priorities established under the categorical programs; when reductions were necessary, officials most often reported making them on a proportional basis.

In contrast, more changes were made immediately in two block grants which had fewer legislative restrictions and no ongoing categorical outlays. To cope with funding reductions in the Social Services block grant, 10 of the States altered previously established funding patterns. Also, seven States had transferred Low-Income Home Energy Assistance funds into Social Services. In the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance program States used their new flexibility to fund weatherization—an activity not authorized previously. (See pp. 25 to 27.)

While initially concentrating on budgetary decisions, certain States reported, or contemplated, management changes to take advantage of reduced Federal application and reporting requirements. Officials believed, however, it was too early to make any definitive judgments on administrative costs or efficiencies emanating from block grants. (See pp. 27 to 29.)

STATE BLOCK GRANT OVERSIGHT MECHANISMS ARE EVOLVING

Although limited by the short time frame preceding implementation, States were moving to establish block grant oversight procedures. For example, in 10 States GAO visited, State legislatures had enacted measures influencing early block grant implementation and enhancing their role in appropriating funds and reviewing block grant plans. As a result of these actions and the overall trend greater State oversight of Federal funds, State legislatures are expected to become increasingly involved in block grant decisions. (See pp. 30 to 32.)

During early implementation, States obtained public comments by holding hearings, circulating block grant plans, and establishing advisory groups. State methods for obtaining future public participation, however, had not been finalized at the time GAO completed its work. Thus, a more complete picture should be available next year. (See pp. 32 to 35.)

One oversight vehicle contemplated by the legislation is State audits of block grant funds. Audit strategies were being developed and the States were considering questions that had arisen concerning such factors as the approach and funding of block grant audits. The Office of Management and Budget has requested States to submit their audit plans so an early dialogue can begin. (See pp. 35 to 37.)

OTHER BLOCK GRANT DEVELOPMENTS

Traditional Federal oversight activities, such as detailed application review, have been curtailed and little additional guidance has been issued beyond that contained in the statutes. Federal compliance and enforcement efforts on such matters as nondiscrimination are being developed. (See pp. 39 to 41 and p. 43.)

Although States are required to submit annual reports, Federal agencies have stated they will not specify the form and content of these reports. Concerns that the lack of standard program data could make national assessments difficult have prompted certain States for some block grants to work together to maintain or develop reporting systems. A key issue is whether this voluntary approach will produce sufficient information for national policymaking.

Another question raised during early implementation was whether national crosscutting requirements, such as fair labor standards and political activities constraints, apply to the block grants. Crosscutting requirements are statutes or administrative requirements which apply by their terms to all or several Federal assistance programs. Aside from certain civil rights laws, the Reconciliation Act and agency regulations by and large are silent on the subject. The Small Cities block grant regulations are an exception to this pattern.

As opposed to making an explicit determination of the applicability of crosscutting requirements to the block grants, Federal agencies at this time are addressing the issue selectively, but they are continuing to consider alternative ways of approaching the subject. Given the short time available preceding implementation, most States were considering the applicability of these requirements and believed that Federal advice would be desirable. (See pp. 42 to 44.)

GAO believes it would be helpful, in minimizing potential problems, if the Office of Management and Budget in coordination with the responsible Federal agencies assessed whether or not the crosscutting requirements apply to the block grant programs. This would provide a basis for sound advice to the States and for seeking remedial legislation if that were deemed appropriate. In response to this report, the Office of Management and Budget stated that it has begun a process to work with the Federal agencies and others to consider general guidance on the crosscutting requirements.

AGENCY COMMENTS

Federal agencies commented that this report was a useful and objective summary of block grant implementation. They also stated that it was accurate and provided new insights on States' experiences. Written comments received from the Office of Management and Budget and the Department of Education along with GAO's response are included in appendixes III and IV. Oral comments were received from the Departments of Health and Human Services (HHS) and Housing and Urban Development (HUD). HHS officials said that the report was a cogent and helpful description of block grant implementation, and they offered some technical comments which were considered in preparing this report. HUD officials said that the report accurately described the Department's block grant program.●

SO, WHAT'S WRONG WITH A SERVICE ECONOMY

●Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, recently Forbes magazine published an interview with Mr. Ron Shelp, vice president of the American International Group, concerning the dominance of the service sector in the U.S. economy.

Some policymakers are making a belated discovery about the transformation of the U.S. economy from a manufacturing to a service economy even though this transition has actually been proceeding since the 1920's.

What is important about this phenomenon is not that the United States has become a service economy but rather that it is becoming increasingly information-oriented, with value added coming principally from technically trained individuals who have specialized training in data handling and with information skills.

In his interview, Mr. Shelp dispels some myths about the service economy, such as the allegation that a service economy will result in lower living standards. Moreover, he notes that productivity in services may be much higher than claimed although we currently have no means to measure accurately the increase in service productivity.

Finally, he makes the crucial point that services are closely linked to products. Clearly, for example, computer software is intimately related to computer hardware, and both are crucial to operations.

This Forbes interview is noteworthy because it moves the discussion about services toward services as part of a national industrial economic strategy. Services must be seen as a part of economic policy, and this interview makes a worthy contribution to this policy debate. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The interview follows:

SO, WHAT'S WRONG WITH A SERVICE ECONOMY?

(By James Cook)

As the recession has deepened and more and more of the U.S. traditional manufacturing economy has shut down, much of it permanently, it has become clear that the U.S. is going to have to depend more and more on the service industries for jobs and for economic growth. To most people, the services seem like a feeble reed for a great nation to cling to—low paying, economically unproductive, incapable of generating the kind of growth and affluence the U.S. is accustomed to. That's the conventional wisdom. Last year Ronald K. Shelp, a vice president with New York's American International insurance group, challenged this conventional wisdom in a book, "Beyond Industrialization: Ascendancy of the Global Service Economy" (Praeger, $29.95). In it Shelp argues that the shift to a service economy, while painful, is good for us in the long run. He tells Forbes why.

SHELP: In terms of the way economists define it, in terms of jobs, the U.S. has been a service economy since about 1945, when over half of Americans were employed in services. Since then the proportion has grown dramatically. By 1980-81, 72 percent were employed in services. [In dollars] services are now over half the GNP—about 65%. We're making policy as if we are an industrial country, and not dealing with the fact that we aren't.

Look at our leading economic indicators. They come out every month, and what do they measure? Inventories, job creation, manufacturing confidence, housing starts and so on. In my opinion they don't really measure the U.S. economy because very few of them have anything to do with the service sector.

Having said that, it is a very tough thing to start measuring. Yet we make a series of conclusions about how well or how poorly the U.S. economy is faring based on judgments of how an industrial economy should be faring. Which, again, we haven't been doing for 40 years.

As we become a service economy our standard of living will decline—maybe I should say continue to decline.

SHELP: Well, it may or may not. People have never come to grips with the problem of productivity in services. Because nobody knows how to measure it. A lot of people blame services for our declining productivity because services are supposed to be so unproductive. They contribute more to inflation than big, labor-intensive industries, and it takes five service workers to do what one manufacturing worker can do. I doubt that is true, but when we deal with the problem of national productivity, we don't address how you measure and improve productivity in services but productivity in manufacturing. So we are not really addressing the problem.

The assumption is that it is very hard to improve productivity in nonmachinery, labor-intensive businesses; if you issue loans or insurance policies, you just have to have people to turn out these policies, and the more policies, the more people. But if you look at word processors and all the other technological changes going on in service companies, I suspect the potential for improvement in services is a lot better than we think it is. People have this built-in bias against services. I don't know if you saw that piece in the New York Times the other day—"Big Mac versus Big Steel." What bothered me was not the either/or but equating the service economy with Big Mac.

Jobs in the service sector often are lower paying than those in manufacturing.

SHELP: When people think of services, they first think of government and then of menial services. And the wages in those kinds of services are lower. But services also include the high-technology services, the professions, accounting, construction companies, telecommunications companies, banks, insurance companies, advertising. Look at the wage level there. You're in a different ball game. Henry Kissinger once said that a great nation cannot be a nation that depends on hamburger franchises. I agree with him absolutely. The trouble is, I don't think that's what the U.S. service economy is about.

You know, the only thing that Marx and Adam Smith probably agreed on is that services are parasitic. They both say that: The services aren't productive, they don't really contribute anything to the gross national product or to growth. There are a whole series of assumptions about services. They're always said to be labor-intensive as well as low paying—some are, some aren't, some are even capital-intensive. They are associated with low technology, low skill. There is a propensity for services to employ women, minorities, part-time workers. And these traditional assumptions are definitely true—for some service industries.

But they are parasitic, aren't they? They really do feed off everything else that goes on in the economy.

SHELP: The real point for me is that they're integrated. It's not services or manufacturing. They complement each other. Look at the socialist countries, where they have made a concerted effort to allocate their resources to industry, big industry. But, as we know, their industry doesn't work very well. There is no effective distribution system, no effective transportation system, communications system, marketing and so forth. That's one of the big problems for the Soviet Union and quite a few other socialist countries, and countries such as Hungary and Rumania are beginning to think about it.

A novel thought: Socialist industry is inefficient because it is excessively industrial. So you're suggesting service industries really provide a sort of infrastructure for industrial development.

SHELP: That's right. The lines are beginning to blur. Industrial companies are already selling services, a lot of them both domestically and internationally, and one day you'll find services acquiring manufacturing. Take the oil companies. They're being forced into the service business overseas by nationalism—Aramco in Saudi Arabia, some of the companies in Libya. They are no longer equity holders of oil companies. They are supplying their expertise, management and consulting services to government or to the new owners. Eventually, they will start exploiting these skills and services everywhere.

Or take construction and engineering services. The Bechtels and the Fluors and all these great companies aren't just selling services, design and construction, they are also selling goods, selling an incredible amount of goods, and the likelihood is, when they get an international contract they will choose the engineering, design and equipment from those they know—that is, the U.S. producers.

The point is that services and manufacturing are linked, integrally. The development of the service sector can and should encourage the growth in manufacturing. The great pity is, a lot of people equate the rise in the service economy with the decline in our traditional manufacturing industry. They assume that nothing is going to be manufactured and produced in this country anymore. If you read economic theory, you know some economists say that societies go through three stages—agricultural, industrial, post-industrial—and the third phase is supposed to be the most advanced stage, the stage where we have really arrived as an economy, where we are a truly sophisticated, advanced technological society.

Not much help to me if I lose my job.

SHELP: You ask, where are the people in these declining industries going to work? The obvious conclusion is they are going to work in the service sector and hopefully at something other than franchising or at low wage levels. There is a good bit of data showing that that's what has been happening since the turn of the century—when people left the agricultural sector, the majority of the jobs weren't filled in the industrial sector. Even as we were becoming an industrial nation, they were filled in the service sector. That's been true in the U.S. through-out the 20th century. The U.S. service sector has done quite well in producing jobs in bad times, and not just jobs in McDonald's either. Between 1977 and 1980, in fact, employment in eating and drinking establishments rose 18%, but employment in business services increased 32%, with computer and data processing up 64%. Job gains of more than 25% occurred in legal services, engineering and architectural services, and accounting, auditing and bookkeeping.

And, of course, government remains one of the dominant forces in the U.S. service economy.

SHELP. That's true and not true. There's a tendency to think of the growth in government as being primarily responsible for creating jobs in the service sector, and you can't minimize it. But in recent years government employment has dropped at the federal level. It has not leveled off much at the state and local level [and] this New Federalism, if that works, should probably encourage more growth there. I don't want to minimize the role of government, but I don't think that's where all the action is. In terms of employment, the U.S. would be a service economy without government. Barely. But so, I think, would quite a few other countries, including some developing ones.

What shocked me, when I started looking into this, is how many developing countries are service economies already. They haven't gone through the other stages. Maybe they don't have to. Maybe imitating industrial countries like the U.S. is not necessarily the pattern that everybody has to follow. I initially thought the data would show they were all shining shoes and selling pencils, but there are a surprising number in commerce, retail trade, transportation, things you wouldn't expect. And when you get to developing countries that have really fostered the service industries, such as Singapore and Hong Kong, they are in the same kind of service industries that the highly skilled service workers are in this country.

Of course, in a lot of these countries, government service is used as a means of solving the unemployment problem, much as we used the Post Office here right after WWII.

SHELP: Government is one of the main reasons some developing countries have service economies. Not just as a means of solving the unemployment problem, but because governments have accepted the responsibilities for accelerated economic development and growth, as well as welfare, leisure-time activities, good health and educational facilities—responsibilities that, when we were developing, our government didn't assume.

What you're suggesting is that if we go on trying to find solutions to problems in the economy by focusing on the industrial sector, we're going to be pursuing the wrong solutions to the wrong problems.

SHELP. The problem of adjustment is a very difficult one. I have no doubt that certain companies in certain traditional industries are probably finished. Particular steel companies may have had it, but that doesn't necessarily convince me the U.S. steel industry is finished. I think part of our traditional industry will come back. The tough part is determining when to let the weak ones fail in the struggle and when to provide government assistance. I don't think the U.S. is very good at that. Everybody says the industries to foster are services and high technology. But how then do you determine which high technology you want—which are the good ones, which aren't, which services are good and which aren't, and finally which traditional industries you'll save?

Proponents of reindustrialization wouldn't agree with you. They dream of restoring the good old days.

SHELP: Reindustrialization is probably a misguided policy. We should really concentrate on cultivating our services, our technology and the traditional companies and industries that can and should survive. Obviously we have to factor in things like national security in making those decisions.

Scant comfort to the permanently laid-off autoworkers. Robots taking their jobs.

SHELP: Robotics is scary, especially the type the Japanese have moved in on. But I suspect robotics will create new business opportunities, new industries, new technologies. They are hard to fix in advance. That has always happened before in technological change: New technologies inevitably create new jobs themselves. Intuitively I think that's true. There obviously will be unemployment and job changes, but the problem to my mind is providing the incentive for retaining and relocating people in new areas. There is something to be said for certain kinds of planned adjustment. It's nice to think about the invisible hand taking care of everything, retraining and relocating people, but I think other countries are a lot more creative about it than we are.●

NEWBERRY, MICH., CELEBRATES ITS CENTENNIAL

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, this year Newberry, Mich. will mark its centennial. Under the general slogan of "Looking Back—Moving Ahead," Newberry has developed an extensive program of celebration. And they have a great deal to celebrate.

Even though I was born and raised in a city, I know that our national roots pull all of us to towns like Newberry—towns where you know your neighbors, share their concerns, cooperate with them in improving the quality of life in your community. In fact, many of our efforts in this Nation are directed to creating that kind of communal spirit in our own lives; lives which are too often impoverished by the impersonal nature of our dealings with others.

I am glad that a town like Newberry understands that the basis of its strength rests in its sense of self. Its ability to survive and flourish is nurtured by the fact that for a century it has been a physical and spiritual home to generations of families who know that their own essence has been shaped by a common experience. Newberry celebrates that sense of community as it fondly allows itself to "look back." But Newberry also recognizes that renewal comes from more than a knowledge of the past; it also comes from an experience of the future. And that is why Newberry takes the opportunity afforded by its centennial to think about "moving ahead." After all, roots do more than anchor a tree to a spot in the soil; they also provide the nourishment which allows the branches of that tree to grow and search for new paths to the sky.

In many ways, I wish I had been born in Newberry. But, in many ways, I am a part—we are all a part—of its history and future. Mr. President, I extend my congratulations to the town and the people of Newberry, Mich., and I send them my thanks for what they have been and my best wishes for what they will be.●

NATIONAL ALZHEIMER'S DISEASE WEEK

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I am asking support for a joint resolution to encourage the designation of the week of November 21, 1982, as National Alzheimer's Disease Week. I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleagues, Senators EAGLETON and LEVIN as well as Members of Congress in making Americans more aware and more concerned about the devastating effects of Alzheimer's disease.

The disease is now believed to be the most common cause of severe impairment in older individuals. With 1.5 million victims, Alzheimer's disease is one of the most common causes of death in the United States.

There is no known cure for Alzheimer's disease and there are no known methods for preventing it. What is known is that it produces intellectual disability—senile dementia—in 15 percent of Americans aged 65 and over. We know that this disease accounts for more than 50 percent of all nursing home admissions in the United States. And we know that it is costing billions of dollars each year to provide health care for these afflicted individuals.

We are beginning to understand more about the causes of Alzheimer's disease. For example, we know that changes in proteins in the brain lead to mental and neurological symptoms. The victim of this disease is likely to experience losses in memory, confusion, irritability, and problems in judgments. This is intensely frustrating for both those afflicted and for their loved ones since the individual with Alzheimer's disease appears healthy physically but is rendered mentally crippled and thus becomes incapable of functioning normally.

Clearly, we need to know more about the causes of Alzheimer's disease. Certainly we need to investigate into the possible hereditary links of this heartbreaking disease. We need to study Alzheimer's disease more thoroughly with the hope of better treatment, a possible cure, and an eventual method of prevention.

It is my hope that passage of this joint resolution declaring a National Alzheimer's Disease Week will spur more interest, a greater concern, and an outpouring of research into this important area of health. I invite my distinguished colleagues to join me in this endeavor.●

LEROY COX: A FOUNDING FATHER OF RAYTOWN

● Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, on September 22, 1982, the Raytown Area Chamber of Commerce will be honoring Raytown's leading citizen for many years, Leroy Cox.

Few Americans can claim the title of being a "founding father" of their community, but Leroy Cox is just that. He was one of the citizens who convinced the Jackson County Court that Raytown should be incorporated and in 1950, Mr. Cox was appointed the first Mayor of the new community. He served as Mayor for 9 years, from 1950 through 1957 and from 1959 through 1960. As Mayor, Mr. Cox gave life to Raytown, spearheading the establishment of city boundaries through annexation, sewer development, street lights, traffic lights, street maintenance, city parks, the police department, and the purchase of the first City Hall.

After leaving the Mayor's office in 1960, Mr. Cox continued serving his community. He has been a member of the Jackson County Planning Commission Board of Zoning Adjustment since 1973 and has been active in numerous civic organizations.

Leroy Cox has also been highly successful at his avocation, the exhibition of American saddlebred horses at major national horse shows since 1946. In addition, he has served as sponsor of the Raytown Piperettes Women's A.A.U. basketball team, which ranked in the top 5 teams nationally for 15 or more years and whose players earned 40 first-team All-America awards.

The list of Leroy Cox's honors and achievements goes on and on. His has been a life of dedication and service to his community, his State, and his Nation. I join the Raytown Area Chamber of Commerce, of which Mr. Cox is a past president, in saluting him. His achievements are a testament to his commitment to his friends and neighbors. Leroy Cox has worked tirelessly to improve his community and I am confident that his work will go on in the future. Raytown owes a great debt of gratitude to Leroy. I join the Chamber of Commerce and all of Raytown in extending my heartfelt thanks to him for his many years of service.●

HOME RECORDING

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, on August 1, 1982, the Philadelphia Inquirer endorsed the approach that I have proposed to resolve the home-taping issue now before the Senate Judiciary Committee. As you know, my amendment to S. 1758 would exempt home video and audio taping from liability for copyright infringement. It would also require the manufacturers and importers of recording devices and blank tapes to pay a small royalty to compensate copyright owners. The Inquirer's editorial is a thoughtful statement of the need to find a reasonable solution that protects both the right of copyright owners to be compensated for the use of their creative property, as well as the interests of citizens who wish to tape in the privacy of their homes.

I ask that this editorial be included in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Aug. 1, 1982]

HOME RECORDING, YES, BUT PROTECT COPYRIGHTS

U.S. copyright law, authorized in a constitutional provision giving the Congress power to secure for authors "the exclusive right to their respective writings" for limited times, was enacted in 1790 by the First Congress and has been revised a number of times. It well could be described as the nation's initial and most fundamental consumer legislation. Without copyright protection there would be no financial incentive to write books, songs, plays and other creative works that could easily be copied and sold with no compensation to the authors.

It is in that context that the Congress should consider carefully pending bills dealing with video and audio taping of copyrighted material for home use. Generally referred to as the Betamax bills, in reference to the trade name of a device on the market used to record television programs for future viewing, the measures would apply to all types of videocassette recorders (VCRs) and also to audio taping devices used to reproduce copyrighted records and albums.

Last October the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit ruled that reproduction of copyrighted video material for home use constituted copyright infringement and that manufacturers and distributers of the recording devices may be held liable in damage suits. The U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to hear an appeal, but a decision is not expected before next year.

Meanwhile, the first congressional action on the issue is likely to be in the Senate, where Betamax bills are on the agenda of the Judiciary Committee and could come up for consideration at any time, possibly this week. Members of the committee include Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) and Joseph R. Biden, Jr. (D., Del.), both of whom have devoted much study to the bills and have kept their options open. Their committee votes could be crucial.

One proposal before the committee simply would nullify the Ninth Circuit Court decision by exempting taping for home use from copyright liability with no compensation to copyright owners. That would be not only unfair but an opening wedge to potentially devastating erosion of copyright protection at a time of rapid advance in technology for reproducing copyrighted work at low cost.

A more reasonable approach is taken in an amendment sponsored by Sen. Charles Mathias (R., Md.) that, while allowing taping for home use to continue, would provide for compensation to copyright owners. Funds for the compensation would come from fees assessed on retail sales of recorders and tapes.

An existing federal agency, the Copyright Royalty Tribunal, would set the fees and divide the proceeds among copyright owners in much the same way it does now relative to music played in coin-operated "jukeboxes" and by other means in public places. Since it would be impractical, if not impossible, to tabulate precisely the number of times each musical selection is played, the tribunal allocates royalties to copyright holders based on available data, with arbitration procedures in case of disputes.

The complexity of detail is enormous, and the Congress migl:t be well advised to avoid spelling out every intricate rule of implementation. At root is the need to give fair treatment to owners of copyrighted material without impeding unreasonably the use of recording devices that provide convenience and enjoyment for increasing numbers of people.

It has been argued superficially that no copyright compensation for home recording is justified because much of the money probably would go to producers of motion pictures and television shows already making large profits. That shouldn't be necessarily so, but legislation could take that into account with provisions assuring fair allocation to individual creative artists and performers and noncorporate copyright owners.

Home recording devices commonly allow for deletion of commercials, which has led to the "time-switching" phenomenon whereby movies, shows and other events on TV are routinely recorded for later viewing because they can be seen in significantly less time without commercials. Sponsor support for TV programming presumably would diminish if growing proportions of audiences deleted commercials. Relationships between copyright compensation and future program quality deserve Congress' attention.

In a relatively short time print-copying technology may permit books to be reproduced at less cost than conventional printing. Although this is not an immediate issue before the Congress, precedents set in copyrights for visual and audio material may affect later decisions on a broader spectrum of copyrighted material.

Copyright protection is the essence of the issue before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Advancing technology requires more, not less, vigilance in preserving and strengthening that protection.●

WILDLIFE MANAGEMENT

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I recently had an opportunity to read in Exxon USA an excellent question and answer article featuring Bob Jantzen, the Director of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, who came to his present post from the State of Arizona. It deals honestly and effectively with the difficult wildlife management issues of today and points out how it is the intent of the Reagan administration to deal with these issues with sound resource management practices.

Since most of us are being questioned by constituents on wildlife policies, I urge everyone in the Senate to take time to read this meaningful article. I believe it will provide a greater understanding of the issues and of the man who is in charge of our Nation's wildlife.

I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From Exxon USA, First Quarter 1982]

THINKING LIKE A MOUNTAIN

(By Don Dedera)

He is 53 years of age. That span of time roughly coincides with the evolution of a truly national—even international—policy of scientific and sensitive management of the fish and wildlife resources of the United States.

Robert A. Jantzen by name, he is the newly appointed director of the Interior Department's Fish and Wildlife Service. He fills a post served in the past by a succession of distinguished naturalists and biologists. As federal caretaker of the creatures of America's land, air, and waters, he personifies an ethic now deeply ingrained in the American spirit.

It wasn't always so.

The Nation's blackest environmental chapters chronicle abuse and waste of our living natural resources. Many dark deeds of egg gatherers, plume seekers, fish dynamiters, and commercial gunners can never be undone. Millions of bison no longer roam the plains, and more millions of passenger pigeons have vanished forever from the flyways.

Yet nature early attracted its defenders and champions—Emerson, Walton, Thoreau, Marsh, Burroughs, Merriam, Mather, Muir. Massachusetts closed its season on deer in 1694; in 1872, America set aside the world's first national park: Yellowstone. The country heeded Gifford Pinchot: "There are just two things on this material earth: people and natural resources. A constant and sufficient supply of natural resources is the basic human problem." Novelists of the stature of DeVoto and Steinbeck gave voice to that truth, and Ellen Glasgow could trace her social issues to "The soil, impoverished by the war and the tenant system which followed the war. . . ."

Nearly a century ago conservationists founded the Boone & Crockett Club. In 1902 the National Association of Audubon Societies emerged. The next year, the first federal wildlife refuge was proclaimed at Pelican Island, Florida.

The aesthetic, cultural, and scientific values of nature's life forms earned the support of more legions of admiring Americans called ecologists, among them, Aldo Starker Leopold. Although his later writings, such as "Thinking Like a Mountain" and "Sand County Almanac" won public acclaim, it was his classic "Wildlife Management," first published in 1933, that fired the imaginations of a new generation of biologists.

"When I first read Leopold's book as a boy, it set the direction of my life," says Bob Jantzen today. Growing up in a small rural central Arizona town, he clerked in a sporting goods store, managed a fish hatchery, and absorbed outdoor knowledge and lore. Following a hitch in the Marines, he took a degree in wildlife management at the University of Arizona and rose through the ranks to become director of his state's game and fish department, a post he held for 13 years. He was named director of the federal service in autumn, 1981. In his Senate confirmation hearing, much was revealed in a brief exchange between Jantzen and an interrogating senator.

"Do you fish, Mr. Jantzen?"

"Yes, Senator, I do."

"Do you fish for trout?"

"Yes."

"With dry flies?"

"Yes, sir."

"Okay. You'll do."

Exxon USA magazine crossed trails with Director Jantzen in Portland, Oregon, where he was inspecting one of the service's seven regional offices.

Exxon USA: Do you hope to visit all the units of the Fish and Wildlife Service?

Jantzen: I wish that were possible. But the national wildlife refuge system has grown to 410 units totaling 87 million acres. If I did nothing else for the next several years. I couldn't do justice to them all. They extend from the Aleutian Islands to the Virgin Islands, from Moosehorn, Maine to Hawaii.

Exxon USA: Anything else you might wish for, in taking on this enormous responsibility?

Jantzen: Well, like most wildlife biologists, many a time over the past 30 years, I've wished I could have been more successful in implementing the concepts advanced by Dr. Charles Vorheis. He was a most influential pioneer in wildlife management at my university. He considered himself an "economic zoologist," sort of a family physician in land health. His belief was that sick nature, like sick people, likely would require treatment. Couldn't just be left alone to cure itself.

Exxon USA: And that philosophy guides you still?

Jantzen: It had better. Beneficial management has become the ideal of all the state fish and wildlife agencies. It's the heart and soul of our endangered species and migratory bird program. Much of our research is toward perpetuation of healthy natural populations.

Exxon USA: Was there a sharp turning in America toward professional scientific management of fisheries and wild birds and animals?

Jantzen: The first in a series of laws enacted during my lifetime was the Pittman-Robertson Act of 1937, in which the federal government collected excise taxes on firearms and ammunition and made the money available to the states to further modern wildlife management. At first, trained wildlife professionals were held in suspicion by some of the old-time, field-trained game warden types. But in the end, scientific management was accepted. For example, some of my most satisfying work was in systematic study of mule deer and wild turkey. In concert with studies by others across the nation, that sort of work led to better management of these species.

Exxon USA: Some critics indict hunters and fishers as the ultimate enemies of wildlife. . . .

Jantzen: Not true! They were among the first to raise alarms and demand measures of protection, such as closed seasons and bag limits. Hunters are outdoor recreationists and are the staunchest supporters of our first guideline in the Fish and Wildlife Service: preserve the resource.

Exxon USA: You're an outspoken advocate of the rights of states to manage their resident wildlife. Now that you're a Washington bureaucrat, has this view changed?

Jantzen: If anything, I believe more fervently that the States should lead in care of resident species. We seek a stronger partnership between the federal service and the state agencies, built on trust and respect. For our own part in the federal service, we face a tremendous task in correcting deficiencies in our national wildlife refuges and ranges managed by the service. Lord knows, there's enough work to go around.

Exxon USA: What's wrong with "benign neglect?"

Jantzen: Look—for a long, long time so much of this country has been influenced by human presence that there is no way we can leave management to Mother Nature. Complete protection of a species in some cases may be a proper procedure. But there's no stopping the world for the protection of everything. The more sensible goal is a balance between utilization of these fish and wildlife resources and conservation of this precious heritage for future generations.

Exxon USA: "Management" seems to be battered by biologists into a fuzzy buzzword. Does it have any real meaning?

Jantzen: Sure it does. It means maintaining and restoring habitat. That's where life begins. It means keeping good data on populations. It means keeping watch for disease and other impacts upon fish and wildlife. It means identification and control of pollutants. It means removing certain species when necessary and restocking if required. It means harvesting of surpluses. It means listening to the constructive advice of all user groups.

Exxon USA: You're a native of a western state which abruptly shifted in human population from rural to urban. Do city folks know enough about the natural world?

Jantzen: They do, and they don't. An environmental jargon has come into vogue. Consider the word, "ecosystem." But whether an ecosystem is a bucket of water or a whole ocean, in nature, it is dynamic, shifting, changing. The ever-changing forces of nature have been endangering species millions of years before the influence of humans. And what of the human race? People are a part of this world, too, with legitimate needs and a well-deserved biological niche.

Exxon USA: At times you have fought for expansion of wilderness, and at other times you've opposed more wilderness. Is there a conflict?

Jantzen: America needs an adequate wilderness system. But I don't agree with those who say we can't have too much wilderness. There are at least two serious flaws in that attitude. First, most wilderness simply cannot care for itself. Second, locking up vast tracts as wilderness effectively removes nature from the use and enjoyment of perhaps a majority of Americans. For example, some 35 million Americans—one citizen in six—are handicapped. Millions of others don't have the money to finance an expensive wilderness vacation. I do understand that for many Americans the very idea of wilderness has value, and it does for me, too. But we can never return to the days of Lewis and Clark.

Exxon USA: That statement may win you no friends among wilderness lovers.

Jantzen: I wouldn't want to make enemies, but America's wrenching change cannot be ignored. Where once we were a nation of farmers and ranchers and woodsmen and drovers and outdoorsmen, those roles have diminished in relative numbers. When Americans mostly sprang from rural origins, they were tuned to the cycles of life forms, and witnessed the calculated cruelities of nature herself; they knew a great deal of the relationships of the waters and woods. Abstraction from reality may present us with our greatest challenge—how can we make, as a democracy, good political/biologial decisions if we think eggs come from a styrofoam nest and milk comes from a waxpaper udder? I wonder if one American in 50 today has observed the birth of a calf, let alone watched a coyote kill a fawn.

Exxon USA: Back home, you got your share of criticism. An old-time rancher, Fred Fritz, sometimes disagreed with you rather vociferously.

Jantzen: That is correct, and I prized every comment that fine gentleman made. He was a man of the land. For example, he understood that no matter what he did, 85 percent of the quail propulation was going to perish by natural means every year, and that the average rabbit has a life expectancy of 30 days. Fred appreciated his current resource base. He could be sentimental, but he was a realist toward nature. Fred's father was killed by a grizzly bear.

Exxon USA: Some Americans down through the years have been so wealthy and altruistic as to give the nation entire national parks—Acadia, Great Smokey Mountain, Grand Tetons, Guadalupe Mountains. What can we of lesser means contribute?

Jantzen: Sound citizenship. In several states recently, programs to curtail poaching have gained wide citizen support. Peer pressure encourages people to obey the game and fish laws. And that said, I'll bet the hunting and fishing regulations are better obeyed than traffic laws in this country.

Exxon USA: There seems to be a trend toward barbless fishing, photographic hunting, and no-trace camping. Approve?

Jantzen: Hook-and-release fishing is gaining in popularity, and I enjoy it myself. That's a preference. But I'll always want to fish for my table, too. That's the culmination of multiple-use management—a choice of use.

Exxon USA: As the most visible federal wildlife conservator, you must count on help from conservation organizations?

Jantzen: We'd probably not succeed without them. There are dozens of organizations. Ducks Unlimited is one of the world's most effective wildlife conservation groups. Privately financed, it invests 80 percent of its donations annually in breeding grounds in Canada. Not just waterfowl but 300 species of birds and mammals benefit. Also, the Nature Conservancy owns and protects more than 700 sanctuaries in 47 states. Other groups add to this living national treasure. I'd say that Ducks Unlimited has made a major contribution in increasing waterfowl populations over the last half-century.

Exxon USA: Is industry involvement worthwhile? In Exxon's case, in recent years, the company has contributed substantially to projects devoted to perpetuation of the bald eagle, the bluebird, the peregrine falcon, and a regular zoo of creatures within Sabal Palm Grove Sanctuary in Texas. The company has funded a bird hospital in Florida and contributed to a computer inventory of natural areas. Multiplied throughout industry, do these activities amount to much?

Jantzen: In managing the wildlife agency in a growth state, I learned that industries and individuals impacting a resource usually want to be reasonable and responsive to the need for protecting fish and wildlife. It's their world, too, and in recent years it has been my experience that when developers realize there is potential for harm, most are willing to modify plans to avoid it. That's the point of view I'm taking into this job, anyway.

Exxon USA: And what of the role of the public sector?

Jantzen: For the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, to mention just a few of my goals, I'd like to sustain and improve the professionalism of the organization . . . make sure we're getting good biological facts . . . pass on recommendations to the decision-makers based on solid scientific data. Maybe this sounds trite, but managing people is an important aspect of wildlife management. I'd like the members of our service to become better listeners to a diversity of ideas and, while protecting the resource, become more efficient problem-solvers.

Exxon USA: In the broad sense, has America's environmental record been so atrocious?

Jantzen: The case can be made to the contrary, that in the world community, we're the leaders in responsible concern for nature. We can list the Wilderness Act, the Clean Water Act, the Endangered Species Act, the world's largest national park and wildlife refuge system, the Land and Water Conservation Fund that has assisted thousands of outdoor projects, the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act, and the lands set aside under the Alaska Native Claims Act, and many others. I've served on numerous national and international committees, and I happen to know that our environmental performance as a nation is the standard of the world.

Exxon USA: Of which Americans can take pride?

Jantzen: No king passed down these edicts. They flowed up from the people. The laws of the land reflect the public's desire and judgment that natural resources compose a public treasure. The American recognition of these unique values ennobles us all. If this were not true, the office I hold would be powerless. More likely, it would not exist.

Exxon USA: Could you take a decade-long look at what the future holds for the natural resources under your care?

Jantzen: There unquestionably will be accelerated demands upon the basics: the wild lands and the sea. And how we control these demands will be crucial in their effect upon shellfish, finfish, sea mammals, birds, and land animals. Frankly, I'm optimistic. We add to our knowledge every day, and we know how to safeguard the natural world. I detect some very positive cooperative attitudes maturing in our neighbors to the south, and such a trend will bode well for the migratory life which knows no political boundaries. Also, given the energy requirements of this nation, every element of society must help devise strategies for energy development without permanent damage to our marine and land resources.

Exxon USA: Is that truly possible?

Jantzen: It's been said that humans are the planet's smartest and deftest predators. But I know of no other vertebrate that can manage its environment so well and change its own habits. People can and do modify their behavior, and I find hope in that.

Exxon USA: Then what of a longer look, say, to the year 2000?

Jantzen: That's only 18 years away. I know some of my fellow citizens believe in doomsday, and they refer to a familiar data base called history. I suppose in hindsight we might have done better, but we've changed our ways, too, and in the next couple of decades if we insure that we combine our love for nature with pragmatic science, those dire forecasts need not come to pass. I take heart and direction from the founder of modern game management, he who thought like a mountain. He said it best with the words:

"In the long run we shall learn there is no such thing as forestry, no such thing as game management. The only reality is an intelligent respect for, and adjustment to, the inherent tendency of the land to produce life."●

ELECTION OF DANIEL E. LAMBERT

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, veterans in the State of Maine have, for some time, taken great pride in the leadership of Daniel E. Lambert, who is State adjutant of the American Legion.

Dan's service record is a distinguished one, and he has been in the forefront of efforts to draw attention to the needs of those who have served on their Nation's behalf. He has been a strong spokesman for veterans in Maine and the Nation.

Recently, Dan received the recognition of his peers, when he was elected president of the National American Legion Press Association. In that role, he will, I know, be an effective advocate of veterans and programs of benefit to them.

The American Legion, in an August 31 news release, noted Dan's new position. I ask that the release be printed in the RECORD.

The news release follows:

CHICAGO, ILL.—Daniel E. Lambert, Orrington, Maine, was elected President of the National American Legion Press Association at the annual meeting of the Legion press group held in conjunction with the 64th National Convention of the American Legion in Chicago.

Lambert, a four times wounded veteran of the famed "Darby's Rangers" of World War II, presently is serving as State Adjutant of the Maine American Legion and is the Editor-Publisher of the Maine Legionnaire, the official publication of the Maine American Legion.

The National American Legion Press Association is made up of over 900 publications and a nationwide membership of press and public relations staffers serving the American Legion.

Lambert is a past State commander of the Maine American Legion and serves as State Secretary of the Maine Veterans Coordinating Committee and is active in the American Legion, VFW, DAV, and AMVETS and is legislative counsel to the Maine WWI Veterans.

A writer and lecturer, the new NALPA national president is expected to push a program to promote the image of the American Legion in the nation and to seek to create additional publications for the veterans organization.

He was cited for outstanding service to the veterans, widows and orphans of Maine and the nation by the Legion when he was presented with the Humanitarian Award for service by the Maine group.

Other officers elected included: Area I Vice President, Ely Bar, New York, Area I Executive Board, Robert C. Godfrey, Delaware; Area II Vice President, Robert W. Sowerby, Florida, Area II Executive Board, Mrs. Mary Ada Heitz, Kentucky; Area III Vice President, Bill McGrew, Arkansas, Area III Executive Board, Ocie Sims, Kansas; Area IV Vice President, Austin McElfish, Texas, Area IV Executive Board, Helen F. Benth, Wyoming;

National President Lambert made the following appointments: Secretary-Treasurer, George W. Hooten, Georgia; Chaplain, Willard K. Maxon, Wyoming; Historian, Mrs. Mary B. Howard, Georgia; Sergeant-at-Arms, Richard J. Wilde, Panama; Counselors to Department Publications, Lillian Cleveland, Florida; Emerson O. Mann, Kentucky; Lincoln Cox, West Virginia; Dorothy Rowe, Florida; and Robert B. Craig, Nebraska. Judge Advocate, William Chester, Kentucky; Photographer, George Gagnon, Maine.●

PATRIOTISM AND SERVICE—A GRANDFATHER'S ADVICE

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, as we read reports today of young men refusing to register with the Selective Service System, as required by law, we often tend to forget those Americans who volunteer to enter our Armed Forces, dedicating a portion of their lives to the service of their country.

One of these young men recently received a letter from his grandfather, a constituent of mine from Winterport, Maine. I was so impressed with the feeling expressed in the letter—stressing patriotism, honor, and devotion to duty—that I wanted to bring it to the attention of my colleagues.

Gordon W. Wildes, a retired Air Force colonel, wrote the following letter to his grandson, Michael Redgate of Woodbridge, Va., on the occasion of Michael's acceptance into the U.S. Marine Corps:

MAY 27, 1982.

DEAR MIKE: Congratulations on passing your physical yesterday, and more importantly, on being sworn into the Marine Corps by your father, Colonel John Redgate, USMC. It was an important day for you and I am very proud of you.

You have just taken a big step and I think it is the right one. You are now on your own and your destiny and future will be largely shaped by you. You can either be your best friend or your worst enemy. I am confident that you have good common sense and the character to realize this.

Over the years I have had the opportunity and the pleasure of talking to young recruits like yourself, including my own son, David, when he entered the U.S. Military Academy. I have always pointed out that they—and now you—are now a part of the military chain of command that starts with the President of the United States and goes down to the lowest ranking man in the ranks whose duty it is to carry out the orders of the Commander-in-Chief and defend our great country. Unfortunately, this simple statement of fact is frequently forgotten by some citizens who regard such an honor as something to be dodged rather than experienced.

Another thing I have always pointed out to recruits is this: Becoming a member of the regular armed forces puts one in a very different category than, say, a member of a high school class, or a college class, or an employee of some civilian firm. I say this because yesterday, on taking the oath, you have started a file on yourself, that will, for good or ill, follow you all your life. It is a federal record, an official government document. A lot of young recruits don't realize that not showing up for work a day or two at a Sears Roebuck warehouse is a vastly different matter than not showing up for duty in a military unit and getting an AWOL citation on your record.

In your case, having been raised in a military family, you realize this and you therefore have a considerable advantage.

You have some other advantages:

You have had a fine home all your life. Some of your fellow Marines haven't had this advantage.

You have "been around." Born in North Carolina, lived in Virginia, Connecticut, California, Hawaii, and fortunately, in Maine. You will find that some of your fellow Marines will be leaving their home towns for the first time.

You have been in college one year. I would guess that most of your fellow Marines have not even considered college.

You are probably a year or two older than your fellow Marine recruits. You, therefore, have had more experience in life and can be of help to your fellow Marines who are younger and less experienced than you.

So, my advice is—take advantage of these advantages!

I realize, and I am sure you do also, that the next thirteen or fourteen weeks are not going to be a bed of roses. But as they say in the Marine Corps, "We didn't promise you a rose garden!" They do promise, however, to give you the opportunity to make a better man of yourself while in the service of your country.

And so, Mike, good luck to you. I wish we were riding around the battlefield at Bull Run and could be talking instead of writing.

All of this with affectionate best wishes from your grandfather.

Love,

GORDON W. WILDES.●

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is an order for the Senate to convene at 12 noon on Monday, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no further business to transact. I have a number of routine matters that could be taken care of. I am prepared to do them now.

INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES AUTHORIZATION 1983—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I believe that a conference report on H.R. 6068 is here and available for action. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, could I inquire of the minority leader if he is in a position to consider that matter at this time?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I am.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 6068 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6068) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1983 for intelligence and intelligence-related activities of the United States Government, for the Intelligence Community Staff, for the Central Intelligence Agency Retirement and disability System, to authorize supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1982 for the intelligence and intelligence-related activities of the United States Government, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of August 19, 1982.)

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, it is a privilege to submit the intelligence authorization conference report authorizing appropriations for U.S. intelligence activities for fiscal year 1983.

The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence views the annual budget authorization process as one of the principal means for strengthening the U.S. intelligence system. The committee has devoted a great amount of time and effort during the past 6 years examining how well the intelligence community meets its responsibilities, and we have identified a number of important areas where the system needed improvement. The progress the committee has made through budget authorization will enable the intelligence community to better perform against the diverse and complex concerns our Nation will face in the years ahead.

The fiscal year 1983 intelligence authorization bill continues the committee's goal to revitalize our intelligence system. Not only does the bill provide improvement to a number of key areas but it also insures new capabilities will be available to effectively deal with emerging policymaking problems. However, the committee's work is by no means complete—better processing systems are needed to promote analytical quality and investments must continue so that the intelligence system remains sufficiently flexible to respond to multiple crises without diverting resources from other high-priority missions.

I would like to take this opportunity to commend the members of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and our colleagues in the House for their diligence and strong support for the goals we have set. There is unanimous agreement between the two committees that our intelligence service must be first rate. After all, intelligence is the country's first line of defense.

Mr. President, I strongly urge my colleagues in the Senate to support this important legislation.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the conference report is considered and agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are some items on today's Executive Calendar that are available for action by unanimous consent on this side. I will inquire of the minority leader if he is in a position to consider those items appearing under National Science Foundation and National Corporation for Housing Partnerships.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, those nominations have been cleared on this side of the aisle.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

STATEMENT ON THE CONFIRMATION OF EDWARD A. KNAPP, OF NEW MEXICO, TO BE AN ASSISTANT DIRECTOR OF THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am very pleased that a person of outstanding qualifications such as Dr. Edward A. Knapp was chosen for this influential and prestigious position as Assistant Director of the National Science Foundation for Mathematics and Physical Science. His strong educational background in physics and his firsthand experience in modern applications of science through his work as division leader for accelerator technology at LANL make him an ideal person for the post and I expect the Senate to confirm him as soon as possible.

An employee at LANL since 1958, Dr. Knapp is the division leader for accelerator technology at Los Alamos National Laboratories, a position he has held since 1978.

Dr. Knapp holds a doctorate in high energy physics from the University of California at Berkeley. A scientist who has worked in international circles, he was a visiting scientist in Geneva, Switzerland, a delegate to the Joint United States-Japanese Accelerator Seminar in 1973 and a guest scientist in exchange programs between the United States, Japan, and the Soviet Union.●

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nominees were confirmed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

"Our Father Who art in Heaven," help us to acknowledge Thy Fatherhood and trust Thee as Father. "Hallowed be Thy name." Help us to take seriously the glory of Thy name. "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on Earth as it is in Heaven." Help us to do Thy will and desire Thy Kingdom.

"Give us this day our daily bread." Help us in humility to acknowledge that Thou art the Giver of every good and perfect gift. "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." Help us to be as forgiving to those who oppose us as Thou art in forgiving us.

"Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." Help us to abhor evil and cleave to righteousness.

"For Thine is the Kingdom and the power and the glory forever." Amen.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, two Senators will be recognized on special orders; that is to say, the distinguished Senators from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) and Georgia (Mr. NUNN).

I ask unanimous consent that after the execution of the special orders there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each and to extend not past 1 p.m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VITIATION OF SPECIAL ORDER FOR SENATOR NUNN

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am advised that the distinguished Senator from Georgia no longer requires the time allocated to him under the special order. I ask unanimous consent that it be vitiated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the execution of the special orders and morning business is provided, the Senate will resume consideration of House Joint Resolution 520. Pending at that time will be the Baucus amendment No. 2040 to the Weicker amendment No. 2039.

Senators will recall, I am sure, that there has been an order entered that no tabling motion will be in order the remainder of this day prior to the cloture vote which will occur at 4 p.m. The reason for that was to encourage Members to engage freely in debate on the issues involved without running the risk of losing the floor or gaining some parliamentary advantage.

I hope that Members who have things they wish to say about the pending amendment or about the general subject matter of abortion or prayer in schools will come to the floor and make those statements and engage in that debate during the remainder of this day.

I do not anticipate that there will be another opportunity like this one when no tabling motion will be in order and that, indeed, this is a special opportunity for Members to make their contribution to this debate.

So far the debate has not been very compelling; it has been fairly extensive but with very little give and take. One Member of the freshman class on our side observed to me that on occasion he was tempted to think that the debate had not been substantive. I think that is perhaps an understatement of the situation.

However, Mr. President, I urge Members to consider that today is a special opportunity for them to engage in debate without fear of parliamentary advantage or disadvantage because of the order which prohibits tabling motions prior to the cloture vote which is scheduled to occur at 4 p.m. today.

As I have indicated, Mr. President, there will be a cloture vote today against the Helms amendment. This is the second cloture vote against that amendment. It is my intention, after the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the unfinished business, to file a cloture motion which will produce a vote on Wednesday. I will consult with Senators and with the minority leader in particular and see if it is possible to arrange a time certain for that vote on Wednesday, assuming that cloture is not invoked today. If cloture is invoked today, then, of course, we will continue to debate the pending amendment under the provisions of rule XXII applying to debate after cloture is invoked.

Mr. President, I expect this to be a busy week. The debt limit bill has to be disposed of. I hope that we can do that this week. Senators should be on notice of the possiblity of a late session, especially on Thursday of this week, which is our regularly scheduled late session.

THOSE MEN, SO POWERFUL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, this morning, I am most pleased to share with my colleagues the words of Stanislaw Baranczak, who at the age of 36, is a leading Polish poet, and who, for the last 14 years has been at the forefront of Polish opposition and the Solidarity movement. Mr. Baranczak is presently an associate professor of Polish literature at Harvard.

I ask unanimous consent that his poem "Those Men, So Powerful," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THOSE MEN, SO POWERFUL

(CI MEZCZYZNI, TAK POTEZNI)

(By Stanislaw Baranczak)

Those men, so powerful, always shown somewhat from below by crouching cameramen, who lift a heavy foot to crush me, no, to climb the steps of a plane, who raise a hand to strike me, no, to greet the crowds obediently waving little flags, those who sign my death sentence, no, just a trade agreement which is promptly dried by a servile blotter, those men so brave, with such upturned brows standing in an open car, who with such courage visit the battle-line of the harvest, who set their foot in a furrow as though entering a trench,

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

those men with a hard hand capable of banging on the lectern of the rostrum and slapping on the shoulder people bent in obeisance who just a moment ago were pinned to their black suits with a medal. always you were so afraid of them you were so small compared to them, who always stood above you, on steps, rostrums, platforms, and yet it is enough for just one second to stop being afraid, let's say:
to start being afraid a little less,
to become convinced that they are the ones,
that they are the ones who are most afraid.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is a Senate joint resolution to be offered on behalf of the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the leadership, and other Senators, which I believe is in the hand of the minority leader, and I wonder if he cares to present that at this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

NATIONAL POETRY DAY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BAKER, and other Senators—and I add my own name because this resolution provides for the designation of October 15 as National Poetry Day—I send to the desk a joint resolution and ask that it be stated by the clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 243) authorizing and requesting the President to designate October 15, 1982, as National Poetry Day.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration, and, without objection, the joint resolution will be considered to have been read the second time at length.

The cosponsors of the Bumpers-Baker joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution No. 243, are Senators, ROBERT C. BYRD, HOLLINGS, LUGAR, EAST, DIXON, INOUYE, BURDICK, CANNON, STEVENS, DOMENICI, D'AMATO, DECONCINI, RIEGLE, HATCH, LAXALT, LEVIN, RANDOLPH, TSONGAS, PELL, STENNIS, PRYOR, SYMMS, COCHRAN, BRADLEY, MATSUNAGA, WEICKER, CRANSTON, HEINZ, CHILES, THURMOND.

(By request of Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am introducing today along with Senator BAKER and 28 other cosponsors a resolution designating October 15, 1982, as "National Poetry Day."

Mr. President, through the years various States and foreign countries have set aside days to honor poetry. October 15 is now celebrated as Poetry Day in all 50 States and in over 40 countries. Each year Governors issue Poetry Day proclamations in their respective States, and schools, poets, and poetry organizations across the country observe Poetry Day.

In the 20th century world in which we live—a world full of technological marvels and seemingly impossible scientific feats—it is fitting to take time, as the majority leader does each Monday morning, to spend time with poetry. Poetry delights us all, and is a source of inspiration, insight, and pleasure. Poetry has known no social barriers. It has been enjoyed equally by the rich and the poor, the young and the old, and by people of all nations. Poetry in this country has provided us with unique documentation of events, culture, and traditions. It is a component of our literary arts which warrants special recognition.

Mr. President, Mrs. Peggy Vining, president of the Poets' Roundtable of Arkansas, wrote me last October and asked me to initiate this Poetry Day resolution. At about the same time, Verna Lee Hinegardner, national chancellor, National Federation of State Poetry Societies, Inc., wrote President Reagan asking for such declaration. I ask that these two letters, and the White House response, be printed in the RECORD at this point. I also ask that a history of Poetry Day prepared by the National Poetry Day Committee, Inc., be inserted in the RECORD.

The letters are as follows:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.,
October 1, 1981.

Senator DALE BUMPERS,
Dirksen Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: In 1948 Arkansas was the eleventh state to begin observing National Poetry Day. Each year (just as the President proclaims Thanksgiving) so does the Governor proclaim National Poetry Day in Arkansas.

We celebrate October 15th, National Poetry Day with readings, workshops, contests, Illustrated Poetry exhibits and promote poetry in various ways in the public school.

We recommend that a resolution be offered: We ask October 15th be set aside as Poetry Day, and therefore be placed on the National Calendar.

Shelley said, "Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world." Poets have helped to preserve historic facts, as well as, provide all races with uplifting lines for guiding their lives.

Poetry will continue, as long as men feel, to give impetus and strength to the lives of coming generations.

May Arkansas poets have your attention in this matter?

Sincerely,

PEGGY VINING,
President,
Poets' Roundtable of Arkansas.

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF STATE
POETRY SOCIETIES, INC.,
HOT SPRINGS, ARK.,
October 29, 1981.

President RONALD REAGAN,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In the name of poetry and poets—past, present and future—I seek recognition of Poetry Day on calendars in our country.

My Hallmark Calendar lists Secretaries Day, April 22; Grandparent's Day, September 13 (all of which should have been honored on Mother's Day or Father's Day); Bosses Day, October 16; Sweetest Day (whatever that is) October 17; and Mother-in-law's Day, October 25 (all of which should have been honored on Mother's Day). Yet Poetry Day, October 15, remains unlisted. Are we so card-and-gift oriented that we must have days designated for commercial purposes only?

October 15 is celebrated in all 50 United States of America and in over 40 foreign countries. October 15 is listed in Almanacs as Poetry Day. Scientific Research has proven beyond a doubt that there was a Poetry Day for centuries. Before 1508, the day was October 5th—then with the change of calendars and the loss of ten days—reckoning brought Poetry Day to October 15. There it remains.

Each year our governors issue Poetry Day Proclamations (as regularly as Thanksgiving Day Proclamations) in their respective states. Schools, Poets and Poetry Organizations across the country observe Poetry Day. Our Senators and Congressmen have been bombarded with letters requesting that Poetry Day be honored on calendars.

Brigit was the Celtic God of Poetry; Pegasus was the classic winged horse of Apollo and the muses; while the Greeks honored Muses, the Goddesses of Arts and Sciences—three of which are Calliope, poetic inspiration and eloquence; Erato, Erotic poetry; and Euterpe, Music and Lyric poetry. We American poets, who have produced and continue to produce world famous poets, request no god or goddess, we request only a special day on the calendar. Will you, please in the name of poetry, in the name of poets such as Longfellow, Frost and Dickinson, in the name of living poets recording the story of our times in concentrated lyrical language, do whatever it takes to get October 15 named as Poetry Day on our calendars?

My father always said, "If you want something done, start at the top." In respect to my farmer-father, I knock at your White House door.

Sincerely,

VERNA LEE HINEGARDNER,
National Chancellor.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 23, 1981.

Miss VERNA LEE HINEGARDNER,
Hot Springs, Ark.

DEAR MISS HINEGARDNER: On behalf of President Reagan, I want to acknowledge your message and to thank you for your suggestion. Traditionally, the President issues proclamations designating periods for special observance only when a Congressional resolution authorizes him to do so. You may, therefore, wish to contract those who represent you in the Congress regarding your idea.

With the President's best wishes,

Sincerely,

ANNE HIGGINS,
Director of Correspondence.

HISTORY OF POETRY DAY AND NATIONAL POETRY DAY COMMITTEE, INC.

It all started in 1936—though it had been a dream all of Tessa Sweazy Webb's life—to find a way to honor poets—and she talked this over with everyone who would listen.

Finally, she was introduced to Ohio Senator Williams and through this contact she was able to get a joint resolution—S.J.R. No. 39—called the Grubbs-Myers-Marshall Resolution introduced and passed in January, 1938, by Ohio's—92nd General Assembly—naming the third Friday of October of each year: Ohio Poetry Day.

The day was to be set aside to honor poets of Ohio! To give special programs and observances in the schools and public places . . . in such manner as prescribed by the superintendent of public instruction.

Other states followed Ohio slowly but no concerted effort was made to make this a national day—or National Poetry Day in all states until Lucia Trent of Texas spearheaded the movement and called this movement the National Poetry Day Committee. (It was not incorporated until Dr. Frances Clark Handler took over the National Directorship and incorporated the name for its protection in 1966.)

Lucia Trent enlisted the aid of Will Strong, in California, who was at that time Vice-President of Poets of the Pacific. An organization that covered ten states in the west and far west.

Instead of the third Friday in October, which was being used by Ohio and still is as well as October 15th for Poetry Day . . . Lucia Trent selected October 15th, for the National Poetry Day to honor Poet Ralph Cheney—who died on that day in 1941. (This was now 1947.)

It is strange to note that both women—Tessa Sweazy Webb in Ohio and Lucia Trent in Texas both selected an October day for Poetry Day. Scientific research has proven without a doubt that there has been a Poetry Day for centuries. Before 1508 the date was October 5th—then with the change of calendars and the loss of ten days—with the new reckoning it brought Poetry Day to October 15th—and that is where it remains until this day. There are some groups for convenience sake who name another day for Poetry Day—and even weeks and months as Poetry weeks and months . . . but the official day remains October 15th—annually!

This day is celebrated in 50 United States of America and 40 Foreign Countries. October 15 is listed in all almanacs as Poetry Day. The National Poetry Day Committee, Inc., is listed on the roster of the Encyclopedia of Associations and is known all over the World.

Since the first Texas proclamation in 1947—issued by the then Governor of that state Beauford Jester—49 other states have come in the fold. 38 States have Legislation naming October 15 Poetry Day and the one state that does not celebrate October 15th does celebrate another day as Poetry Day on its own.

Even though there is legislation in so many states naming October 15th Poetry Day, it is still necessary to get the Governor's Proclamation every year, for like all holidays and days of special note and days that are legal holidays they would be forgotten if the proclamations were not forthcoming—reminding the public that this is indeed Poetry Day and give states an opportunity to eulogize their own poets in these proclamations. Most States have long lists of accredited poets that should not be forgotten.

In 1949—Dr. Etta Josephean Murfey was named national director of the National Poetry Day Committee, Inc., and this position she held until her death April 1, 1966.

All 50 states of the United States have a State chairman and most of them are the same ones who served since National Poetry Day Committee, Inc., has been in existence. A small percentage have resigned due to health or age and when this happens, the Chairmanship is readily filled from a long list of accredited poets waiting in the wings.

Dr. Etta Josephean Murfey had appointed Dr. Frances Clark Handler her Cochairman—first for Florida then later for National (or the United States), enacting the promise from Dr. Handler that when Dr. Etta's time came Dr. Handler would carry on this work—"no matter what the cost!"

Needless to say this work has gone on uninterrupted since Dr. Frances Clark Handler took over the National Director's Chair April 1, 1966. (Passed and approved by Executive Board—entered in Minutes of the Meeting, May 1, 1966.)

National Poetry Day Committee, Inc., was then incorporated as a non-profit organization for the name's protection.

Legislation has been introduced in the 89-90-91-92-93 Congresses by Congressman Claude Pepper and Congressman Dante Fascell of Florida and by Congressman Gonzales of Texas . . . the bills call for a mandatory signing of a Poetry Day proclamation by the President of the United States annually.

There is every indication that this will pass eventually. We all know that war and peace is the first thing on the President's agenda but our President and our Vice-President know all about our aims as did the President and Vice-president before them and many statesmen have placques hanging in their offices that were awarded them from both the National Poetry Day Committee, Inc., and the Florida State Poetry Society, Inc., for their work in the arts.

When the day comes that other pressing matters are resolved then I am sure that the Presidential proclamation for a National Poetry Day will be forthcoming annually.

When the National Poetry Day Committee, Inc., achieves this goal for poets they will have reached a summit never before attained.

Respect and Honor only . . . have come to this Committee's endeavors in all cultural circles and we feel that this will eventually be extended to the Presidential proclamation.

We give thanks to all the dedicated people that are with us in this worthy endeavor and to the Governors who have joined hands with us every year sending us the Poetry Day proclamations from their states, so that this committee can make all the people of the United States culturally and poetically aware.

Respectfuly submitted by:

Dr. FRANCES CLARK HANDLER,
National Director,
National Poetry Day Committee, Inc.

Mr. BUMPERS. Finally, Mr. President, I asked an old and dear friend of mine, Miss Lily Peter, to write a special poem commemorating National Poetry Day. Miss Lily is a lifelong resident of Phillips County, Ark., who has been the poet laureate of Arkansas, and has given generously of her time, talent, and money to music and the arts in Arkansas. I echo Miss Lily's sentiments expressed in "A Day for Poetry" that "Poetry opens windows on the universe that prose can never find," and I ask that this beautiful poem be printed in the RECORD.

A DAY FOR POETRY

Poetry came before prose in the world's history, and the earliest writings of man are in the metres and rhythms of poetry to delight his senses with joy in the world's magic and mystery.
Poetry opens windows on the Universe that prose can never find, and if we spend our days altogether with prose, we shall miss forever the beauty and wisdom the metaphor can rehearse.
We shall miss the music of the inner grace that is poetry's provenance and its breathing-space.
Then is it not well for us to set aside one day in the year's cycle to take pride in the wash and wonder of poetry that can cleave asunder
the tension and trivia of our daily striving, give us a share in the glory of creation, and through this moment of the spirit's adoration bring us refreshment of new joy in living!

—LILY PETER.●

(By request of Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of the Senate joint resolution requesting and authorizing the President to designate October 15, 1982, as "National Poetry Day." Not only do I join my colleagues in the Senate in support of this resolution but I also join with 50 State Governors and 40 foreign nations in recognizing the inestimable contribution poetry has made to the lives of people all over the world. Bob Graham, the Governor of my State of Florida, proclaimed October 15 as "Poetry Day" in Florida. His proclamation illustrates the attention everyone in this country and in countries around the globe should give to this art form. I ask that a copy of the proclamation be printed in the RECORD.

The proclamation is as follows:

PROCLAMATION: STATE OF FLORIDA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, TALLAHASSEE

Whereas the art of poetry is a vital part of our culture; and

Whereas many of our citizens enjoy this form of literature, and many also are talented and write poetry; and

Whereas this form of expression is taught in our schools and used in many special activities in our lives; and

Whereas poetry has been honored as an art and as an important part of our society's culture;

Now, therefore, I, Bob Graham, by virtue of the authority vested in me as Governor of the State of Florida, do hereby proclaim October 15, 1982 as Poetry Day in Florida and urge all citizens to join in saluting the contributions of poetry and poets to our everyday lives and our culture.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, poetry deserves our commendation. Poetry speaks to men, women, and children from all walks of life and from all cultures. Not only does it cross a cultural barrier but it crosses the barrier of history. Today we still read the poetry of the ancient Greeks and Romans; we read the Rubáiyát as well as old and middle English poetry and find they have relevance to our lives. We have all written a poem for school, for ourselves or for others. We write poetry because it draws on the human experience and allows us to understand ourselves as well as others. It is one of the few mediums that lends itself to the easy expression of human emotions and ideas. People have and will continue to express their pain, desires, grief, and happiness through poetry.

Mr. President, I urge President Reagan to proclaim October 15 as "National Poetry Day."●

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 243) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S.J. RES. 243

Whereas the tendency of thinking in our era is decidedly in the direction of analytical techniques; and

Whereas modern civilization, influenced by the control of the physical world made possible by the tremendous advances of science, forgets at times the importance of cultivating an imaginative grasp of human culture, attitudes and feelings through the literary arts; and

Whereas people of all ages have universally turned to poetry as one of the basic ways of understanding experiences, of helping to grasp ideas and events from unexpected angles, and of assisting to express the thoughts and hopes of generations; and

Whereas the timeless themes and great continuities of poetry have become strands of unity in our history, across nations, across religious and political differences, and across centuries; and

Whereas much of American poetry has come to us in the 20th century as a cultural heritage of inestimable value, passed down from our folklore, patriotism, and religions, giving tone and character to the American culture of today; and

Whereas the culture of this generation as conveyed through its poetry will give similar impetus and strength to the lives of coming generations of Americans; and

Whereas many of the States of the Union have adopted and set aside October 15th of every year as "Poetry Day"; and

Whereas in recognition of the contribution of poetry to the cultural development of this nation, it is fitting that a day should be set apart to enjoy and appreciate poetry and to honor poets of the past and present who enrich the lives of all persons: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 15, 1982, be designated as "National Poetry Day" and that the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon Federal, State, and local government agencies, interest groups and organizations, and the people of the United States to observe that day by engaging in appropriate activities and programs, thereby showing their support of poetry.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, is the minority leader agreeable that the resolution stay at the desk for the remainder of this session today for other cosponsors?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, I am.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no further need for my time under the standing order, and I am prepared to yield it now to any Senator or offer it to the minority leader if he wishes.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

ACID PRECIPITATION AND CANADA

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, as the Clean Air Act has moved through the reauthorization process, I have advocated a cautious approach in dealing with the phenomenon of acid precipitation. Others have called for massive control programs—which would cost jobs and increase electric utility rates in my State of West Virginia and the Appalachian, Midwestern, and Southern regions of our country—and which may prove to be totally ineffective. The scientific community has by no means reached a consensus with regard to acid precipitation.

As this debate has intensified over the last 2 years, the Canadian Government has been an active participant—and has urged that controls be placed on coal-burning facilities in the United States as a necessary action to address the perceived threat to Canada's lakes and streams. Our Canadian friends recently had an opportunity to hear from the president of the National Coal Association, Mr. Carl Bagge, on this issue. Mr. Bagge spoke before the Canadian Bar Association's 64th annual meeting on August 30, 1982.

Mr. Bagge's remarks are timely, hard hitting, and deserve attention. I ask unanimous consent that his remarks to the Canadian Bar Association be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACID RAIN—RIGHTS AND REMEDIES: THE AMERICAN COAL INDUSTRY VIEW

(Remarks Prepared by Carl E. Bagge)

Honorable ladies and gentlemen of the Canadian Bench and Bar: It's a special privilege for a member of the American Bar Association to join you at your annual meeting in Toronto. I should like to thank Chairman Poch and the members of the Board of Directors for inviting me to share the dais with so many distinguished Canadian political leaders and lawyers.

Looking over the list of other speakers on this important occasion and considering what they might say, my thoughts drifted back to Daniel.

Let the record show, Mr. Chairman, that I walked into this den of lions of my own free will, and I hope to leave it—as Daniel—in one piece.

I've just returned from a recent successful fishing trip to your magnificent outdoors—lured from Washington by a provincial government advertisement in the U.S. that caught my eye because it was headlined, "Great Lakes."

The ad promised "Water, water everywhere . . . over 400,000 crystal clear lakes . . . unspoiled wilderness . . . natural delights . . ."

Let the record show, Mr. Chairman, that your tourism and acid rain ministers need to get their act together in the U.S.

"Geography has made us neighbors. History has made us friends. Economics has made us partners. And necessity has made us allies."

John Kennedy's words to the Canadian Parliament in 1961 ring true today. For we cannot repeal our unique partnership, our friendship, and our economic kinship.

Rowland Frazee, Chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada, recently put it this way: "We cannot change Canada's close and intricate relationship with our major trading partner, the United States. Our recession and our recovery are tied to theirs . . . In most major ways," he added, "events here depend on events there."

That's why the acid rain issue cannot be separated from economics—from the most far-reaching air quality program proposed in American history. And that's why the effects of this proposal on both our economies is part of my message today.

For it's the recognition of these effects that leads directly to the still unanswered scientific questions so closely tied to the acid rain issue. They are not a "smokescreen" as we hear so often from Ottawa. Scientific understanding—not wishful thinking, not political slogans—is the foundation for sound solutions to both human and environmental problems. And it's answers to these scientific questions that have to steer the acid rain course of our two great nations.

There are at least three plausible explanations of acid rain.

One, the "local-source" theory, holds that emissions don't regularly travel long distances before falling as dry particles or wet precipitation. Instead, acid rainfall is caused principally by sulfur and nitrogen oxides from local sources.

Also, many scientists believe that these pollutants serve as raw materials, which are converted into acid compounds by other oxidizing chemicals. Under this "catalytic theory," it's not the amount of sulfur and nitrogen oxides in the atmosphere, but the oxidants which make possible the acid content of rainfall.

Two weeks ago, the Battelle Institute announced that its scientists believe a vital chemical link to acid rain has been found—a catalyst that's common in urban smog. Battelle says that this potential breakthrough opens up an entirely new area of research.

Yet, it's the "coal plant-long transport" theory which is touted as the single cause. It's accepted by some politicians on both sides of the border, and often reported as fact by the media in Canada and the United States.

As this theory goes, acid rain is caused when sulfur dioxide from Midwestern coal-fired plants mixes with nitrogen oxides. These effluents are sent on the winds hundreds of miles where they fall as acid rain on parts of the Northeastern United States and Canada. Emissions from coal plants allegedly are directly involved in lake acidification and fish kills, harming vegetation, and linked to some human health and problems.

Three theories, three possible answers, but we believe the jury is still out. I ask you to consider some of the reasons:

Scientists haven't found any sound evidence of acid rain damage to vegetation in the natural environment, and no direct link between acid rain and human health problems has been confirmed. Clearly, the most important scientific question at issue is whether there's a direct cause and effect relationship among sulfur dioxide from coal plants, acid rain, and ecosystem damage.

The recent National Academy of Sciences study, called Atmosphere-Biosphere Interactions, is the most widely-quoted in support of this theory—basing its findings on "overwhelming circumstantial evidence."

One reason is the statement found on page 182: "Acid rain, due to further oxidation of sulfur and nitrogen oxides . . . from anthropogenic (man-made) sources," the author wrote, . . . "is causing widespread damage to ecosystems . . ." But here's what the same author wrote on page 142: ". . . direct cause and effect linkages between sources of acids and effects on ecosystems will not be possible for the foreseeable future."

Not even the most skillful form of press agentry can reconcile internal conflicts like these. Based on the second statement, it's impossible to draw a direct cause and effect relationship beween coal plants and acid rain.

The mystery doesn't end there. Central to the "long-transport" theory is the hypothesis that effluents are travelling hundreds of miles where they are falling as acid rain in Canada and the United States.

But as it turns out, American and Canadian scientists can track emissions from a particular source only about 30 miles, not hundreds of miles. Since this is so, scientists from both nations are using computer models to help track effluents much longer distances.

The problem is, there's insufficient long-term rainfall monitoring data of reliable quality. What's more, scientists are having difficulty modeling the complexities of atmospheric phenomena, which are known to affect effluent movements. This means that the statements pinpointing how much acid rain is coming from the United States, and how much pollution is of local or distant origin, are purely hypothetical and theoretical.

Last year, in a Los Angeles Times story, an official of the Ontario Ministry of Environment admitted that computer modeling is only a "useful guideline" to help find out what's happening in the atmosphere over one year. Computer guidelines are useful. But they aren't a scientifically-proved method. And there's no justification for using these guidelines, however useful, as the basis for a multi-billion dollar regulatory program, regardless of what you've been led to believe.

One acid rain theory—as you'll recall—holds that local sources are possibly to blame for acid rain. But acid rain theorists on both sides of the border seem to get an advanced case of myopia when local sources are suggested as a possible cause of lake acidification. A case in point in the INCO smelter.

The INCO smelter is the world's largest. It's sending nearly one million tons of sulfur dioxide into the air each year from a "superstack" taller than the Sears Tower. That's one to three percent of all sulfur dioxide in the Western Hemisphere.

Yet, we read and hear that thousands of Canadian lakes are increasingly "sensitive" to acid rain from the United States. Press reports claim that by century's end 50,000 lakes "may" be dead.

Let's look at what's actually happening, rather than what might happen. A "sensitive" lake isn't an affected lake. The Canadian lakes so far identified as dead are a tiny fraction of the half-million lakes, in this vast country. What's more, many of these dead lakes are found in the Sudbury area-the INCO smelter's backyard.

Canadians aren't the only ones who are looking past local pollution sources. The same myopia persists among "long-transport" theorists in the United States. The acid rain bill reported out of the Senate Environment Committee, for example, essentially ignores sulfur dioxide from oil burning plants, and for all intents and purposes controls only coal-burning plants in 31 states on or east of the Mississippi River.

Kentucky and New York have roughly the same overall sulfur dioxide emissions. Yet, Kentucky—a large coal-burning state—would have to cut its emissions four times as much as New York—an oil-burning state.

The American coal industry isn't making light of acid rain. Acidified lakes are real, not imagined. And we are keenly aware of the economic implications of damage to Canada's environment. But inflammatory rhetoiric can't replace unvarnished facts. Above all, let's get our facts straight.

There's no doubt that a large percentage of sulfur dioxide in the United States is produced from man-made sources. But if the "coal plant-long-distance transport" theory is to hold water, as sulfur dioxide levels go down, so should acid rain.

Yet, scientists aren't even sure if acid rain is increasing or decreasing. In the longest-running survey of rainfall in the United States, the United States Geological Survey found virtually no change in rainfall acidity in New York State over 13 years beginning in 1965. This is significant, because New York is one of the most often-mentioned targets of acid rain damage.

Also, EPA is reporting a 40 percent drop in sulfur dioxide concentrations over the past ten years, and a 15 percent drop in sulfur dioxide emissions in the Ohio river Basin—the alleged source of Canada's acid rain.

These cuts are all the more impressive, for as sulfur dioxide levels were falling, electric generation in the United States was rising from 888 billion kilowatt-hours to 1.4 trillion kilowatthours—a 56 percent jump. During that same time, coal burning by America's electric utilities shot up 65 percent.

In light of these trends, we are dismayed at Ottawa's charge that the United States isn't doing its fair share to curb air pollution. Over the past ten years, American industry—and ultimatley consumers—spent nearly $160 billion on air pollution control. We are doing an outstanding job removing pollutants from our plants and our automobiles.

This doesn't imply that the coal industry has supported every tenet of America's clean air laws, any more than the Canadian Provinces welcome every pronouncement by the Ottawa Government.

It means that American people are paying willingly but dearly for clean air—some $14 billion each year to keep the Clean Air Act in force. And it's simply wrong-headed for Ottawa to suggest that our industry and our government are "footdragging" on cleaning the air, or that our government's actions aren't reflecting the wishes of the American public.

We find these allegations even harder to take, given the Ottawa Government's continued heralding of its pollution-control efforts. Again, let's look at the record.

One good example are pollution controls at the INCO smelter. These controls are offered by Canada's environment Minister, John Roberts, and others as evidence of Canada's good faith to meet its obligations on what's called a "two way street."

In a recent interview, Mr. Roberts said that the smelter's emissions have been cut from 3,500 tons per day to 2,500 tons. "This is a significant step," he said. I agree, but how were these reductions made? Mr. Roberts gave the answer: "It was done successfully at the sacrifice of potential production at the world's largest smelter."

Isn't this a perverse kind of progress? I doubt the Canadian people—particularly in the Sudbury area where unemployment is reported at 40 percent—relish more pollution controls at the expense of this nation's already-flagging industrial performance.

The coal industry and the American people will never support clean air progress through economic stagnation. We aren't "backing away" from clean air goals. But we are also supporting greater economic growth—more jobs, and better paychecks for the working people of our country. And it's this tandem goal that's at the heart of our efforts to streamline the Clean Air Act.

And, we should remember that the United States Clean Air Act is still the world's most effective. Unlike Canada, our federally-mandated clean air laws are enforced vigorously with civil penalties and the cutoff of federal funds.

Just as important, the Clean Air Act continues to benefit both our countries. New Source Performance Standards are in force. So, as new coal plants go into service, replacing older, less efficient ones, the air will get progressively cleaner—even in the face of quickened economic growth.

On the other hand, the proponents of tighter sulfur dioxide controls got a lot of mileage out of Ontario Hydro's decision to build two scrubbers. According to press reports, an Ontario Hydro official said the building of scrubbers would likely have a "multiplier effect." In short, if Ontario Hydro "bit the bullet," perhaps utilities in the United States would jump on the bandwagon.

I'm not sure what the gentleman means. For there are already 87 scrubbers in the United States at a cost of $4 billion, plus an annual cost of $1.7 billion to keep them operating. Thirty-five more scrubbers are under construction. And EPA is reporting that half of all America's coal-burning units will be outfitted with scrubbers in less than 20 years. Canada, I am quick to add, has yet to build a single utility scrubber.

I've also heard talk that Ottawa's much touted acid rain program is a ploy to increase electric power exports to the United States, which last year brought in several million dollars.

Mr. George Rejohn of the Canadian Embassy in Washington recently said, "Such silly inventions and distortions do not merit serious nor thoughtful attention."

I agree. We don't accept these conspiracy theories. But can you blame people for wondering, when Ontario Hydro cancels its first two scrubbers, and admits the decision came after the loss of potential power sales to General Public Utilities?

When you step back and take a long, hard look at all the evidence, it comes down to this: The causes and effects of acid rain are unknown. America has the best clean air record in the world. We've spent billions of dollars on clean air, and billions more are committed. Yet, despite all this—despite the sacrifices—the acid rain theorists, including the Ottawa Government, say it's not enough.

We are asked to embrace the potentially most burdensome regulatory program in American history, and are expected to have guilt feelings if we resist.

Mr. Roberts summed up the Canadian Government's view this way: American calls for more acid rain research are like saying: "We need to know which mosquitoes are carrying malaria before we clean up the swamp."

I would only remind the honorable gentleman of Lord George's famous warning. He said: "It is very dangerous to leap a chasm in two bounds."

Can the coal industry—and the American people—possibly look past the chasm of scientific doubt and make a leap of faith to accept what in reality is a 12-million ton cut in sulfur dioxide over the next 12 years? How can we when the Department of Energy is predicting costs to industry and consumers of as much as $300 billion—over and above the present Clean Air Act—in the next 30 years? Shouldn't we be angry when electric rates in some parts of the United States are expected to rise 100 percent, placing an awesome burden on consumers, who already are strapped by the high cost-of-living?

Why shouldn't we fight this legislation? According to the United Mine Workers of America, the jobs of 89,000 mining industry employees and 225,000 jobs in related industries would be affected. Total income loss would be $6.6 billion per year. These job losses would hit in Northern Appalachia and the Midwest areas where unemployment is at 10 percent or more.

The coal industry will stand fast in opposition to this bill and let me make the reason crystal clear: Even with the billions of dollars spent, the jobs lost, and the crushing effects on our economy, there's not the slightest assurance that the acidity of rain will be affected.

Yet, when the coal industry and the U.S. Government through its State Department point to the lack of acid rain evidence, the enormous costs and job losses, we are accused by your acid rain Minister in Ottawa of engaging in "informational haze." What's more, the Ottawa Government is expressing "outrage" at our attitude, and predicts a worsening of relations between our two countries unless we come to our senses. Frankly, I believe the "outrage" is misplaced, and it's not just the weakness of the case for acid rain controls.

Your Government is openly proud of the millions of dollars spent in lobbying our Congress to enact acid rain controls. The Ottawa Government apparently believes that these tactics are successful. For after the acid rain bill was reported out of the Senate Public Works and Environment Committee, it was followed by speeches in the Canadian Parliament calling the action a "great breakthrough."

But let's not let our wishes become the father of our thoughts. As reasonable men and women, do you actually believe that a majority of Congressmen and Senators from the 31 affected states will support a bill that imposes such massive electric rate increases on their consumers with no assurance of benefit?

Is there likely to be much support for a bill that would have such devastating human dimensions, and such crucial implications for the revitalization of America's industrial and commercial heartland?

Acid rain is based on the theory of gravitation—that what goes up must come down. But don't forget Newton's Law, which says: For every action there's an equal and opposite reaction. And we are reacting.

Calling to mind what Rowland Frazee said about the close and intricate relationship of our two economies; let there be no doubt; If this legislation becomes a part of the Clean Air Act, the higher energy costs, the job losses and severe overall economic effects will also affect this side of the border.

What's more, if this bill is part of the Clean Air Act, the chances are good that there will be no change in the law. This means, very frankly, that the efforts to streamline this Act—while preserving both economic growth and clean air goals—will be lost, also to the detriment of both our nations.

There is a reasonable course, and I urge you to consider it. The American coal industry believes deeply that acid rain research must be accelerated, and we are in good company.

Two weeks ago, a federal task force set up under the Acid Preciptation Act of 1980, called for more research to fill the "major gaps" of information about the causes and effects of acid rain.

Several bills are pending in Congress which would build a strong acid rain research foundation.

One bill of considerable merit, which would step up research, is sponsored by Senator Robert C. Byrd, the Senate Democratic Leader. In the House of Representatives a similar legislative approach is sponsored by Congressman Edward Madigan. His bill was approved by the House Energy and Commerce Committee by an overwhelming 27-5 margin. And, I might add, it is the only acid rain legislation approved by the House.

These bills call for more acid rain research beyond the three-year $64-million commitment of the Reagan Administration, and would augment the $32 million already spent or earmarked by the American Utility Industry.

A key element of the House bill is to restore existing acidified lakes with liming, and other methods known to be effective.

Acid rain may well be a serious problem for our two countries. But we must be certain that the cures that are prescribed actually works, that it doesn't have the side-effects of greater economic adversity and a worsening of relations between our two great nations.

How can we allow the acid rain issue to undermine the trust and cooperation between Canada and the United States, which has flourished for nearly 200 years? I urge the thoughtful members of the Canadian bench and bar through this organization to send a message to your public officials. Good common sense must replace strident rhetoric.

I'm no diplomat. But it doesn't take a statesman to see the need for voices to be lowered, and for thoughtful consideration to begin. We need to get this issue out of politics and public relations and into the laboratory where it belongs!

Let me close with these thoughts.

Churchill once said, "The farther backward you can look, the farther forward you can see." His admonition applies to the United States of America.

For many years, our domestic policy was fueled with a spirit of action, despite the financial costs. We sent men to the moon and brought them safely back to earth. We opened our hearts and our treasury to help create a better life for millions of our people. And we are still waging a war to protect the health and safety of our citizens, and to preserve a legacy of environmental quality.

We've had a large measure of success, but we've also learned some lessons from experience. For far more could have been accomplished, at far less cost, if we had tempered our burning desire to act with a proper understanding of what we were trying to get done.

Armed with the lessons of history, we are optimistic about the future—about finding solutions to both our human and environmental problems—and with good reason.

America has no lack of scientific genius. We have some of the worlds's best minds. America doesn't lack political will. Our record in building one of the greatest societies on earth is beyond question. And we suffer from no lack of spirit. The flame of desire to forge a better life for our children and grandchildren still burns brightly.

Yet, the acid rain debate brings into sharper focus an overriding challenge facing America. We must find a way to face the future with a relatively diminishing amount of financial resources. Like it or not, these hard choices must be made in the years to come.

This doesn't imply that the United States is ready to set aside any of its national goals. Far from it. But it means that we must meet all our goals with the resources at our command without sacrificing any one of them.

Clean air is one of America's goals. But it isn't the only one. We must also produce more energy at reasonable cost-energy needed to build economic growth and development which serves all our people. We can do it only by tackling our many goals in an efficient, and a cost-effective way, and with a full understanding that greater use of coal is essential to our success.

That's why our government—and your government—must understand the full dimensions of acid rain, before creating more bureaucracy, more costs, and an uncertain economic future for our people.

But it isn't just economic uncertainty that's at stake for our two nations. For I remind you again of what John Kennedy said to the Canadian Parliament nearly two decades ago: "Geography has made us neighbors. History has made us friends. Economics has made us partners. And necessity has made us allies."

Then the President added this thought: "What nature hath so joined, let no man put asunder."

I hope, and I pray God we don't forget it.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin such time as he may require, from the time under my control.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the minority leader.

WHO IS AHEAD?

I

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the President of the United States, in an unprecedented and controversial statement, has concluded that the Soviet Union is strategically superior to the United States. Since making that sweeping observation, however, other top officials of the administration have begun to chip away at the real meaning of that quote. The Secretary of Defense has said that we have superiority in some areas while the Soviets excel in others.

Gen. John Vessey has said in response to the question from Senator LEVIN—

Would you swap U.S. military capability overall . . . for that of the Soviets? That he would "take some of the things that the Soviets have for their forces in terms of numbers and give them to our forces, but overall would you trade with Marshall Ogarkov? Not on your life. . . ."

Secretary Weinberger has said:

I would not for a moment exchange anything, because we have an immense edge in technology.

So where does that leave the statement of the President? Was he simply in error? Did he overstate his case by drawing a simplistic conclusion? Or does he sincerely believe that the Russians have strategic superiority over the United States.

Beginning today, Mr. President, and continuing for 3 days, I will introduce material in the RECORD from the Center for Defense Information which deals with this question of "Who Is Ahead" in the race for nuclear superiority.

The first excerpt from the Defense Monitor, a publication of the Center for Defense Information, will concentrate on strategic comparisons. The second will look at NATO and Warsaw Pact comparisons, while the third will examine other elements of competition, such as weapons exports, political and economic influence, and trends for the future.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that part I of the Defense Monitor be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Defense Monitor]

U.S.-SOVIET MILITARY FACTS

TOTAL NUCLEAR WEAPONS

The United States can explode over 12,000 nuclear weapons on the Soviet Union; the Soviets can explode almost 8,000 nuclear weapons on the United States.

Of the over 12,000 U.S. nuclear weapons capable of striking the Soviet Union, over 2,600 are on F-111's, F-4's, A-6's, A-7's and other "tactical" aircraft which could fly to the Soviet Union from Europe, Asia, or from aircraft carriers; over 9,500 are "strategic" nuclear weapons.

Of the Soviets' 8,000, almost 150 are on Backfire bombers, which can only hit the U.S. if they fly at airliner speeds, on one-way missions. The remaining 7,800 are "strategic" nuclear weapons.

Of the more than 9,500 U.S. "strategic" nuclear weapons, half are on submarines which are invulnerable, hidden beneath the ocean. Four hundred more strategic weapons will be added in 1982, bringing the total to over 9,900 U.S. strategic nuclear weapons.

In addition to strategic nuclear weapons capable of hitting each other's homelands, both the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. have thousands of "tactical" nuclear weapons for use against ship convoys, tank formations, and other targets. As a general estimate, the U.S. and its allies have a total of about 31,000 nuclear weapons and the Soviets have about 20,000. (About 26,000 U.S. nuclear weapons are in the active inventory and 4,000 more in inactive storage.)

Soviet strategic nuclear weapons carry about 8,000 megatons of explosive power compared to 4,000 for the U.S. As the Soviets begin to catch up with the U.S. in producing smaller, more accurate and efficient weapons, they, too, are reducing their megatonnage.

LAND-BASED MISSILES

The number of Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs) is declining. They have 1,398 now whereas seven years ago they had 1,600.

The Soviets have larger missiles, with greater throw weight than U.S. missiles.

U.S. weapons are smaller because they have miniaturized, computerized guidance packages, more efficient rocket engines, thinner but more effective heat shields, greater accuracy, and more compact, efficient hydrogen weapons.

Ninety-five percent of Soviet missiles are old-fashioned, liquid-propelled ICBMs; they carry large nuclear weapons to compensate for inaccuracy.

Soviet ICBMs are less reliable and less accurate than U.S. ICBMs.

The Soviets are shifting gradually to more modern ICBMs, with smaller yield warheads—following the U.S. lead.

The U.S. has maintained a level of 1,054 ICBMs but has modernized the missiles by introducing new types from Minuteman (MM) I to MM II to MM III and added 1,100 weapons by MIRVing the Minuteman III.

The U.S. has completed hardening of Minuteman silos and installation of an improved guidance system which doubles accuracy.

The U.S. has MIRVed 550 of its 1,000 MM ICBMs and will soon complete retrofitting 300 of these (900 nuclear weapons) with the MK12A warhead, doubling each weapon's explosive power and increasing lethality.

The U.S. will soon replace 50 MM IIs with MIRVed MM IIIs, adding a net increase of 100 highly accurate weapons to the total ICBM force.

U.S. solid fuel-propelled MM ICBMs can be launched against the Soviet Union well within the 30 minute time of flight of Soviet missiles. Therefore, Soviet ICBMs launched against U.S. ICBMs might find only empty holes on arrival in the U.S. ICBMs constantly maintain a 98% alert rate. It is believed that the alert rate of Soviet ICBMs is much lower.

It will soon be possible to launch U.S. ICBMs by airborne command posts should ground command centers be destroyed.

STRATEGIC BOMBERS

The Soviet strategic bomber force of 145 planes still includes 100 old, slow, propeller aircraft.

All 376 operational U.S. strategic bombers are modern high speed jet aircraft. The U.S. also has over 40 long-range bombers in active reserve, and over 200 in storage.

Over 100 U.S. bombers would be airborne prior to Soviet missile attack against the U.S.

In addition to strategic bombers, the U.S. has over 400 strike aircraft which are equipped with nuclear weapons aboard its aircraft carriers.

The U.S. will add 4,350 nuclear-tipped air-launched cruise missiles over the next several years to enhance the capability of its strategic bomber forces.

One of the greatest advantages the U.S. has over the Soviet Union is its air refueling capability. The U.S. has over 600 KC-135 tankers to extend the range of its long-range bombers and other aircraft. The Soviets have 30 long-range tankers.

The U.S. will soon add to its strategic mobility and air refueling capacity by buying new KC-10 tankers and re-engining 300 KC-135s.

STRATEGIC SUBMARINES

The 62 Soviet ballistic missile submarines carry 950 nuclear missiles (almost 2,000 nuclear weapons) for war against the U.S., Western Europe and China.

The Soviets maintain day and night about 300 nuclear weapons at sea targeted against the U.S.

The Soviets maintain a much smaller percentage of their strategic subs at sea than the U.S.

The U.S. maintains at least 55 percent of its 32 ballistic missile subs at sea at all times (18–20 subs). This will soon be increased.

The U.S. keeps 3,000 nuclear weapons in position to attack targets in the Soviet Union at all times.

U.S. subs could wage a protracted nuclear attack on Russia for over 3 months.

"Just one of our relatively invulnerable Poseidon submarines—less than 2 percent of our total nuclear force submarines, aircraft, and land-based missiles—carries enough warheads to destroy every large and medium-sized city in the Soviet Union. Our deterrent is overwhelming."—President Jimmy Carter, January 23, 1979.

The U.S. will soon complete the retrofitting of Trident I missiles on 12 of 31 Poseidon subs. The weapons on these new missiles have 60 percent longer range, are 2½ times more powerful, and are more accurate than the weapons on the Poseidon missiles they are replacing. The number of weapons on our 304 remaining Poseidon missiles is being selectively increased.

Trident I missiles to go on 12 Poseidon and 9 Trident subs will provide 3,000 new nuclear weapons for our strategic arsenal in the 1980's.

Each Trident submarine, the first of which will go on active patrol in October 1982, can carry enough weapons to target every Soviet city of over 100,000 people. The President's five-year plan calls for 15 Trident subs; the Navy wants 20–26.

A LESSON ON GENOCIDE FROM ANCIENT GREECE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Athenian Senate was a predecessor of the U.S. Senate. Consider how they confronted a small ancient city-state called Mitylene. In 427 B.C., the people of Mitylene broke its alliance with Athens and joined the Peloponnesians in their war against the Athenian empire. For the Mitylenians the war was a short one since it only took a few months for the Athenian navy to successfully lay seige to Lesbos and occupy their city. The Athenian Senate then began debate on the fate of their treacherous former allies. The vast majority of the Athenian Senate, led by the demogog Cleon, was filled with anger and resentment at what they saw as Mitylene's unprovoked hostility and their unspeakable crime of associating with the Peloponnesian fleet during their insurrection. In this heated atmosphere of hurt and vengeance, the Athenian Senate sentenced every man, woman, and child of Mitylene to death.

It was not long after the boat carrying the execution order had been dispatched when some of the Athenian legislators began to reflect on the genocidal sentence they had issued and the next day a faction in the Senate, led by the famous orator Diodotus, was able to win a reversal of the original decision. Thus, a second boat was sent with the reprieve which, according to legend, arrived just as the Athenian field commander was about to put the populace to the sword.

Mr. President, the Mitylene story is notable not in the actual physical carnage or political callousness involved—there are, unfortunately, far greater examples of these in contemporary politics—but in the realization that even a nation with the philosophical and ethical foundations of Athens, when put under the right amount of stress, can experience sporadic outbursts of wanton, purposeless violence.

This was not a fanatical regime led by pathological tyrants but a nation similiar to our own; populated by such great men as Socrates, Plato, and Thucydides. Nor was the Mitylene decision preceded by dramatic Nuremburg parades or enormous show trials that would have prepared civilization for the coming slaughter. The Mitylene debacle teaches us that the environment needed for acceptance of the mass extermination of a people can be created in a relatively short period of time and within the most seemingly civilized of nations. The question we must ask ourselves is whether our Nation has led the fight against genocidal murder and worked with fellow nations to avoid future "close calls" like that of Mitylene. I wish I could answer this question with an unqualified yes, but this would be dishonest. While it was largely due to our influence that the Genocide Convention was initially written and passed in the General Assembly in 1948, the United States today stands essentially alone in its rejection of the Genocide Convention by failing to ratify it.

In 427 B.C. the Athenians came face to face with the horrific dimensions of genocide. They discovered that no great legislative body can afford the luxury of anger unchecked by reason and justice untempered by mercy. The decision for the genocidal slaughter of their neighbors was a comparatively easy, almost self-perpetuating, one and had it not been for the voices of a few courageous Athenian leaders, the culture and history of Mitylene would have been entirely eradicated. We, like Diodotus, must be ever vigilant in watching for the early signs of genocidal crimes. Through ratification of the Genocide Convention, we can lead the world in preventing these terrible deeds which blot the pages of history.

HOW DOBOY HELPED NEW RICHMOND, WIS., AND THEIR EMPLOYEES AT THE SAME TIME

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senate the initiative of a Wisconsin firm that resulted in a compassionate boost for their labor force and a fine contribution to their community.

New Richmond, Wis., is a town of about 4,300 people in western Wisconsin near the Minnesota border. The Doboy Packaging Machinery Co. was faced this spring with a dropoff in their business and the necessity of laying off some of their employees.

Recently, the Wall Street Journal carried a short item about how Doboy helped both their employees and their city. It is a fine example of a company's thoughtfulness and generosity at work. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMUNITY SERVICE: ONE COMPANY EASES OUT LAID-OFF WORKERS SLOWLY

Doboy Packaging Machinery Co., New Richmond, Wis., didn't want to abruptly lay off 25 workers when it cut its payroll last spring. So it paid workers an entry-level wage for three months while they did community service jobs. They worked 35 hours weekly on projects at hospitals and schools that needed maintenance work but couldn't afford it. The company didn't save much money, but it did help ease the workers transition to joblessness.

At Holy Family Hospital, five Doboy workers did painting, plastering, built a roof and installed a helicopter pad, "things we never would have done this year," says a hospital official. The labor was worth about $5,000. The company also gave the workers time off for job search and provided some outplacement training.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BAKER. I yield back the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR MATHIAS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). Under the previous order, the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

CONGRESSIONAL MASS MAILINGS

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, when Woodrow Wilson wrote his now famous work, "Congressional Government," 98 years ago, he said:

> The informing function of Congress should preferred even to its legislative function. Unless (Congress informs) the country must remain in embarrassing, crippling ignorance of the very affairs which it is most important that it should understand and direct.

I think that this observation of Woodrow Wilson expresses in a practical way the fundamental philosophical point which James Madison made more than two centuries ago:

> A popular government, without popular information, or the means of acquiring it, is but a prologue to a farce or a tragedy, or perhaps both. Knowledge will forever govern ignorance; and a people who mean to be their own governors must arm themselves with the power which knowledge gives.

Clearly, a well-informed citizenry is the bedrock of a democracy, and for this reason I have always advocated improving the ways in which Senators and Representatives communicate with and inform their constituents.

I have consistently supported using modern communications technology, such as television, to enable Congress to be more effective in carrying out its informing function. Today, however, instead of addressing new and improved methods of communication, it is my duty to call the attention of Senators to a serious communications problem.

I am glad to see the Senator from Wisconsin in the Chamber, because he has an outstanding interest in economy in Government and economy in Congress.

The problem to which I refer is the mounting costs of Senators' mass mailings. Because Senators have the privilege of mailing with the frank, we are not as aware of the costs of what we mail as we would be if we had to buy stamps and lick them and stick them on one by one, on each letter. But because we are not aware of our postage costs does not mean that there are none. Mail is not free. It is very expensive.

In fact, the Postal Service recently estimated that the postage costs for Congress as a whole will be $102 million this year. It will be $102 million, I say to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Senators' mass mailings—not those individual letters in which they respond to questions from constituents, not those letters that are directed to finding out information that a Senator may need to have, but the mass mailings, the self-generated mailings—account for approximately $31 million of that total, almost one-third of the total congressional postal bill.

At current rates, Senators will send out 245 million pieces of mass mailings in 1982. About three-fourths will be what we call newsletters. The other mass mailings are small group mailings, press releases, and town meeting announcements.

What I want to make clear is that we are not talking about answering those millions of letters to which I referred; answers to questions or requests which our constituents send us every year. At current rates, our mail response to the incoming mail, responding to our constituents, which we have a duty to do, will total this year about 11 million pieces. But the mass mailings, those things we generate ourselves, with our pictures in them, our names prominently displayed, will total 245 million pieces of mail this year—11 million in which we are responding to constituents; 245 million that we are casting out to the winds.

That, Mr. President, is in a country, I point out, that has only 83 million mailboxes.

This figure reflects an alarming rate of growth. This year's total is 73 percent higher than last year's. How is that for inflation? Seventy percent more this year than last year. Last year was 20 percent higher than 1980. The 1980 total was 27 percent higher than the 1979 total. In 1979, Senators were sending out 93 million mass mailings, and now, just 3 years later, we are sending 2½ times that many. Theoretically, mass mailings are limited by the paper allotment, but, obviously, the paper allotment is a limitation that does not work.

Mass mailings are expensive. I have already mentioned the postage cost for 1982, which is estimated to be $31 million. While that is the largest single cost, it is by no means the total cost. Paper, printing, and mailing lists add another $6 million, for a total of $37 million. Approximately 70 employees of the Sergeant at Arms are involved in supporting this activity. And that still does not include the cost of staff in Senators' offices who write material and update the mailing lists.

While I am on the subject I should mention one element of cost that is especially disturbing: mass mailings, chiefly newsletters, that are undeliverable. A significant percentage of every mailing is returned because the addressee has moved or because the address is simply incorrect. Such returns are a significant expense, approximately $2.5 million this year alone.

The volume of the returns—the rejected, the undelivered mail—is now so heavy that many offices are unable to keep up with removing the incorrect addresses from their mail files. Consequently, some undeliverable newsletters are repeatedly sent to the same addresses.

Mr. President, compared to some costs of government, $31 million might not sound like very much. But, to paraphrase the distinguished majority leader's father-in-law, the late Everett McKinley Dirksen: "A million here. A million there. And pretty soon you're talking about real money." So let me compare that $31 million to some other things that we have been discussing in this Chamber recently.

A few days ago, there was a great deal of weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth over the cost of the Hart Building. What an extravagance the Hart Building was! What a terrible thing to think that it might have a gym or a restaurant in it! What an extravagance! Well, at the current rate, we could build a new Hart Building, with a gym, with a restaurant, every 4 years, with the money we spend on Senators' mass mailings alone. I doubt that there would be much question of which would have the more enduring value.

As a second comparison, we are spending almost as much on mass mailings as we are on the entire Senate committee system.

This is an election period. We are all in touch with our constituents, and our constituents are in touch with us. I raise this question now because I think it is useful to get a sense of whether the country thinks this mass mailing makes good sense.

Compare it with the committee system, because it costs just about as much. All the work that is done by congressional committees is comparable in its cost to the country to the mass mailings emitted on a daily basis from Capitol Hill.

A third comparison would be the one-time installation cost to televise Senate floor proceedings, which would be one-tenth of the annual cost of mass mailing. The annual operating cost of television would be about 1 percent of the cost of mass mailing.

Just think of it, Mr. President. Think of it in long-range terms. We could televise the proceedings of the U.S. Senate for the next 100 years, for a century, with the money that we spend in a single year for Senators' mass mailings.

Of course, there are a lot of differences among Senators in their use of mass mailings. Some send hardly any; some send information notices on specific issues, press releases, and town meeting notices, but no newsletters; and some other inundate their constitutents with newsletters. Last year, more than half of the Senators sent fewer pieces of mass mail than there are mailboxes in their States, but some Senators sent more than one piece per mailbox. Some sent a lot more and in such cases the high volumes are usually newsletters.

For example, last year, the combined mailings of both Senators from one State amounted to more than 12 pieces per mailbox. That was the leader. Another State with 1.7 million mailboxes received over 6 million pieces of mass mail last year from only one Senator. One Senator has four times as many names on his mailing list as there are mailboxes in his State.

If those figures are not impressive enough for you, just consider the volume involved. Last year one Senator sent 13 million pieces of mass mail, while in the first 6 months of this year alone, another Senator had already sent 8 million. Just to keep up with the demand for printing, the Senate recently had to buy another press which, all by itself, can print over 3 million newsletters a week. And the truly disturbing thing about these fantastic volumes is that the majority of Senators now annually send fewer than one piece of mass mail per mailbox. If these Senators were to become high-volume senders, the overall volume would really skyrocket.

As chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, I receive letters from all over the country about Senators' newsletters. One man sent me six copies he received of a single newsletter. One copy was addressed to his wife, and five were addressed to him, each to a different spelling of his last name.

I cannot even get away from this problem when I go home. Not long ago, a neighbor of mine complained to me about receiving newsletters from a Senator in a different and somewhat remote State, a Senator to whom he had not written and with whom he had not communicated in any way. He wanted an explanation. Constituents know newsletters are not free, and they suspect the truth, that they are in fact, very expensive. They also know who foots the bill, and they no doubt wonder what the cost must be if very many Senators are sending unsolicited mass mailings to people outside their States. I have no explanation to give them other than to say that no Senate rule is being violated, no law is being violated. But they must wonder further, and I wonder myself, whether or not we need some new rules in this area.

I think this is a good time to ask the whole Senate the question.

Mr. President, I raise this issue now in anticipation of holding hearings in the Committee on Rules and Administration on this problem. I urge all my colleagues to reflect on this problem and consider ways we might improve our effectiveness in communicating with our constituents while at the same time reducing costs. In the meantime, I urge all my colleagues to keep a close watch on their mass mailings and to remember that every mailing of 1 million newsletters costs the American taxpayers $150,000.

Mr. President, the dramatic nature of the increase in mass mail volume is illustrated by a chart that I have in my hand, which shows the steep rise in the growth of mass mailings, and by a graph, which shows the volume of newsletters as a percentage of all Senate mail in the years 1981 and 1982. If it is technologically possible for the Government Printing Office to do so, I ask unanimous consent that these graphs be printed as part of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

Let me withhold that and yield to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, I commend him for his statement. I did not hear all of it, but I shall read all of it in the RECORD tomorrow. As the Senator knows, I have addressed this newsletter matter on occasion in the Senate. On one occasion, I recall offering an amendment to require Senators to state the number of copies of a newsletter that they were mailing and also the estimated cost.

Mr. President, I recall stopping by the Senate printshop, which is adjacent to the parking area, shortly after I came to the Senate. I went in and I saw several high-speed offset presses going lickety-split. One of the employees of the printshop was happily showing me the latest technology. I recall that a newsletter from a very prominent Senator was rolling off one of those presses. I asked, "How many copies of that newsletter will you print?"

He said, "950,000."

Then I inquired of the GAO as to the estimated cost per newsletter. The estimate that I got back at that time, assuming first-class postage, was about 26 or 27 cents per copy. That led me to offer the amendments that I did offer, which were defeated by the Senate.

I thank the Senator for looking into this, because in this time of great strain on the Government's finances, I think we owe it to the taxpayers to take a look at it. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from North Carolina for his comments. He is a member of the Committee on Rules and Administration. I hope that when we hold this hearing, it will be possible for him to attend and participate.

Mr. HELMS. I shall be there and I shall participate.

Mr. MATHIAS. This is an example of where we are going around making various petty economies as we are trying to stop the leaking spigot and we are letting it run out at the bung. It is a case of a major expenditure. When you think that you could build a Hart Building every 4 years with what is being spent on Senators' mass mailing, it would give you some concept of how much money is indeed being utilized in an activity that needs to be analyzed in terms of its public benefit in improving the public knowledge.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the Senator's time has expired.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for routine morning business to last not past 1 p.m., during which Senators may speak for 5 minutes each.

AGRICULTURE SECRETARY JOHN BLOCK

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, not until this past week did I see a story published by the Washington Post more than 2 months ago—on July 5, to be exact. Congress was in recess at the time and I was in North Carolina. Thus, I was not aware of the newspaper piece about Secretary John R. Block.

Apparently few, if any, other Members of the Senate read the article. None has even mentioned it to me, and a casual inquiry among Senators failed to produce even one who was aware of it.

Nonetheless, Mr. President, I feel obliged to come to the defense of Jack Block against some of the anonymous and mean-spirited spokesmen who purportedly made insulting comments about a fine, dedicated American who is doing a splendid job as Secretary of Agriculture under the most difficult of circumstances.

As one who has spent most of my adult life in the news business, I am growing increasingly concerned about the constantly increasing tendency among the major media to allow unidentified spokesmen to demean the character and dedication of people in public office. These days, everybody from the President on down is defenseless against such cowardly and intellectually dishonest attacks.

Mr. President, I do not mind criticism, and nobody else should—if it is fair criticism. But a reporter, under existing practices, can sit down and dream up all manner of quotes to be used against someone the reporter does not like, or with whom the reporter or his editors happen to disagree. President Reagan, Jack Block and all the rest of us ought to be entitled to face our accusers—if the accusers exist.

The piece in the July 5 Washington Post stated flatly that "lightweight" is the word "heard most frequently to describe Block." Other reporters, unidentified, were quoted as referring to Secretary Block as "Blockhead."

That, Mr. President, is a cheap shot, unworthy of a responsible newspaper. Incidentally, I have never heard a reporter who knows anything about agriculture refer to Secretary Block in such a derogatory manner.

The truth is, Jack Block is a capable and effective Secretary of Agriculture. True enough, he is presiding over the Department of Agriculture at its most difficult time in history. There are no easy answers, no instant solutions to the problems of American agriculture. Whereas previous Agriculture Secretaries could come to Congress and obtain funding for expensive and often ineffectual farm programs, the well has run dry insofar as unlimited Federal funds are concerned.

Secretary Block is providing responsible leadership. As a farmer himself, he not only understands the difficulties that farmers face, he has faced them himself and successfully overcome those challenges. In my opinion, there has never been a Secretary of Agriculture with a better working knowledge of the problems confronting full-time farmers today.

Commercial farmers, including Jack Block, know how ineffective and inefficient Government actions can be. Farmers tell me that they want lower interest rates and less Government. Despite rocky economic times, farmers know that Secretary Block is one of them and that he is working hard for them.

Mr. President, Jack Block is a genuine, "hands on" farmer with a world perspective. He knows the industry literally from the ground up. As Illinois director of agriculture, he was traveling around the world seeking new markets for farm products even before he became Secretary.

Mr. Block has been a very successful farmer, not by inheritance but by achievement. As did many others, he returned to the family farm after service in the Army. He built the original 300 acres into a progressive 3,000-acre enterprise. He and his lovely wife, Sue, know firsthand the problems facing farmers.

For this reason, I believe farmers generally trust the Secretary, and they have good reason to do so. The Secretary is well aware of this responsibility.

I can vouch for the fact that the Secretary has consistently and forcefully argued for farmers in the highest councils of Government. Those who contend otherwise simply have not been party to the decisions.

President Reagan himself has said,

I believe that our Administration is lucky to have an Illinois farmer named Jack Block, who never lets me or any member of our cabinet forget our farmers.

Mr. President, the Washington Post article accuses Secretary Block of having a firm belief in the President's program. This charge is one to which Secretary Block proudly pleads guilty. In fact, it is high time we had a Secretary of Agriculture who was committed to real economic growth in the marketplace, rather than artificial Government quick-fixes.

This is not blind faith in a free-market ideology. Rather, it is a conviction borne of experience.

As a businessman, Jack Block knows the true impact of Government regulations and taxation. As a former director of a State agency, he knows the vital role that State and local officials can play.

Our confirmation hearings showed that Mr. Block was extremely successful in directing his State agency. As chairman of the committee responsible for the oversight of USDA, I firmly believe he is an active and astute administrator here. He is well equipped and capably performing.

I encourage my colleagues to take a look at the record.

The Carter grain embargo, which precipitated the current economic distress on the farm, was lifted at Secretary Block's urging.

The Secretary is strongly committed to exporting more farm products and strengthening prices in the marketplace. He has led or sent trade teams to every continent, placed a high priority on market development, and maintained funding for export credit guarantees at the highest level in history.

He was instrumental in the development of a farm bill in 1981 that was both sound farm policy and responsible budget policy. He was constructively and effectively involved in the process of producing this legislation.

If in fact, this farm bill which was criticized as being inadequate will provide net outlays for 1982 price supports that are over 2½ times the outlays in the previous fiscal year. Under the farm bill, the Reagan administration will provide nearly $11 billion of assistance to farmers this year.

Mr. President, such assistance is proof that the safety net features of the 1981 farm bill are working.

Of course, this is due to low farm prices caused by excess supplies and a sluggish world economy. The Secretary is attempting to remedy our oversupply problems with the tools provided in the farm bill.

The Secretary announced a voluntary acreage reduction program for 1982 and made an aggressive effort to encourage participation in it. Farmers responded with a signup of acreage in the program that reached unprecedented levels.

There was also the case of the infamous Medfly. An outbreak of this destructive pest occurred in the fertile fields and orchards of California, which, as Senator HAYAKAWA is wont to remind us, produces a large share of the food found on American dinner tables each day.

The vital food supply of our largest agricultural State was endangered by the Medfly, but the Governor of that State merely took misguided, half-hearted actions which were not effective in stopping the nefarious pest.

Secretary Block's response was firm and decisive. At his insistence, the State of California finally took the actions necessary to stop the pest and protect our food supply.

There is a panoply of other issues before the Secretary of Agriculture, not even including the input he has in policy matters across the board as a Cabinet member. Suffice it to say that the Secretary is constantly seeking to reduce Federal spending and overregulation, emphasizing the role of the marketplace in improving the conditions we face. He approaches this task with a forthright and upbeat manner. If the naysayers of the newspapers do not approve of the Secretary's optimism, so be it. Their negativism is certainly not the answer.

The important thing is to get the job done for America's farmers, consumers, and taxpayers.

Mr. President, I commend Secretary Block for the excellent job he is doing.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

"WIC" DOVE

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the birth of our Nation was made possible because intrepid men and women had the courage, fortitude, and daring to fight for the lives and liberty of their countrymen.

Two hundred years later, these same qualities are still evident amongst us. William "Wic" Dove is one young man whose actions have exemplified many of those virtues which Americans still hold dear.

During the year of our Nation's bicentennial, Wic heroically rescued a drowning mother and her 9-month-old son. There can be no question but that he saved their lives.

Himself suffering from a recent injury, and in need of surgery, Wic did not hesitate to risk his own life for those two strangers. After pulling both unconscious victims from the water, Wic was able to successfully apply lifesaving techniques and revive both.

Louis Adamic once observed that, "There is a certain blend of courage, integrity, character, and principle which has no satisfactory dictionary name, but has been called different things at different times in different countries. Our American name for it is 'guts'." He could have been writing of Wic Dove.

The valor and courage that Wic displayed that long ago summer day is something I will not soon forget, nor will those whose lives he touched—and saved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

PROPOSED LEGISLATION ON WILD AND SCENIC RIVERS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 173

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

To the Congress of the United States:

One of the greatest challenges facing our Nation is to make careful and wise use of our natural resources. At the same time, we must protect other national treasures—wild, free-flowing rivers and wilderness areas—for this and future generations to enjoy in their natural, undeveloped state.

To further this effort and pursuant to the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act of 1968 and the Wilderness Act of 1964, I am today proposing, at the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, eight additions to the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System and three additions to the National Wilderness Preservation System. These additions total some 245 miles of rivers and over 21,000 acres of wilderness.

Briefly described, the proposed additions to the Rivers System are:

(1) The Clarks Fork of the Yellowstone River, Wyoming—21.5 miles of the river in the Shoshone National Forest.

(2) The Elk River, Colorado—29 miles of the river in the Routt National Forest.

(3) The Conejos River, Colorado—36.8 miles of the river in the Rio Grande National Forest.

(4) The Los Pinos River, Colorado—54 miles of the river in the Weminuche Wilderness, San Juan National Forest.

(5) The Verde River, Arizona—39.5 miles of the river in the Prescott, Coconino, and Tonto National Forests.

(6) The Au Sable River, Michigan—23 miles of the river in the Huron Manistee National Forest.

(7) The Snake River, Wyoming—13 miles of the river in the Bridger-Teton National Forest.

(8) The Piedra River, Colorado—28.4 miles of the river in the San Juan National Forest.

The comprehensive bill that I am transmitting today to add these rivers to the System will also make changes to the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act to enhance our ability to manage such rivers efficiently and effectively.

In addition, I am transmitting three legislative proposals to designate the following areas as additions to the Wilderness System:

(1) The Spruce Creek addition to the Hunter-Fryingpan Wilderness, Colorado—the 8,000-acre Spruce Creek Wilderness Study Area, to be added to this Wilderness in the White River National Forest. The area offers outstanding opportunities for solitude and backcountry recreation.

(2) The Paddy Creek area, Missouri—6,728 acres in the Mark Twain National Forest. This area of the Ozarks contains an unusual assortment of rock formations, including caves, crevasses, and fissures.

(3) The Aravaipa Canyon Primitive Area, Arizona—6,670 acres in Graham and Pinal Counties. Aravaipa Creek provides the canyon, which is bordered by high mesa-like cliffs, with lush vegetation and a variety of wildlife that is seldom seen in the surrounding Sonoran Desert.

After reviewing the suitability of three other rivers for possible designation, the Secretary of Agriculture has found them not to be suitable for inclusion in the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System. These include portions of the San Francisco River in Arizona, the Moyie River in Idaho, and the Salt River in Arizona. Finally, after reviewing the Elkhorn Wilderness Study Area in Montana, the Secretary of Agriculture has determined that this area is not suitable for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System.

I am also transmitting to the Congress today letters and reports from the Secretaries of the Interior and Agriculture regarding all of these rivers and wilderness proposals. I concur in all of these recommendations, and urge the Congress to act expeditiously and favorably on the proposed legislation, so that the natural resources of these areas may be protected and preserved.

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 13, 1982.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO REFORM THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 174

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am herewith transmitting proposed legislation entitled the Criminal Justice Reform Act of 1982. This Act—plus other proposals now pending in Congress—would strengthen society's defenses against the continuing and pervasive menace of crime.

Crime is clearly one of the most serious problems we face today. Crime—and the fear of crime—affect the lives of most Americans. Government's inability to deal effectively with crime diminishes the public's confidence in our system of government as a whole. Last year alone, one out of every three households in the country fell victim to some form of serious crime. By 1981, according to one survey, nearly eight of ten Americans did not believe that our system of law enforcement discouraged people from committing crimes—a fifty percent increase in just the last fifteen years.

As the threat of crime has become clearer to all Americans, so too has the need for improving our defenses against crime. As my Attorney General said only a few weeks ago: "In recent years, through actions by the courts and inaction by Congress, an imbalance has arisen in the scales of justice. The criminal justice system has tilted too decidedly in favor of the rights of the criminal and against the rights of society." It is time to restore the balance—and to make the law work to protect decent, law-abiding citizens.

To protect the rights of law-abiding citizens, the Administration has previously announced its strong support for a comprehensive law enforcement measure, the Violent Crime and Drug Enforcement Improvements Act of 1982, introduced in the Congress as S. 2572 and H.R. 6497. That important legislative initiative addresses many of our most pressing needs: bail reform, victim-witness protection, strengthened drug penalties, protection of federal officials, sentencing reform, expanded criminal forfeiture, donation of surplus federal property to State and local governments for needed correctional facilities, and a series of miscellaneous improvements in federal criminal laws.

The attached legislative proposal that I am now submitting would reform three additional areas of federal law affecting the criminal justice system. First, it would limit the insanity defense so that only those who did not have the mental state which is an element of their crime would escape responsibility for their acts. Second, the proposal would reform the exclusionary rule to prevent the suppression of evidence seized by an officer acting in the reasonable, good faith belief that his actions complied with law. Although the argument for retaining the exclusionary rule in any form is, at best, tenuous, this proposal eliminates application of the rule in those cases in which it most clearly has no deterrent effect. Finally, the bill would reform federal habeas corpus review of State adjudications to ensure greater deference to full and fair State judicial proceedings and to limit the time within which habeas corpus preceedings may be initiated. Habeas corpus reform would conserve scarce federal and State judicial and prosecutorial resources.

This new proposal and the Violent Crime and Drug Enforcement Improvements Act of 1982 represent a legislative program to protect all our citizens. These are not partisan initiatives. They are far too important to the Nation's well-being. In my view, they provide the basis for a renewed effort against the menace of crime. They will help restore the balance between the forces of law and the forces of lawlessness. I join with all Americans in urging the Congress to give both these legislative proposals its immediate attention and to begin the process of reclaiming our communities from criminals.

RONALD, REAGAN.
THE WHITE HOUSE, September 13, 1982.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

At 2:51 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to the bill (H.R. 2475) to modify a withdrawal of certain lands in Mono County, Calif., to facilitate an exchange for certain other lands in Mono County, Calif., and for other purposes; and that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2 to 7, inclusive, to the said bill.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bill and joint resolution, without amendment:

S.J. Res. 194. Joint resolution to provide for the appointment of Nancy Hanks as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The message further announced that the House has passed the following bills, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 6307. An act to amend the Solid Waste Disposal Act to authorize appropriations for the fiscal years 1983 and 1984, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 6666. An act to amend the joint resolution of October 19, 1965, to provide additional authorization for the Library of Congress James Madison Memorial Building.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The following bill was read the first and second times by unanimous consent and referred as indicated:

H.R. 6666. An act to amend the joint resolution of October 19, 1965, to provide additional authorization for the Library of Congress James Madison Memorial Building; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

HOUSE BILL PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

The following bill was read the first and second times by unanimous consent and placed on the calendar:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. DOLE, from the Committee on Finance:

Special report entitled "Budget Allocations of the Committee on Finance" (Rept. No. 97-543).

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the first concurrent resolution on the budget makes an allocation of total budget outlays and budget authority among the various committees in the Congress. Section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act requires each committee to further subdivide its allocation among subcommittees or programs under its jurisdiction and report the results to its respective House. This report has the proposed allocations among our program categories for outlays and budget authority for fiscal years 1982 and 1983. As required by the Budget Act, the amounts are further subdivided between controllable amounts and all other spending. Our established practice is to show as "controllable" those amounts which would result from new legislation and "all other" those amounts which would result from current law or which were assumed to result from legislative changes not within Finance Committee jurisdiction. Section 8 of the first concurrent resolution provides that it shall not be in order to consider any bill providing new budget or spending authority for fiscal year 1983 until the allocations required by section 302(b) of the Budget Act are made.●

By Mr. PERCY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, without amendment:

S. Res. 460. An original resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 2899; referred to the Committee on the Budget.

By Mr. BAKER (for Mr. MURKOWSKI), from the Committee on Governmental Affairs, without amendment:

S. Res. 461. An original resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 1562; referred to the Committee on the Budget.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. PERCY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with understandings:

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ:

S. 2900. A bill to amend the Arms Export Control Act to provide for the reimbursement of the U.S. Government for the sale of defense training based on the additional costs of such training; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REIMBURSEMENT OF THE COST OF CERTAIN DEFENSE TRAINING

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that will greatly improve one very important aspect of the U.S. foreign military sales (FMS) program—our training of foreign military students. My bill pertains to the manner in which the tuition of these foreign students is priced.

Under current law, countries receiving grant assistance under the international military education and training (IMET) program are charged on an incremental basis for the training they purchase, that is, they reimburse the United State for the additional cost we incur by having them at our training facilities. Other countries, such as Japan, Australia, New Zealand, the NATO countries, the Persian Gulf nations, and several states in Africa and South America, are required to pay on the full-cost principle, which means they pay the additional costs noted previously plus a proportionate share of the administrative and overhead costs we would incur whether we had them at our facilities or not.

Needless to say, the countries paying full cost view the system as highly discriminatory. The two types of cost accounting also cause the procedure to be more bureaucratic than need be and adds administrative headaches.

Therefore, Mr. President, I propose in my bill to amend the Arms Export Control Act to make the additional cost principle standard throughout the FMS program. In this way, all countries whose military students receive U.S. training would reimburse us for just what it costs us to train them.

Training of military students from abroad is very important to our foreign policy. Not only does it impart military knowledge and skills to countries whose armed forces are equipped at least in part with U.S. equipment, but perhaps more importantly it gives our military personnel an opportunity to get to know individuals who will some day occupy key posts in the defense and foreign affairs ministries in their governments.

Mr. President, I think my bill will make foreign military training programs run more smoothly and effectively. I urge its adoption by the Senate.●

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SASSER, Mr. LEVIN, and Mr. RIEGLE):

S. 2901. A bill to establish a National Commission on Neurofibromatosis; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON NEUROFIBROMATOSIS ACT

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today Senators SARBANES, SASSER, LEVIN, and I are introducing legislation to establish a National Commission on Neurofibromatosis.

NEUROFIBROMATOSIS

Neurofibromatosis (NF) is the most common neurological genetic disorder, affecting an estimated 100,000 people in the United States. It is estimated that one in 3,000 people have this progressive genetic disorder which results in abnormal development of neural tumors. The disease usually appears in childhood, although it can appear as late as age 50, with the following progressive symptoms: Small and large pressure sensitive tumors just under the skin, severe curvature of the spine, enlargement and deformation of bones, tumors on the auditory nerves resulting in deafness, tumors on the optic nerve resulting in loss of sight, and tumors of the brain and spinal cord, frequently resulting in epilepsy, retardation, and death. In approximately 5 percent of the cases, the tumors become cancerous.

Research has determined that NF is inherited from one parent in about 50 percent of the cases. The other half, however, are caused by a sporadic mutation of the genes. To date almost nothing is known about the causes of this mutation, and there is no effective treatment for NF other than surgical intervention in the growth of the tumors, which may grow back.

NATIONAL COMMISSION

Despite the prevalence of the disease, NF is perhaps the most overlooked serious disorder of our time. Recently, attention has been focused on NF as a result of the theatrical and motion picture productions of "The Elephant Man," the true story of John Merrick's struggle with the most severe case of NF ever recorded. That attention, however, will not replace the needed coordination and focus of our research efforts provided by a national commission.

Mr. President, the legislation we are introducing today would establish an independent commission of 20 members, organized, operating, and reporting within an 18-month period, with an authorization of $1.25 million. The Commission is to prepare a comprehensive plan for research and education on NF and the needed services for people with NF and their families. There is currently research going on within the National Institutes of Health and at other institutions across the country. But the coordination and funding for this research is severely lacking. A commission is needed to coordinate the work done so far and to plan for needed future research. As we have done with other major diseases, we need to formulate a national policy for dealing with NF.

We believe a national commission is a necessary step in our battle against NF. A recent report prepared by the Congressional Research Service found that commissions have effectively served to target limited resources, promote patient education and professional awareness, and provide a diverse perspective on prevention and treatment of diseases. Those are the objectives we seek with this legislation, and I encourage my colleagues to support it.●

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise in support of the National Commission on Neurofibromatosis Act, S. 2901.

Neurofibromatosis (NF) is a genetic disorder which is either inherited from a parent or is the result of a genetic mutation.

At least 100,000 Americans are afflicted with neurofibromatosis. It occurs equally in both sexes and is found in all racial, ethnic, and social class groups.

There is a shortage of specialized programs and trained professionals for neurofibromatosis research, treatment, care, education, and rehabilitation. Presently, there is no cure for neurofibromatosis. Treatment is aimed at correct diagnosis, surgical intervention, psychotherapy, and genetic counseling. Research is being directed toward locating the gene that causes neurofibromatosis and determining a prenatal test for identifying its presence, trying to understand the variability of neurofibromatosis, and evaluating the role of the various growth and hormonal factors in the body in relation to neurofibromatosis.

The purpose of S. 2901 is to establish a National Commission on neurofibromatosis to prepare a comprehensive report to the Congress which would include a long-range plan to expand and coordinate the national treatment and research effort against neurofibromatosis, to advance educational activities and opportunities, to improve the quality of life of individuals with neurofibromatosis, and to increase public awareness of neurofibromatosis.

Because neurofibromatosis is one of the most common serious neurological genetic disorders, affecting 1 of every 3,000 births, I urge my colleagues to support the establishment of a National Commission on neurofibromatosis.●

By Mr. WARNER (for himself, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. MATHIAS, and Mr. SARBANES):

Senate Joint Resolution 244. Joint resolution designating January 17, 1983, as "Public Employees Appreciation Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC EMPLOYEES APPRECIATION DAY

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, everyone who works, whether for themselves or for someone else, recognizes the need and value of praise and appreciation for their services. Public employees are no exception.

Very often, I witness Federal career employees being made the brunt of undue criticism. While we all know there is need for improvement in some areas, most Government employees are dedicated individuals who are doing their best to carry out policy directives, providing for an improved quality of life for all Americans.

My observation is based on over 10 years of personal service in the executive branch—at the Justice Department, the Pentagon, and as head of the Nation's Bicentennial.

For these reasons, I am pleased to introduce, with Senators STEVENS, MATHIAS, and SARBANES as cosponsors, a Senate Joint Resolution designating January 17, 1983, as "Public Employees Appreciaton Day."

It is fitting to recognize the contributions of millions of our citizens who have served and are serving this Nation in local, State, and Federal service in conjunction with the 100th anniversary of the Civil Service Act next January, and ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 244

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That January 17, 1983, is designated "Public Employees' Appreciation Day". The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation inviting the Governors of the several States, the chief officials of local governments, and the people of the United States to observe that day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statements made throughout the day by other Members of the Senate be located in the RECORD at this one place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I yield to my distinguished colleague from Maryland.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Virginia for yielding to me.

I wish to not only tell him and other Senators that I am a cosponsor with the Senator from Virginia of this resolution but also that I will work for its adoption and beyond merely the adoption of the resolution will work for a greater recognition of the contribution that civil servants make to the Government of the United States and to the people of the United States.

The quality of their work is extraordinary. Not only the level of performance but the level of excellence of their performance is outstanding.

All too often they are made the scapegoats for the problems that have been created by other forces and other people in our society.

I think the civil service is one of the great institutions of the United States. We should be proud of it. We should protect it. We should preserve it. And we should pay it.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from Maryland and I join him in his observations.

Indeed, he is recognized in this Chamber as being one of the leaders and great protectors of the institution of civil service.

I myself admit with great humility that it is unlikely that I would be in the Senate had it not been for an excess of 10 years of service in a variety of capacities as a Federal employee, starting out as a mail carrier during World War II and eventually having the privilege to serve as Secretary of the U.S. Navy.

So I shall join with my distinguished colleagues from Maryland and other Members of this body to see what we can do to bring the proper credit and appreciation of the Nation on the Federal civil service.

Indeed, all too often they are regarded as responsible for some of the problems of Government, but if we analyze it, indeed it is the leadership who is responsible, as opposed to these loyal people who have dedicated their lives in the service of their country.

I thank you, Mr. President, and I yield the floor.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 119—COMMENDING OUR NATION'S SCHOOLS

Mr. HOLLINGS (for himself and Mr. STAFFORD) submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources:

S. CON. RES. 119

Whereas an educated citizenry, able to make critical decisions is the cornerstone of democracy;

Whereas education is one of the best tools for people to raise themselves from poverty;

Whereas the national defense demands soldiers capable of operating high technology equipment;

Whereas the growth of high technology industries as the mainstay of the nation's economy requires a well-educated workforce;

Whereas the international nature of economic competition demands that U.S. workers be highly productive as well as skillful;

Whereas the schools within the last several years have placed a greater emphasis on strict academic standards and these efforts are showing results in terms of higher achievement gains: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress applauds the efforts of the schools to increase their effectiveness and provide a quality education for all students. Congress recognizes that improving education is a joint effort involving private industry, local schools, States and the Federal government and resolves to show that "Congress Cares" by continuing to work with industry, local schools and States to improve the nation's schools.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I am submitting a concurrent resolution calling attention to the efforts of the Nation's schools to increase their effectiveness and encouraging the further improvement in the quality of education. Joining me in cosponsoring this resolution is the senior Senator from Vermont, Senator STAFFORD.

The challenge ahead, Mr. President, if we are going to return America to a strong footing of competitiveness in the world marketplace is the realization that our schools will provide the quality necessary in our people to get the job done. We must seek to improve our schools and promote quality if we are to accomplish our goal. This resolution will, Mr. President, lend support to our efforts in this direction.

SENATE RESOLUTION 460—BUDGET WAIVER

Mr. PERCY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following original resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 460

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 2899. Such waiver is necessary because S. 2899 authorizes the enactment of new budget authority which would first become available in fiscal year 1982, and such bill was not reported on or before May 15, 1981, as required by section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for such authorizations.

The waiver of section 402(a) is necessary to permit congressional consideration of statutory authority to provide supplemental emergency economic assistance to countries of the Caribbean Basin in fiscal year 1982.

S. 2899 provides an authorization for fiscal year 1982 of $350,000,000 for emergency economic assistance to Caribbean and Central American countries in support of the Caribbean Basin Initiative, a program to promote economic revitalization and to facilitate expansion of economic opportunity in the Caribbean Basin region. The effect of not considering this bill would be to deny policy guidance for these aid programs and to deny the use of counterpart funds for development programs.

The specified sum is included in the fiscal year 1982 supplemental appropriations act (P.L. 97-257). The Appropriations Committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives have had adequate notice of this authorization, and Congressional consideration of this authorization will in no way interfere with or delay the appropriations process.

SENATE RESOLUTION 461—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. BAKER (for Mr. MURKOWSKI), from the Committee on Governmental Affairs, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 461

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 1562. Such waiver is necessary because S. 1562 authorizes the enactment of new budget authority which would first become available in fiscal year 1983, and such bill was not reported on or before May 15, 1982, as required by section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for such authorizations.

The waiver of section 402(a) is necessary to permit congressional consideration of a bill to provide a comprehensive national science policy with respect to the Arctic.

S. 1562 authorizes an appropriation of $25,000,000.00 per year to support the activities of the Arctic Science Policy Council and the Arctic Research Commission.

The Appropriations Committees of the Senate and House have not yet considered legislation which would include appropriations for the Arctic Policy Act, and will therefore have adequate notice of this authorization. Thus, congressional consideration of this authorization will in no way interfere or delay the appropriations process.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

TEMPORARY INCREASE IN PUBLIC DEBT LIMIT

AMENDMENTS NOS. 3266 THROUGH 3269

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. HATFIELD submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 520) to provide for a temporary increase in the public debt limit.

REFUGEE ASSISTANCE

AMENDMENT NO. 3270

(Ordered to be printed and be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.)

Mrs. HAWKINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by her to the bill (H.R. 5879) to amend chapter 2 of title IV of the Immigration and Nationality Act to extend for 1 year the authorization of appropriations for refugee assistance, and for other purposes.

REIMBURSING STATES AND LOCALITIES IN THE EVENT OF AN IMMIGRATION EMERGENCY

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today I am offering an amendment to the House-passed version of the reauthorization of the Refugee Act of 1980, H.R. 5879. The Refugee Act of 1980 is the legislation authorizing a range of benefits provided to refugees who are allowed to settle in this country. It must be reauthorized this year. The House has already finished consideration of its reauthorization bill, and the Senate is expected to finish prior to our adjournment in October.

My amendment is designed to redress serious shortcomings in current law. Currently, our State and local governments cannot depend on reimbursement for their tremendous expenses—should they again be surprised by a massive influx of undocumented aliens. In 1980, Florida was inundated with 125,000 Cubans over a period of only 6 months. The total cost of accepting these homeless people amounts to over $1 billion, to date. Out of that Florida paid $150 million. Obviously, 15 percent of a $1 billion tab is a tremendous burden on Floridians—a burden that, ironically, they were powerless to prevent. Foreign policy and immigration policy fall under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. Hence, State and local governments could not say no to the influx of undocumented aliens. However, they must say yes to the cost of paying for the food, housing, and education of these aliens.

For example, 1 out of every 12 children in a Dade County school is now a refugee or a Cuban or Haitian entrant. Florida State and local governments have paid for 75 percent of the cost of educating these children. The issue is not merely money, though. Consider the harassment and shock caused by the massive injection of undocumented aliens to these Florida communities.

Another tremendous price that Floridians pay—in money and in psychic damage—is in the area of criminal justice. Normally the crime rate increases in proportion to increases in population. Because of the Cuban arrivals in Florida, however, increases in the crime rate have far outstripped population increases. Cuban entrants comprise 4.6 percent of the unincorporated of Dade County; yet, at one point they made up a staggering 14.8 percent of jail population. In the year following the massive influx of Cubans to Dade County, serious crimes increased by 23.1 percent. Of course, the people of Dade County are expected to pay the bill for over 75 percent of the cost of this crime epidemic—as well as endure an excessively high crime rate in their formerly safe and solid community. I believe that this is blatantly unfair, and my amendment seeks to correct this situation in the event of any future immigration emergencies.

This amendment provides a range of benefits to aliens who arrive in the United States as a result of the policy of a foreign government to encourage emigration to the United States in violation of U.S. immigration laws. In other words, these aliens are here as a result of a failure of U.S. foreign policy. The benefits in the amendment are designed primarily to help an alien adjust smoothly and quickly to American society so that they can contribute to the local economy and social environment. The amendment is also designed to place the responsibility for financing benefits fully in the hands of the Federal Government. Foreign policy is a Federal responsibility. It is only equitable, then that spectacular failures of foreign policy be funded by the Federal Government. That is New Federalism in its purest and most equitable form.

Under this amendment, State and local governments will be reimbursed by the Secretary of the Treasury after consulting with appropriate Federal departments. Before being reimbursed, however, a State must submit to the Secretary of the Treasury an application that describes the services furnished, specifies the amount claimed for reimbursement, and provides proof that the services were furnished to an eligible alien both quickly and economically.

The kinds of services provided under this amendment range from cash assistance for a 36-month period, to health care for a 60-month period, to education services for a 120-month period, and so forth. These services are necessary to prevent aliens from becoming a burden on their community and will help them assume a productive role in our society. This amendment will assure State and local governments that from now on the Federal Government will live up to its obligations in the area of immigration. I urge the Senate to adopt this amendment.●

SINAI SUPPORT AND FIELD MISSIONS

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, President Reagan has recently sent a letter of commendation to the individuals who served in the Sinai Support and Field Missions. I shall take a moment to add my congratulations and thanks for the fine job done by the people involved in this peace-keeping mission in the Middle East.

One of Texas' own companies, E-Systems of Dallas, was the prime Government contractor in this important effort in the Sinai. The company was responsible for establishing a tactical early warning system guarding the approaches to the Giddi and Milta Passes. In a 1977 GAO report, it was noted that E-Systems was "chosen to perform the Sinai project based on its experience and quick-reaction capability."

The GAO publication reported that:

The establishment and operation of the early warning system demonstrated a successful blending of government and private enterprise to achieve desired results under difficult circumstances. Noteworthy was the speed with which the early warning system became operational between the signing of the joint resolution on October 13, 1975, and the redeployment of forces in the Sinai on February 22, 1976.

Sinai Support Missions Director Frank E. Mestrone's reports to the President also contained praise for the rapid and efficient manner in which the contractor met the challenges of the mission's work over the 6 years of operation.

The experience and capability of E-Systems and its staff were important to the successful completion of the mission. The company was able to fulfill its contract in a cost-efficient manner and well within the time allowed.

America has followed a policy in the Middle East aimed at bringing a just and lasting peace to this trouble region. The success of special envoy Philip Habib is the most recent example of the United States stabilizing influence in this area of the world.

A less well known—but no less important—example of U.S. concern in the Middle East is the Sinai Support Mission's peace-keeping role. Perhaps in the future, other positive demonstrations of U.S. interest in serving the goal of peace and prosperity in the Middle East can come through similar joint private and Government operations in this corner of the globe.

The men of women of the mission are to be commended for their time and energy in this important job.

I submit for the RECORD President Reagan's letter.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., July 14, 1982.

A unique American peacekeeping operation in the harsh and isolated desert environment of the Sinai Peninsula ended on April 25, 1982, when Israel completed its withdrawal from the Sinai in accordance with the terms of the 1979 Egyptian-Israeli Peace Treaty. On that day, the Sinai Support Mission and its overseas arm, the Sinai Field Mission, concluded six years of keeping the peace between Egypt and Israel. As the Sinai Support Mission closes out this operation, I want to pay tribute to the many dedicated men and women who, during this critical period, served with distinction either with SSM here in Washington or with SFM in the Sinai.

"The orange men and women," as the Sinai Field Mission staff were called because of the international orange color of their clothing and their helicopters, played a crucial role in maintaining the peace in that area, first under the Second Sinai Disengagement Agreement of 1975 and then under the 1979 Peace Treaty. Initially, they operated an electronic early warning system guarding the approaches to the strategic Giddi and Mitla Passes. When the Israeli troops withdrew further east of these passes under the terms of the Peace Treaty, SFM was assigned a new role, the verification of Egyptian and Israeli compliance with the force and armament limitations specified in the Treaty for controlled areas in the western Sinai. The verifications involved onsite inspections of units and facilities scattered over a 15,000 square mile area of the Sinai. During this period, SFM personnel earned the respect and confidence of both the Egyptians and the Israelis because of their expertise, professionalism, and impartiality.

In additional to these most important contributions to keeping the peace, the Sinai Support Mission rendered noteworthy assistance in the creation of its successor organization, the Multinational Force and Observers, which assumed Sinai peacekeeping responsibilities on April 25, 1982. The speed with which the MFO was created and made operational would have been hard to achieve without the expertise and cooperation of the Sinai Support Mission.

To all those who served in the Sinai Support and Field Missions, let me say, congratulations for a job well done. You have set a high standard for peacekeeping operations and made an important contribution on behalf of the United States to the cause of peace in the Middle East.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT REAFFIRMS LEGALITY OF DISC

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, several months ago I had occasion to write Secretary of the Treasury Regan with respect to an article by a Treasury Department employee asserting that the Domestic International Sales Corporation (DISC) was a subsidy under the Rules of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). I pointed out that this was not the position of the U.S. Government and that such a statement by a Government employee, even though qualified as an expression of his own views, was bound to damage our case on this contentious issue in the GATT.

Thus I was pleased to receive a recent letter from Assistant Secretary Dennis Thomas affirming the Government's longstanding position that DISC is consistent with GATT rules. There is no question in my mind that that is the case, and it is helpful to have similar statements from all concerned departments to reconfirm our Government's unanimity on the point.

Mr. President, I ask that both my letter and Mr. Thomas' response be printed in the RECORD.

The letters follow:

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D.C., July 21, 1982.

Hon. JOHN HEINZ,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HEINZ: Thank you for bringing to our attention the unfortunate statement about DISC in Mr. Schott's Challenge article. We have brought your letter to Mr. Schott's attention, even though he is on leave from the Treasury Department.

Your letter also gives me the opportunity to reaffirm that the Treasury Department does not consider DISC provisions of the Internal Revenue Code to be contrary to United States obligations under GATT regarding export subsidies.

Sincerely,

W. DENNIS THOMAS,
Assistant Secretary,
(Legislative Affairs).●

COMMODORE JOHN BARRY DAY

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, last year I introduced a Senate joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate September 13 as "Commodore John Barry Day," in tribute to the Father of the American Navy.

I am pleased that this resolution passed the Senate and the House in time for the President to sign the proclamation on his first visit to a U.S. aircraft carrier, the U.S.S. Constitution.

Commodore Barry has long been a source of pride to Irish Americans, particularly the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America. The A.O.H. had its roots in the 16th century in Ireland, and the founding of the A.O.H. in America in 1836 makes it the oldest fraternal organization in this country.

The new President of the Ancient Order of Hibernians is a Marylander, Joseph A. Roche of Baldwin, Md. For over 130 years, the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America has assisted Irish immigrants and sought to recognize the accomplishments, talents, and patriotism that the Irish have brought to this country.

I can think of no better way to fulfill this effort than to pay tribute, once again, to the Father of the American Navy, Commodore John Barry.

I ask that the President's comments on board the U.S.S. Constitution be printed in the RECORD.

The comments follow:

EXCERPTS FROM REMARKS BY PRESIDENT RONALD REAGAN ABOARD THE U.S.S CONSTITUTION, ON THE OCCASION OF THE SIGNING OF S.J. RES. 87 AND HIS PROCLAMATION

You know, today you ship's motto, "The Spirit is Old; The Pride is New," fits this Nation as well as the vessel. And I have a little chore that I'm going over here for just a second to do, and then I'll just finish with a few remarks.

There was a Commodore John Barry in the United States Navy in the days of the Revolution, and he has been called by many the Father of the United States Navy. So, I'm going to go over here and tell you a little bit of what it is that I'm signing, and then I'll finsh telling you something, a story that I think you might like to hear.

I'll just go to the table.

This is a proclamation [resolution]. It was passed by the 97th Congress of the United States authorizing and requesting me to designate September 13th, 1981, as Commodore John Barry Day. He was a hero of the American Revolution holder of the first commission in the United States Navy. He was born in 1745 in County Wexford, Ireland. He was commissioned to command the brig Lexington, equipped for the Revolution, and became a national hero with the capture of a British man-of-war, the Prince Edward, April 1776.

Following the Revolution, when the sovereignty of this new nation was threatened by pirates, Commodore Barry was placed in command of the first ships authorized under the new Constitution and was named Senior Captain of the United States, Navy in 1794. As I said, he's considered by many as the Father of the United States Navy. He was honored in 1906 when the Congress had a statue of him erected in Lafayette Square in Washington, D.C., and since then a statue has also been erected by our Government in County Wexford, Ireland.

"So, now, therefore, be it resolved that the President is authorized and requested to designate September 13th as Commodore John Barry Day as a tribute to the Father of the United States Navy and to call upon Federal, State, and local government agencies and the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities." It is signed by Congressman Thomas O'Neill, the Speaker of the House, and by George Bush, the Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

I'm going to use about four pens. I could have signed this at the hotel, but I just thought with this chance, I had to sign it right out here where the Navy is.●

EXPORT TRADING COMPANY LEGISLATION WILL CREATE JOBS

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, a recent statement and letter by the U.S. Conference of Mayors affirms the job creating potential of the export trading company legislation (S. 734) now in conference. As the letter makes clear, the several studies that have been done on this subject project the creation of between 300,000 and 600,000 jobs by 1985, as the legislation makes the United States increasingly export oriented.

Clearly, Mr. President, this is major legislation and I hope it will move promptly through conference. I ask that the letter and resolution of the Conference of Mayors appear at this point in the RECORD.

The letter and resolution follow:

UNITED STATES
CONFERENCE OF MAYORS,
Washington, D.C., August 9, 1982.

DEAR CONFEREE: As you know, you will soon be meeting to put the final touches on the Export Trading Company legislation (S. 734). The U.S. Conference of Mayors supports this legislation, believing it to be vital to the economic vitality of the small business community, important in reducing our trade deficit, and potentially of significant benefit to cities in their business development efforts. Consequently, we urge prompt approval of this legislation by the conference committee and by the Congress.

The Conference of Mayors at our annual meeting in June, adopted policy specifically endorsing Export Trading Company, (ETC) legislation. I am enclosing a copy of that resolution.

The Export Trading Company legislation would permit banks to take limited ownership interests in an ETC and allow ETC's to apply for an antitrust certification preclearance, giving greater assurance their activities would not make them liable to antitrust action. In addition, the legislation directs the Department of Commerce to promote the formation of export trading companies.

We are optimistic that this legislation will encourage many small and medium sized firms to enter the export market. This in turn will create jobs here in the United States. Most analyses indicate the increase would be at least 300,000 jobs, and possibly twice as much by 1985.

We thank you for your past support of this important legislation and we urge you to expedite its enactment.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. GUNTHER,
Executive Director.

U.S. POPULATION

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I wish to report that according to the latest U.S. Census Bureau approximations, the total population of the United States on September 1, 1982, was 231,871,800. This represents an increase of 218,178 since August 1, 1982. Since this time last year, our population has grown by an additional 2,205,449.

In 1 short month we have added enough people to our population to more than fill the city of Corpus Christi, Tex. Over the past year, our population has increased enough to fill the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., more than five times.●

PLIGHT OF THE WESTERN TIMBER INDUSTRY

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I recently introduced legislation that alleviates a most serious problem that exists in the Western wood-products industry. As you know, high interest rates and the slowdown in homebuilding has dealt a crushing blow to the industry that supplies the materials to build our homes. Housing starts have plummeted from over 2 million per year in 1979 to less than 1 million in 1981. My State of Oregon and many other Western timber-producing States are suffering economic malaise only likened to the Depression years of the 1930's. In my State alone, 73 lumber mills are either closed or working at reduced shifts. Since 1979, 22,000 of the 90,000 direct jobs in Oregon's wood-products industry have been lost. Since 1979, 10 wood-products firms have taken bankruptcy. Unfortunately, the situation of this beleaguered industry only points to even worse times ahead.

In the West, many timber companies are almost totally reliant on Federal timber for their raw materials. Timber is purchased under contracts dictated by the Federal Government which in many instances has a monopoly position as supplier of the raw product. Typically, these companies purchase Government timber on a schedule that provides them with a timber supply for several years, so that these companies can plan properly.

Mr. President, during the decade of the 1970's we had Federal housing policies which fostered homebuildings. With the shift in the Federal economics program, and through a combination of tight money, high interest rates, and deregulation of financial institutions, capital has been channeled away from housing.

This situation has put the companies who bid competitively for Government timber in a terrible bind. Prices for lumber and plywood are much lower than the Government prices they have under contract. In Oregon and Washington, as much as 90 percent of the 20 billion board feet of timber under contract cannot be harvested in today's market. The only alternative many of these companies holding these contracts have is to default. Defaulting Government timber contracts, with severe penalties resulting, will drive many of them out of business, thus exacerbating an already unacceptable situation.

Mr. President, when two parties are involved in a contractual agreement, and drastically changed conditions disable one of those parties to the point whereby the contract cannot be fulfilled, the only alternative available is to default on the contract or to modify it. This is exactly the situation we face today.

During the week of August 16, the Public Lands and Reserved Water Subcommittee of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee heard from many interested parties on this very problem. The hearings were called to address legislation introduced both by Senator McCLURE and me that authorized the Secretaries of Interior and Agriculture to modify Federal timber sales contracts. It became painfully obviously that this serious situation warrants immediate action, or the small, independent segment of the lumber industry would be lost, leaving only a handful of large, integrated companies as the suppliers of wood products.

Mr. President, witness after witness spoke in favor of granting some type of relief to these troubled companies. The administration did not recognize that the problem with unharvestable timber contracts warranted immediate action. Instead it took the position that the Federal Government took no part, or shared no blame in this problem. I feel that attitude is one of the greedy liquidators, ready to pounce at the first sign of default. I am dismayed and disturbed by this attitude.

A recent Congressional Research Service study on Federal timber contracts claims that companies who will be able to turn back timber contracts to the Government will receive some kind of benefit and that the Federal Government will lose revenues. This statement could not be further from the truth. There is no possibility that billions and billions of board feet of Federal timber will never be harvested. As I stated earlier, the only alternative is defaulting on or modification of these contracts. To speak of benefits, knowing that this situation exists, is ridiculous. The only benefits that will occur will be to the attorneys who must litigate the endless amounts of suits and countersuits that will result. That is of no benefit to either the Government or to the counties, mill owners, States, and private citizens who depend on this industry for their livelihood.

Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD an article that recently appeared in the Oregonian newspaper that expands on my comments:

[From the Oregonian, Sept. 5, 1982]

ADMINISTRATION TELLS TIMBERMEN: PAY AND BE DAMNED

(By Dick Johnston)

WASHINGTON.—Key segments of the timber industry are near accord on a potential congressional solution to Western Oregon's looming crisis over high-priced government administration's ideological opposition as the chief obstacle to resolving a problem many Oregon mill owners believe could drive them into bankruptcy.

Agreement among the politically potent timbermen and, to a lesser extent, the environmentalists is vital to any scheme for relieving Oregon mills of contracts signed in the late 1970s and early '80s before lumber markets plummeted, when firms promised to pay the highest prices in history for Forest Service and Bureau of Land Management stumpage.

Now, while there is not unanimity within the timber industry or between the two groups, their differences do not seem fatal to efforts by Sens. Mark O. Hatfield, R-Ore., and James A. McClure, R-Idaho, to write a compromise plan when Congress returns from its Labor Day recess this week.

And an important Department of Agriculture natural resources official has recommended—unseccessfully—that the administration embrace a termination policy that many in the industry and on Capitol Hill consider essential for any workable relief program.

The Reagan administration's insistence on doing nothing to avert contract defaults beyond time extensions was a defeat for its assistant secretary of agriculture for natural resource, John B. Crowell Jr., the longtime general counsel for Louisiana-Pacific Corp.

Although Crowell remains mum on what he recommended, leaky Washington keeps few secrets: His recommendation included allowing termination of up to 40 percent of the high-priced contracts, by volume.

His recommendation gives weight to the Oregon industry's pleas.

As the industry plight worsened, Crowell refused to turn to termination, saying he would wait until there was no alternative. Now he has turned, but his superiors regard such relief as a "bailout" and contrary to their free-market philosophy.

The two Republican senators leading the relief search, Oregon's moderate Hatfield and Idaho's conservative McClure, are far more pragmatic, willing to seek compromises they can sell rather than schemes rooted in politics or idelogy.

But even if the senators sell a relief scheme to Congress, they can expect trouble at the White House, which has all but nailed "no soliciting" signs on the gates.

President Reagan made it clear this summer that his determination against giving special aid to any industry included wood products: He vetoed the fiscal 1982 urgent supplemental appropriations bill, in part because it included a home mortgage interest payment subsidy plan the president derided as a "bailout." He made the veto stick, too.

What is not in doubt is that Hatfield and McClure and their staffs still are talking about a proposal similar to that develop by an ad hoc committee of Western Oregon and Idaho timbermen assembled by the senators.

When they write their final proposal, these are the probable central elements:

Contract terminations, perhaps as high as 50 percent by timber volume.

Longer contract extensions than the administration has granted.

Transfer from national forest to national forest, probably within the same Forest Service region, of the timber payment offset credits the Forest Service grants purchasers for building access roads.

Penalties, at least enough to cover the government's resale expenses, can be expected with terminations. Sentiment is strongly against "rewards" for speculators, although buyers who turn back contracts are unlikely to be barred from rebidding on the same timber at today's prices, now close to half the tariff on the original pacts.

The Idaho-Oregon panel agreed to limited termination, and the Southern Forest Products Association reversed its opposition and endorsed the concept in June. For now, SFPA wants terminations limited to 40 percent of the volume covered by the contracts, and the Southeastern Lumber Manufacturers Association, a group of 396 small mills, favors 25 percent. Some Western Oregon lumbermen want 60 percent or more and there have been calls for blanket termination, most notably by Rep. Jim Weaver, the Oregon Democrat who heads the House Agriculture forests subcommittee.

SFPA, representing three-quarters of the Southern pine production in a dozen states, also wants to block resale of terminated Douglas fir contracts on top of today's regular sales in national forests and on BLM holdings.

It favors capping the Forest Service's Northwest Region 6 sales at 4.1 billion board feet a year in fiscal 1983 and '84. That would be 1.3 billion feet less than the administration's 1983 request and 1.7 billion feet less than the fiscal '84 ceiling.

SFPA is worried about the accumulation of sold but unharvested timber in the Northwest's national forests, now more than 16 billion board feet. Its resale at today's lower prices after sales contract default or termination could glut the market unless total sales are limited, it complains.

Congress may resolve the issue differently. There are rumbles from Capitol Hill that the administration's fiscal 1983 request of 12.3 billion board feet of national forest sales is excessive; 11 billion board feet has been mentioned as a target.

If the Forest Service sales allocation pattern held, that would cut Region 6 sales by some 600 million feet, the major portion of it in Oregon.

Proposals for price rollbacks, greeted with no enthusiasm except in Western Oregon where the state reduced prices in its forests, seem to be dead because pine operators fear their markets would soon be inundated by Northwest lumber and plywood at ruinous prices.

The support of Southern and Idaho pine operators for Western Oregon relief clearly hinges on maintaining existing market patterns.

Southerners are acutely sensitive to Northwest timber prices that spell potential competition in the South and East Central states where Canadian lumber has also become a potent challenger.

But SFPA supports extending contract deadlines for harvest of Northwest timber.

The administration extended deadlines twice to allow up to three years extra on some contracts before holders must harvest the timber and pay the government—or default. Now the favorite among timbermen and on Capitol Hill appears to be a five-year extension for contracts signed before Jan. 1. Congress is likely to seek interest, some type of periodic payment and other responses, such as roadbuilding, for carrying the contracts.

Western Oregon timbermen remain nervous about the contracts, though, despite extensions. A slow recovery is predicted, and contract expiration dates loom in the distance like a brick wall across an expressway.

Additionally, the contracts are on their books as tens of millions of dollars in liabilities.

Liabilities concern Idaho timbermen as well. Thus their demand, resisted by environmentalists and Southerners, to be able to transfer ineffective purchaser credits from one national forest to another.

A bit of history: Congress does not finance roadbuilding in timber sales areas, so the government depends on buyers. But recognizing the value of roads for purposes other than logging, the Forest Service compensates builders by crediting road costs against timber payments.

Normally, the timber value exceeds road costs, but in difficult terrain and sparse timber, such as the Idaho mountains, the Forest Service sometimes owes more for roads than it gets from the timber.

It is forbidden, however, to pay the difference. Instead, the purchaser is allowed to carry over excess credit to future sales in the forest where the road was built.

If a purchaser doesn't buy again in that forest or continues to buy and build up credits, they are considered ineffective.

Idaho timbermen have hungered for transfers to other national forests, but they were first thwarted by the counties containing the forests and now face the wrath of environmentalists and the doubts of the South.

Counties resisted when their quarter share of forest revenues came from the Forest Service's net proceeds within their borders, but the law has changed and roadbuilding costs are not deducted.

Environmentalists associate ineffective credits with sales that produce less revenue than the cost of the roadbuilding required, and they abdhor such sales as bringing logging and roads to fragile lands.

Southerners, fearing Northwest credits might show up in a carpetbag down in Dixie, favor confining transfers to the Forest Service region where credits are earned.

Whatever the outcome of relief efforts, Congress is unlikely to complete a solution until next year.

The 97th Congress has 16 legislative days before its scheduled adjournment. And if the 98th is like most new congresses, it will concern itself more with office swapping and committee assignments than with legislating until the President issues his fiscal 1983 budget in late February.

And whatever happens, Congress won't swallow what Hatfield and Weaver earlier put before the House and Senate, nor will it go for the leftovers the administration tried to disguise with a new-policy sauce.

Hatfield and Weaver sought to authorize—not compel—the secretaries of agriculture and interior to terminate or extend U.S. Forest Service and BLM timber sale contracts bid before Jan. 1, 1982, or to roll back prices to current values for unextended contracts. Beneficiaries would have to show "economic hardship."

Pine timbermen fretted about the proposal and the administration flatly condemned it.

Although the administration would have a free hand in deciding if any relief would be granted, officials envisioned competing loggers brawling on the doorsteps of Agriculture Secretary John Block and Interior Secretary James Watt.

Besides, the bill is contrary to the administration's opposition to government intervention in the marketplace and its stated belief that a contract is a contract. The administration also seems reluctant to give up the billions of dollars the timbermen agreed to pay for the government's trees, despite arguments that bankrupting mills will cost the Treasury a fortune in unemployment benefits and will yield little, if anything, for the government at a distress sale.

But in its position statement on the Hatfield-Weaver bill, the administration refused to consider any contract adjustment except its own extension policy. Beyond that, it said, if buyers can't perform, let them default and pay the piper on the installment plan.

Using almost identical words, Hatfield and Weaver condemned the policy as one of unemployment and bankruptcy.

The penalty on a defaulted contract is the difference between the original bid and the resale price, plus the expense of resale.

In Western Oregon, it is common for a small timber operator to hold 60 million or even 100 million board feet of government timber under contracts signed when Douglas fir sawtimber was going for as high as $440 per thousand board feet, about twice today's price. If the differential amounted to $200 per thousand, each million feet a timberman defaulted would leave him $200,000 in debt to the government.

Many penalties would exceed a defaulting mill's worth. Aaron U. Jones, president of Seneca Sawmill Co. in Eugene, told a recent congressional hearing: "The magnitude of the financial crisis facing these firms can be seen in the fact that at prices bid in 1979 the average cost of only a four-month supply of timber is equal to the average purchaser's present net worth."

Most mills, he added, hold a two-year supply under contract.

But the administration's attitude wasn't all "let 'em eat cake." If defaults come, it proposed to keep the defaulters out of bankruptcy court by arranging an easy payoff plan that would amount to an unsecured liability to the government. While the proposal was not described as new, anyone unfamiliar with government debt collection practices might think it was.

The Justice Department knows all about debt collection, though, since that's one of its jobs. And a spokesman there says its Civil Division lawyers routinely negotiate repayment arrangements that avoid ruining the debtor. Moreover, a Forest Service spokesman noted, it is common for a Justice lawyer to decide that the government will never be able to collect all it is owed and settle for whatever he feels he can get—again, without taking the collection into court.

What Hatfield and Weaver fear is that Oregon's surviving mills whose owners have somehow managed to stay afloat in the worst wood-products market since the Great Depression, will finally give up and go bankrupt rather than take on yet another financial burden.

HIGH TIMBER CONTRACTS PLAGUE INDUSTRY

WASHINGTON.—No businessman can buy at $550, sell at $162, and stay in business long.

That explains the deep concern many Western Oregon timbermen have with the unprecedented prices they agreed to pay for government stumpage in the late 1970s and early into the '80s.

Contracts for that timber did not cause the virtual collapse of the wood products industry; high mortgage interest rates did, driving housing starts from more than 2 million in 1979 to fewer than 1 million this year.

But even if the housing industry begins recovering, reviving lumber markets with it, many a mill owner wonders if he can make it because of those contracts, which won't simply go away with renewed prosperity.

Many say they can't foresee future market conditions in which they will break even, let alone turn a profit, with the high-priced timber, even by blending it with new purchases at today's lower prices.

The Reagan administration averted an immediate crisis with the contracts last year by granting extensions of up to three years on the deadline for harvesting and paying for the timber, which normally occurs three to five years after the agreements are signed. Without the extensions, the Department of Agriculture announced last fall that by April 1, 1983, it expected contract defaults on 958 U.S. Forest Service sales, totaling more than 2.7 billion board feet of timber.

"Bankruptcies are a very real threat," warned John B. Crowell Jr., assistant secretary of agriculture for natural resources.

Despite the grace periods, the contracts will come due in the mid-1980s unless the government terminates them.

Without termination of a miraculous revival of housing starts, many Western Oregon lumbermen will be forced to choose between logging or contract default, a choice some believe is no choice at all because either decision may lead to bankruptcy court.

Harvesting requires awesome outlays for the timber, and for its cutting and processing.

Default, so far the only escape from the contracts, leaves the buyer indebted to the government for the difference between the original bid and the resale price, plus government paperwork expenses. Assume the debt is $200 per thousand board feet on a 5 million-foot contract: The original buyer would owe $1 million—for nothing.

But harvesting may be out of the question.

That's what frightens Fred Sohn, whose Sun Studs mill at Roseburg produces lumber and veneer. Sohn noted at a recent congressional hearing: "The massive asset depletion our company would undergo if we were forced to operate the sales we have under contract would quickly make us insolvent. Our example is not unique."

Sohn, who predicts a loss of $7 million in 1982, said it would climb to $16.4 million in 1986 if he harvests the federal timber he has under contract, chewing up $15.8 million in capital and leaving him $32.4 million in the hole.

E. P. "Bud" Johnson is in the same boat. "I had 60 million board feet under contract on Jan. 1, and I could not operate any of those sales on today's market without staggering losses," the managing partner of C&D Lumber Co. at Riddle told congressmen.

Sohn and Johnson are among Western Oregon lumbermen who, though often reluctantly, joined the frenzied bidding for government stumpage to assure a future supply of timber for their mills.

Bids for national forest and Bureau of Land Management timber had sky-rocketed before, but in the last years of the '70s and the first year and a half of this decade, prices went into orbit.

The average price for national forest Douglas fir saw timber between 1950 and the last quarter of 1979 soar from $16.4 per thousand board feet to $446.10 (both in 1980 dollars). By the last three months of 1979, timber buyers were agreeing to pay nearly twice what they had in 1977. In 1977, the Forest Service reports, the annual average was $225.90 per thousand.

The buyer's problem with what they agreed to do in housing's boom years is easily illustrated, although precise comparisons are a problem because of the difficulty of converting from the 140-year-old Scribner scale the Forest Service uses to measure logs and the actual yield from the logs in a sawmill.

Scribner tends to understate the yield, particularly from a modern, computerized mill, which can get at least 25 percent to 30 percent more lumber from large old-growth logs than Scribner predicts and, at times, more than 100 percent from smaller second-growth logs.

The Forest Service bills timber buyers according to its Scribner tally; mills charge so much for a given size, grade and species of lumber and also have byproducts such as bark, chips and hog fuel that Scribner does not anticipate.

That said, take 1979's average for Douglas fir saw timber on the stump, $446.10 per thousand, measured in Scribner scale.

Add logging and production expenses, using a Forest Service rule of thumb of $250 to $300 per thousand board feet of lumber and higher for veneer. Those are fixed costs.

Still, it is clear that an efficient mill with $446.10 timber still is investing at least $550 in each thousand feet of lumber it produces, assuming a 50 percent overrun, which means 1,500 feet of lumber from each thousand feet of stumpage by Scribner, and a conservative $250 per thousand in logging and production costs.

Blend the old contract timber equally with the new and use the same assumptions: The investment is in the neighborhood of $480 per thousand.

During the week of Aug. 22, the average mill realization dropped to $162 per thousand for the composite of softwood framing lumber that Random Lengths, the Eugene-based wood products report, uses to measure the market.

That is why the federal contracts give timbermen fits.●

KGB FORCES MOSCOW HELSINKI GROUP TO DISCONTINUE ITS ACTIVITY

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, reports from Moscow yesterday indicate that the KGB has managed to halt the activity of the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group, which for more than 6 years, under the most arduous conditions, had been monitoring Soviet compliance with the human rights provisions of the 1975 Helsinki accords. At a press conference in Moscow, Elena Bonner, wife of banished Academician Andrei Sakharov, announced that the Moscow Helsinki Group was being disbanded due to repressive Government actions.

The immediate cause for the group's demise is that group member, Sofya Kalistratrova, 75, who suffers from a heart ailment, is threatened with criminal prosecution for "anti-Soviet slander." Kalistratrova and Bonner, along with Dr. Naum Meiman, were the last three members of the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group still enjoying tenuous liberty. Of the 17 original Moscow Group members, 10 are now in prison or internal exile, and 4 were forced to emigrate from their homeland. Nevertheless, this brave group has managed to publish over 200 documents on human rights abuses in the Soviet Union and calling upon the Soviet Government to observe its Helsinki pledges.

The Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group was founded in May 1976 by Dr. Yuri Orlov, an internationally respected physicist and advocate of human rights. A veteran of World War II and a graduate in physics from Moscow State University, Orlov was a member of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and worked at the prestigious Institute of Theoretical and Experimental Physics of the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences until 1956. He was then expelled from the party and dismissed from his job for speaking out at a party meeting. He moved to Armenia and there obtained his doctoral degree in physics, becoming a corresponding member of the Armenian Academy of Sciences in 1968. Orlov returned to Moscow and was once again dismissed from his job in 1972. Following a 1973 letter in defense of Academician A. D. Sakharov, Orlov lost his post at the Institute of Theoretical and Experimental Physics in 1974 and did not work in his profession again.

From 1974 to 1976, Orlov was active in the defense of political prisoners in the U.S.S.R., signing the "Moscow Appeal" on behalf of Alexandr Solzhenitsyn, participating in the first Unofficial International Scientific Seminar—organized by Jewish refusenik scientists—and campaigning vigorously for the release of Leonid Plyusch, the Ukrainian cyberneticist imprisoned in a psychiatric hospital. In September 1974, Orlov became a founding member of the Moscow chapter of Amnesty International. Besides working to free fellow Amnesty members, Sergei Kovalev and Andrei Tverdokhlebov, after their arrests, Orlov also devoted much time to the prisoners of conscience and torture victims in Spain, Sri Lanka, Yugoslavia, and Uruguay.

Orlov announced the formation of the Moscow Helsinki Group in May 1976 and assumed its chairmanship. After a search and numerous interrogations in early 1977 and a vituperative campaign against him in the Soviet press, Orlov was arrested on February 10, 1977. While he was awaiting trial, the Norwegian Parliament nominated him for the 1978 Nobel Peace Prize. Orlov's case finally came to court in May 1978. On May 18, 1978, Orlov received the maximum penalty under article 70, "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda," 7 years in a strict regimen camp followed by 5 years of internal exile.

When he arrived in labor camp, Yuri Orlov announced to camp authorities that he considered himself to be the camp representative of the Moscow Helsinki Group. In response, Orlov has been told by wardens that he will never leave camp alive. Indeed, it seems that the camp authorities are following instructions to do everything possible to ruin Orlov's health and to try to undermine his spirit: He is isolated in a special section of camp in which he is the only political prisoner. He has been placed in solitary confinement five times and in the camp prison three times for extensive periods of time. Orlov's wife, Irina Valitova, has been denied the visits permitted to her under Soviet law, but has learned that her husband suffers from a virulent form of tuberculosis. Thus, the Soviet Government wreaks vengeance on the pioneering human rights work of a leading physicist: Professor Yuri Orlov. We in the West will continue to speak out in Professor Orlov's defense.

Mr. President, not only did the Moscow Helsinki Group contribute greatly to Western understanding of the Soviet human rights situation, but its example led to the founding of similar Helsinki monitoring groups in Ukraine, Lithuania, Armenia, and Georgia. Although the Kremlin has also managed to suppress temporarily the public activities of these groups, the struggle continues. The English publicist John Morley wrote that "you have not converted a man because you have silenced him."●

SECRETARY OF STATE SHULTZ' SPEECH ON THE MIDDLE EAST

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, last night Secretary of State George P. Shultz gave his first major address since taking office in July. He spoke on the Middle East before the national leadership of the United Jewish Appeal. It came at a unique juncture in history, when events have altered the landscape of Middle East politics. It was therefore appropriate for the Secretary of State to reaffirm vigorously the United States' commitment to peace in this troubled region—peace for both Arabs and Jews. Moreover, he advocated compromise among all parties, and observed wisely that "the path of rejection has achieved nothing but tragedy."

Mr. Shultz speaks of the many challenges confronting Israel and the Arabs—challenges which must be met lest peace continue to elude them. The Secretary of State has clearly accepted the challenge of peace—it is now incumbent upon others to follow.

Mr. President, I commend the Secretary of State's thoughtful remarks to my colleagues, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The speech follows:

EXCERPTS FROM SECRETARY OF STATE'S SPEECH ON THE MIDDLE EAST

My friends and fellow Americans:

No theme is more appropriate for my first speech as Secretary of State than the theme of peace. No objective we share is more worthy or more elusive: to attain it requires realism, strength, the capacity to run risks and the ability to gather trust. It takes sustained good will to build up that trust. And it takes serious, fair and direct bargaining at the negotiating table to hammer out workable and durable agreements.

International institutions and resolutions for peace need practical efforts to give them life. Mankind has made astonishing technological and material leaps in the last 40 years. But we must make equally dramatic gains in the political realm if we are to bequeath a safe and secure world of peace to our children.

I believe we can make those gains. Strength of arms and of will are essential, but no more so than the ability to find that winning mixture of courage and realism. No matter what the obstacles, we must persevere, for there are no more noble nor important goals than peace, freedom and security.

PRESIDENT'S PEACE INITIATIVE

These principles apply fully to that set of goals foremost in our thoughts today—peace in the Middle East, and security and success for Israel and her Arab neighbors. No one who has walked the streets of Jerusalem and Tel Aviv and who has talked at length with as many Israeli people as I have can doubt that they want peace and security, and I am dedicated to helping them achieve both.

Against the backdrop of confrontation, despair and fear that have characterized the search for peace in the Middle East, three key documents spell out how peace might be made a reality:

The first is U.N. Security Council Resolution 242, which established the basis for a negotiating process founded on the idea of an exchange of territory for real peace.

The second is the Camp David Accords, which, in the Egypt-Israel peace treaty, led directly to the realization of such an exchange of territory for peace. Camp David calls for a "just, comprehensive and durable" Middle East peace based on Resolution 242, but builds on it as well by calling for a solution that recognizes "the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and their just requirements" and a "resolution of the Palestinian problem in all its aspects."

APPROACH TO PEACE

And third, there is the President's speech of Sept. 1. This historic address builds on the earlier documents by stating categorically that our approach to peace will continue to be based on Resolution 242, with its concept of an exchange of territory for peace, and the Camp David accords, which provide for Palestinian self-government with full guarantees for Israel's security.

While I cannot summarize for you the totality of a rich and complex speech, I would like to review four important points made by the President:

First, there should be full safeguards for Israeli security, both internal and external, throughout the transitional period and beyond. The President has made this forcefully clear.

Second, as stated in Camp David, there should be a transitional period of five years during which the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza should be permitted to exercise full autonomy.

Third, the U.S. believes that peace cannot be achieved on the basis of Israeli sovereignty over the West Bank and Gaza, but must be based on Resolution 242's formula of an exchange of territory for peace. Our preference is for self-government by the Palestinians in association with Jordan, with the extent of withdrawal determined by the quality of peace offered in return.

Fourth, the United States also believes that peace cannot be achieved by the creation of an independent Palestinian state on the West Bank and Gaza. The President has stated clearly and unequivocally that we will not support an independent Palestinian state in the territories.

A strong, secure Israel is in our interests and the interests of peace. There will be no peace without Israeli security, but Israel will never be secure without peace. Our vision of the future on the West Bank is one guided by a vision of a secure Israel living with defensible borders and by our abiding belief that it is not in Israel's long-term interests to try to rule over the more than one million Palestinians living in the West Bank and Gaza.

Israel has demonstrated once again, at tragic cost, that it will not be defeated militarily. If Israel's adversaries want peace and justice they must recognize, clearly and explicitly, the right of the State of Israel to exist, and they must enter, as President Reagan said, "direct, hard and fair" negotiations with Israel.

For the moderate Arabs, there is the opportunity to demonstrate that the course of negotiations can produce results and serve their vital interests. For Lebanon, there is now a second chance: the chance once again to be free, prosperous and democratic, posing no threat to its neighbors and serving as a stable bridge between the West and the Arab world.

The Palestinians now confront a great decision: whether to continue down the self-destructive road of armed struggle, which has only produced tragedy for the Palestinian people, or to seize the opportunity to affect their destiny by way of the peace process. The Camp David framework upholds the importance of self-government for the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza. And it provides Palestinian representatives the right to participate in the determination if their future at every step in the process.

THE CHALLENGE TO ISRAEL

The challenge that the President had offered to Israel is to extend its hand to welcome wider participation in the peace process. Israel had demonstrated once more its military strength and bravery. But we all recognize that while true peace requires military strength, strength alone is not enough; true peace can only be achieved through lasting negotiated agreements leading ultimately to friendly cooperation between Israel and her neighbors.

The evacuation of the P.L.O. from Beirut and the forceful demonstration of Israeli capability make this an altogether unique moment, a moment of opportunity to end this cycle. Triumphs of statecraft are decisions which join opportunity with action. If this opportunity is allowed to pass it may never come again.

The challenge Israel faces now is to combine diplomacy with power to build an enduring political settlement. There is nothing that says that Palestinian self-government in association with Jordan must lead inevitably to a Palestinian state. The President has said that we will not support such an outcome. It is not beyond the reach of diplomacy to create, not Israeli military power to ensure, that agreed arrangements for the West Bank will not erode over time. U.S. determination that concrete, iron-clad arrangement for the security of Israel accompany the ultimate resolution of the Palestinian question is heightened, not diminished, by the fact that we have views on a desirable direction for the negotiations.

LONG-TERM SECURITY

The crucial point is that when it comes to safeguarding the long-term security of Israel, the friendship and resolve of the United States are second in importance only to Israel's own resolution and strength. And, in the final analysis, that friendship and resolve deserve, in return, to be reciprocated by a willingness to listen with an open mind to the views of others. But let me be clear: we have a right to be heard, but we have no intention of using our support for Israel's security as a way of imposing our views.

We must not underestimate the dilemmas and risks that Israel faces in opting for negotiations, but they are dwarfed by those created by a continuation of the status quo. The United States recognizes its obligations, as the principal supporter of Israel's security, to be understanding of Israel's specific circumstances in the negotiating process. The President has urged consideration of his proposals in the context of negotiations, to be undertaken without preconditions and with no thought of imposed solutions.

That is why the United States particularly asked that the parties themselves not preclude possible outcomes by concrete and perhaps irreversible actions undertaken before the process of negotiation is completed. While we support the right of Jews to live in peace on the West Bank and Gaza under the duly constituted governmental authority there—just as Arabs live in Israel—we regard the continuation of settlement activity prior to the conclusion of negotiations as detrimental to the peace process.

The President has offered a fundamental challenge to the Arabs as well. It is time for the Arab world to recognize the opportunity provided by Camp David. The path of rejection has achieved nothing but tragedy, particularly for the Palestinians. Surely, the pattern of agonies of this capable and courageous people must not be repeated. Alternatively, the Camp David process and the President's fresh start offers a promise of resolution with honor and justice to those with the wisdom to join the peace process. But it also implies a corollary: those who fail to join will miss a precious opportunity, an opportunity for peace that may not come again soon.

There will be, as I have said, no imposed solutions: any point agreed by Israel and its Arab neighbors will not be opposed by us. But at the same time, the United States is now obligated, by reality and morality alike, to make known its views on what we believe is needed to reach a fair, workable and lasting solution.●

SOMETIMES PEOPLE ARE AHEAD OF THEIR LEADERS

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, many times in history the people are ahead of their leaders in perceiving problems. One of those times is, I believe, right now, and the issue has to do with foreign trade. For 35 years now, our people have watched as the country exported jobs, dollars, and technology overseas. As a result of this generation-long subordination of foreign trade to foreign aid, America finds itself in grave economic peril. We are failing to produce adequate wealth as an industrial society, and we are failing to demand fair and equitable treatment from our trading partners. Mr. President, we could balance our Federal budget tomorrow and we could bring interest rates down, and much as those two actions would accomplish, they would not solve these even more fundamental problems of the production of wealth and its trade.

I bring this subject up today not to discuss it at great length with my colleagues, but to call attention to how keenly Americans feel what unfair trade is doing to us as a nation. Recently, Dr. Kitty Dickerson, a highly respected professor in the College of Home Economics at the University of Missouri-Columbia, conducted a study of consumer attitudes toward imports in one specific area—apparel. The results of this impartial and scientifically done study speak for themselves. Suffice it to say that consumers are cognizant of where their apparel is produced; they do prefer American-made products; and they believe it is bad national policy to run trade deficits such as those we have been having for so many years. The unmistakable majority opinion of those interviewed in this survey is that tougher laws are needed to control apparel imports.

It is time for American policymakers to wake up to what is going on. Other countries have stacked the deck against America, and we refuse to respond, even to recognize the problem. Those who wish to continue making American policy ought to recall the words of Gandhi, "There go my people. I must catch them for I am their leader."

Mr. President, I ask that Dr. Dickerson's survey results be printed in today's edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The survey follows:

THE AMERICAN CONSUMER LOOKS AT LABELS

Survey results showed that American consumers are concerned about the country of origin of the apparel they buy and rate domestic apparel superior to foreign merchandise.

THE AMERICAN CONSUMER THINKS THERE IS A NEED FOR TOUGHER FEDERAL LAWS LIMITING IMPORTS

One question sought consumers' views on stronger federal regulations to limit imported clothing.

14. Do you think our federal government should pass stronger laws that would limit the amount of clothing that could be shipped into the U.S. from other countries?

[1] Interviewers asked the questions in the form presented. Response alternatives shown were not read to the respondents. The researcher felt that giving consumers options for answers would tend to bias their answers.

[2] Consumers who answered "no" to the previous question are included in this percentage.

Other questions provided data on demographic characteristics and purchasing practices. Responses to each item were cross-tabulated with those from other items and analyzed statistically for patterns in consumers' views and for profiles according to demographic characteristics and purchasing patterns. These cross-tabulations indicated that consumers most concerned about the imported clothing issue were middle-aged and middle-income. Women were more concerned than men. Those least concerned were the youngest and oldest, and the highest and lowest income groups.

The study was conducted by Dr. Kitty Dickerson at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University and the University of Missouri-Columbia and was funded entirely by grants from the U.S.D.A.'s Agriculture Research Service and the Virginia Tech Experiment Station.

HOW THE STUDY WAS DONE

Trained interviewers telephoned 1,350 consumers in major cities, small towns and rural areas in 32 states. The consumers represented a cross section of the population from lower, middle, and upper economic classes.

The study was conducted by Dr. Kitty Dickerson and was begun in 1980 and completed in 1981. It was funded with grants from the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Agricultural Research Service and the Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University Experiment Station at Blacksburg, Virginia.●

SENATOR HELMS CAPTURES LIBERAL HIGH GROUND

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, columnist Mary Meehan has provided a great service by examining Senator JESSE HELMS' latest "human life bill." She correctly points out that this abortion initiative has captured the liberal high ground on the human rights issue by affirming the right to life of unborn children.

I also note that the advocates of the "right" to abortion are filibustering this eminently humane piece of legislation, apparently with the idea in mind that, if the Senate is not permitted to act on this bill, the abortion issue will simply disappear. They are wrong. The death of millions of unborn children is not that easily ignored. I hope that some of my pro-choice friends will permit the Senate to choose whether or not public policy will encourage or discourage this cruel and inhumane practice.

Mr. President, I ask that the article by Mary Meehan from the September 7, 1982, issue of the Washington Times be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Times, Sept. 7, 1982]

SEN. HELMS CAPTURES LIBERAL HIGH GROUND

(By Mary Meehan)

Sen. Jesse Helms of North Carolina has placed Senate liberals in a difficult position by offering his latest "human life bill" as an amendment to the debt ceiling bill. So difficult that some of them may develop the Senate version of diplomatic flu before the roll is called on ending the filibuster led by Sen. Robert Packwood of Oregon.

Most liberals assume that anything Helms is for, they should be against. But this time they may find that crafty Ol' Jesse has captured their high ground. And they will be surrounded, not so much by the Helms troops as by their own past statements on human rights.

The Helms bill cites several international documents, including a 1959 United Nations declaration which "affirmed that every child needs appropriate legal protection before as well as after birth." It cites our Declaration of Independence, with its affirmation of the right to life; widespread state restrictions on abortion prior to the 1973 Supreme Court decision; and the fact that U.S. agencies "protect human life before birth from working place hazards, the effects of dangerous pharmaceuticals, and other hazardous substances." It also says that "scientific evidence demonstrates the life of each human being begins at conception."

Liberals are unlikely to attack the international community, the Declaration of Independence, or efforts to protect the unborn from dangerous drugs and chemicals. They will find other objections to the Helms bill.

First, they will say that when human life begins is not a scientific question. Yet scientists keep writing about it, and their consensus—conclusively proved by the "test tube babies"—is that each human life begins at conception.

Some pro-choice people say their religions teach that a soul is infused only at viability or at birth. They contend that scientific evidence about conception is irrelevant. They may also believe that the earth is flat, but we cannot base public policy on their beliefs. The law cannot deal with arguments about souls; the law has no competence in theology.

The second point of opposition to the Helms bill will be its finding that the Supreme Court, in the 1973 Roe v. Wade abortion case, "erred in not recognizing the humanity of the unborn child and the compeling interest of the several states in protecting the life of each person before birth." Yet the court was wrong on Dred Scott v. Sandford and Plessy v. Ferguson, and many who have studied law and history believe it was mistaken in the abortion case.

Some liberals insist that a constitutional amendment is the only proper way to correct error by the Supreme Court. This is what Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan D-N.Y., said when he testified against an early version of the Helms bill. But a different view appeared in an essay called "When the Supreme Court is Wrong" in Moynihan's 1980 book, Counting Our Blessings. Contending that the court was wrong on a major press case and on aid to parochial schools, he suggested that Congress should keep passing legislation based on its own constitutional point of view.

Liberals' opposition to the human life bill was also undermined by their recent votes in favor of the Voting Rights Act amendments, which contradicted the 1980 Supreme Court decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden.

Sen. Helms knows that Congress cannot "overturn" the court on abortion by passing his bill. The best Congress can do is to pressure the court to re-examine its 1973 abortion decision. In view of the millions of lives at stake another look at that decision is not very much to ask.

The third point of opposition to the Helms bill will be its comprehensive ban on federal funding of abortion and "training in the techniques for performing abortions." This will put liberals in the uncomfortable position of defending techniques that include dismemberment, salt poisoning, and delivering the child so early that her lungs cannot breath the air. Abortion has become the liberals' Vietnam.

Attacks on Jesse Helms are likely to be the forth point of opposition to his bill. Yet no one who has watched him closely can doubt his sincerity on the abortion issue. His position is at best a mixed blessing in his home state—one of the few that still funds Medicaid abortions.

Last year Helms remarked that he wished there were "some way my conscience could let me walk away from this issue. My life would be a great deal more comfortable. But neither Sen. Packwood nor any other senator has ever answered my repeated questions about the deliberate termination of innocent human life." He also said. "I have never questioned the good faith of anyone who disagrees with me . . . . I reflect on no one's sense of morality. But I am saying that this issue is the most fundamental of all."

Liberals can keep their reputation as protectors of the poor and the helpless by standing with Helms in defense of the unborn. Those who cannot should at least try to answer his questions.●

JAPAN MAY END QUOTAS, SEND MORE CARS TO UNITED STATES

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, this morning's Detroit Free Press carried a story indicating that Japan is giving serious consideration to waiving the third year of the voluntary import restraint agreement on autos because the American auto industry is "doing so well."

Their perception of the state of the industry is untrue and their thinking is unacceptable.

As we begin a new model year, sales for 1982 hit record lows and unemployment soared to new highs. Where profits were achieved, they came through real and painful reductions in costs and not through increased sales. The "recovery" noted by the Japanese was a miracle, a Lazarus-like reprieve from the grave. But the industry, like the raised Lazarus, is not at all a pretty sight to see even though we welcome the opportunity to see it again.

For the Japanese to conclude that since the American auto industry is now able to lift its head again, it is now time to put on the gloves and go a few rounds is the height of absurdity and insensitivity.

Additionally, the Free Press article suggests that one of the factors causing Japan to consider waiving the third year may well be congressional consideration of the local content bill. The article quotes a Mr. Nao, deputy director of the auto division of the Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry, as saying that local content is "a slap in the face" of Japanese industry, and goes on to suggest that "we are angry because we have tried to help the U.S. auto industry by restraining our exports, but you in the U.S. keep pointing fingers at us."

Well, Mr. President, I find that kind of statement to be offensive, an intrusion into our internal affairs and downright objectionable coming, as it does, from a representative of a nation we helped rebuild after World War II and whom we now spend billions to defend while they refuse to spend the resources they promised to commit to improving their national defense.

Mr. President, this latest statement by the Japanese may be, as the Free Press pointed out, a "negotiating posture," but it is a dangerous one. I trust that my colleagues will agree that it illustrates the problems associated with allowing Japan to determine when the American industry was healthy enough to allow for a return to "unrestrained trade." In addition, I trust it also demonstrates to my colleagues why we need to adopt local content legislation so that foreign firms could produce autos here and better understand the state of our market.●

HONORING DR. LEON FILL

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, on September 29, Dr. Leon Fill of Huntington Woods, Mich., will be the guest of honor at a dinner sponsored by the Bar-Ilan University. Dr. Fill is being recognized for his philanthropic and leadership efforts on behalf of Bar-Ilan University.

Certainly that award is justified; but it does not do justice to all that Leon Fill has done. His efforts on behalf of Bar-Ilan have been extensive, but they have just been a part of his good works.

Leon Fill has been involved in a host of activities and been a member of a variety of different charitable organizations. As a member of the medical community, Leon Fill has been active in various professional organizations. His involvement generalized into a concern about the education process and, as a result, he served as the President of the State Board of Education in Michigan. His involvement goes far beyond his profession. As an active citizen of his community, Leon Fill has been deeply involved in the political process. Fortunately, most of the time he has supported Democrats, but on occasion he has been known to stray into less happy fields. The fact that I can forgive him for that error in judgment should be ample evidence of the regard I have for him and for his work.

Finally, I think it is fitting to point to Leon Fill's efforts on behalf of both the Jewish community and the entire community of Detroit. Leon Fill's contributions to the Jewish community in Detroit are more than monetary; his willingness to offer his counsel and support have made him a respected leader whose advice is solicited and followed. And as a resident of Detroit, Leon Fill has done more than his share in supporting the culture of our community from A to Z—beginning at the art institute and ending at the zoo.

There is a tendency, I fear, to view tributes of the kind that Leon Fill will receive later this month as the capstone of a career. Instead, I would commend the words of Dag Hammarskjöld who said that "you have not done enough, you have never done enough so long as it is still possible that you have something to contribute." And, Mr. President, Leon Fill still has a great deal to contribute.●

ACCESSIBILITY FOR THE PHYSICALLY DISABLED

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, one issue of primary importance to most of the members of my State is equal access to opportunity and services to all citizens. In my opinion, one of the major roles of the Federal Government is to insure equity to all our people.

Specifically, today I would like to talk about section 504 regulations. Since 1973, this country has modified its perception of physically disabled people. In the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, Congress mandated that disabled people can come out of the closet and be part of the American dream and lifestyle. Each person has worth and can contribute to this Nation. Government policies should not stand in the way of individuals striving to reach their potential.

Presently the section 504 regs are being reexamined. I am very much in favor of reviewing regulations and eliminating cumbersome, intrusive, and cost-ineffective regulations. In the case of section 504 regulations, I am very concerned the proposed changes are detrimental. I have written Attorney General Smith regarding my concerns. I also wrote to Mike McConnell of OMB on this issue. I ask that the text of my letter to Mr. McConnell be printed following my remarks.

I think it is essential that each Senator review these changes and communicate with OMB. We must represent all citizens of our States and treat people with individual respect and dignity. Reducing accessibility for the physically disabled robs our society of valuable resources and denies basic right to large numbers of our citizens.

The letter referred to is as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D.C., August 25, 1982.

MIKE MCCONNELL,
Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs, OMB, Old Executive Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MCCONNELL: I am concerned with the proposed changes in the draft section on the 1978 HEW Section Guidelines of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.

As you know, Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 provides that "No otherwise qualified individual in the United States . . . shall, solely by reason of his handicap, be excluded from the participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subject to, discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." Clearly, the intent of Congress is to provide equal access to programs for handicapped individuals, The language of the current regulations is explicit in defining implementation of equal access and opportunity to education.

My main concern is that the definitions in the regulations remain explicit and precise, yet allow flexible implementation on the local level. I am confident that states intend to provide suitable services for individuals with disability. However, in these times of budget difficulties, it is possible that some state legislatures may opt to find loop holes in broad definitions to limit handicapped special services.

For example, the deletion of the word "appropriate" in "appropriate educational services must be provided" is vital. Without this one word the door is open for local school districts to decide to eliminate special services for students with handicaps. Secondly, there is a tremendous difference between providing "equal opportunities" as the regulations now state and "substantially equal opportunities." I do not believe that the intent of Congress was to provide "substantially" equal opportunities, which infers less than equal opportunities. Rather, it was to provide fully equal opportunities.

I am also concerned with the OMB's position on the comment period and regional hearings for Section 504. I am aware that the OMB has supported a 60-day comment period which would involve no regional hearings. I would encourage a reevaluation of these decisions. The DREDF (Disabled Rights and Education Defense Fund) has issued a challenge to each state to send to the administration a minimum of 1,000 letters calling for 10 regional hearings and a 120-day comment period in which the public may comment on the proposed changes. I am in favor of the hearings and extended comment period. Both would allow for more discussion and public input on this important issue effecting a significant portion of the population. Through the exchange I feel we can more readily move towards the Congressional mandate of equal access for all persons under federal programs.

I would appreciate your further examination of these two aspects. I am confident that we are both working towards the same goals of equal opportunity and so will support whatever means will best achieve this end.

Sincerely,

DAVE DURENBURGER,
U.S. Senator.●

THE KGB FORCES THE END OF THE MOSCOW HELSINKI GROUP

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, Elena Bonner, wife of banished Soviet human rights activist, academician Andrei Sakharov, held a press conference on September 8, in Moscow to announce the dissolution of the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group. According to Bonner, "the increasingly difficult situation" and "pressure from the authorities" had forced the last three members of the Moscow Helsinki Group to cease their activities. One of these three members, attorney Sofya Kalistratova, is threatened by the authorities with prosecution and a prison term. Kalistratova is 75 years old and suffers from a heart ailment. For her, a jail sentence would be tantamount to a death sentence.

The Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group was established in May 1976 to monitor Soviet compliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. Following the example of the Moscow Group, other Soviet Helsinki groups were founded in Ukraine, Georgia, Lithuania, and Armenia. By publicizing Soviet violations of human rights and calling upon their Government to observe the principles to which it had agreed at Helsinki, the Helsinki monitors were soon themselves harassed, imprisoned, exiled, or forced to emigrate from their homeland.

One of the most blatant cases of Soviet repression against the Moscow Helsinki monitors concerns that of Vladimir Slepak, a 54-year-old engineer. Slepak was the leading Jewish activist—the "dean of Jewish refuseniks"—before his arrest. He was initially denied permission to emigrate in April 1970 on the grounds that his previous work had been classified. But even after the 5-year period in which secrecy restrictions are applicable had elapsed, he was refused an exit visa. He worked in a television equipment factory until 1957 and, thereafter, as chief of research laboratory on TV and impulse apparatus until he was dismissed because he filed an application to emigrate. Slepak joined the Moscow Helsinki Group on June 17, 1976.

The Slepak family has long been the target of systematic harassment by the authorities. Vladimir has been fired from numerous jobs, tailed, searched, beaten, had his telephone disconnected and apartment bugged, and has been imprisoned about 25 times for periods of 10 to 15 days. A March 1977 article in Izvestiya accused Slepak of treason against the U.S.S.R. The elder son, Aleksandr, was allowed to emigrate to Israel on October 27, 1977. On that same day, the younger son, Leonid, who has been expelled from the institute where he was studying, received a draft notice. Induction into the army might have delayed Leonid's emigration due to secrecy restrictions. Leonid emigrated in April 1979.

On June 1, 1978, Vladimir and his wife, Maria, were arrested for displaying a protest banner which read, "Let us go to our son in Israel," from the balcony of their Moscow apartment. Mrs. Slepak was released from custody the following evening, but on June 21, 1978, Vladimir was sentenced to 5 years of internal exile for "malicious hooliganism"—article 206 of the RSFSR Criminal Code.

Mr. President, the dissolution of the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group, or more specifically, the KGB pressure that brought about this dissolution, is a most ominous development, not only for the Soviet people, but for the entire cause of security and cooperation in Europe. The deliberations at the upcoming CSCE Review Conference in Madrid will certainly be complicated by the knowledge of this latest example of the Soviet Government's repression against its citizens who simply ask that their Government live up to agreements to which its representatives have affixed their signatures.●

NEW PUBLIC MARKETS FOR THE PRIVATE SECTOR

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, we are beginning to see important changes in the delivery of public services in this country. In response to the cry for more efficient and responsive services, combined with the realization that Government has overstepped its service capabilities and responsibilities, we have begun to reevaluate our entire public service delivery system. Questions are being asked: Which services are being provided? How are they produced? Who produces them? Who benefits from them? And who makes the decisions?

Part of the solution to our overspent and undereffective public service system is the business sector, rich with resources and based upon efficiency and innovation. President Reagan has predicted "a torrent of private initiatives that will astound the advocates of big government." Although it is not yet a torrent, it is considerably more than a trickle.

The private sector is now actively exploring ways in which it can benefit by providing for the needs of the employee and the community, contributing in a direct way by producing public services—alone, in cooperation with Government and other organizations, competitively, for-profit, not-for-profit. Many businesses already are engaged in such projects; many others are in the planning stages.

At the same time, businesses are understandably skeptical about this concept of entering public service markets formerly monopolized by Government. In most firms, community service traditionally has been confined to direct dollar donations. With few exceptions, community action has not been considered a vital component of corporate planning and administration, nor has it involved a broad range of business resources. However, this traditional tunnel-vision view of corporate community involvement is beginning to change.

Among the commentaries I have read concerning this shift in private sector perception, I am particularly impressed by an article in the July issue of Enterprise magazine, published by the National Association of Manufacturers. The article, "New Public Markets for the Private Sector," was written by Peter C. Brown, a Minneapolis consultant specializing in alternative service delivery.

Mr. Brown's article outlines strategies for companies to effectively enter public service markets. Among his major points: A business should specifically identify the services and resources it has to offer; it should search out specific needs in the community and fit the firm's skills to the proper project; and whether or not the project is profit-based, the company should take a business approach to its administration, with an eye on expenditures, revenues and results.

The article by Peter Brown is an excellent basic guide for companies seeking to enter the public service market. His view—and mine as well—is that the private sector can move into this emerging market to the long-term benefit of both company and the community. I ask that Mr. Brown's article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

NEW PUBLIC MARKETS FOR THE PRIVATE SECTOR

(By Peter C. Brown)

In a "single bold stroke," President Reagan has cut away $47 billion in federal programs and challenged private enterprise to take the lead in addressing the tough social problems of our country.

But in most companies, the experience curve for addressing social problems ends with grants and loaned executives. If you are in this group, the idea of doing more may be the "right" thing to do but not the prudent thing.

Yes, public services need overhauling to incorporate market forces and business principles. But how do you justify jumping into an arena that is fragmented, highly politicized and run by career bureaucrats who have everything to lose from change? Problems with public services are deep-seated and long-standing. What chance does a company like yours have against such inertia? And in these hard times?

The doubts are appropriate. But they can be overcome.

Public services are just now emerging as a potential market. Many opportunities are undiscovered as are the strategies for benefiting from participation in an arena previously monopolized by government. Following are strategies for creating public service ventures, for-profit, as well as not-for-profit, through which you can move into this emerging market to the long-term benefit of both your company and the community.

Identify what you have to offer. Many business leaders embrace the idea of private initiative in public services but simply don't see the pertinent skills in their own companies. What is a circuit-board manufacturer good at besides making circuit boards? Probably many things.

Most successful corporations have a host of finely tuned overhead and administrative resources often lacking in small public service agencies: accounting, purchasing, asset management, insurance, personnel management, benefits administration, facilities management, etc. Big companies have large-scale management skills and the ability to carry out complex development projects against negotiated budgets and timetables. They have geographic access and economies of scale not available to local government and nonprofit agencies.

Corporate managers understand risk analysis, market analysis and experimentation. They understand how to forge partnerships and joint ventures with other producers who bring components or technologies essential to achieve a market advantage, or shared production capacity to achieve economies of scale for enhancing profitability. These qualities translate to rich resources for meeting community needs.

When you try to determine what your company does well, look at how it meets its own needs in addition to how it serves its market. A company that has a commuter van-pooling service for its employees might contract with government-funded social service agencies in its vicinity. The idea is to transport social service recipients during daytime hours when the vans are idle, thus eliminating the need for each agency to have its own vehicle. A consumer company or utility with an efficient billing and collections system may be able to replace sluggish procedures for processing and depositing local tax revenues.

Look at the corporation as a problem-solving institution, not a loose collection of people, equipment, facilities and capital. Lending an employee with technical expertise to a government agency may help the agency solve a technical problem. Contributing used desks and vacant office space may help cut costs. Subsidizing a non-profit agency's operating costs may help it stay in business or serve more clients. These contributions help the community but do not tap the greatest resources of the company: its ability to identify market needs and develop and carry out solutions to meet them.

Get close to the problem. Few corporate managers get close enough to any particular community need or public service to envision a better solution, or find the fit with their company's skills and resources. Doing volunteer work or contributing funds and equipment isn't the same as taking a close, critical look at how a problem is being addressed and considering a feasible alternative. But getting a leg up in a private market requires finding a smarter solution. The same principle applies in the public service arena. And to find a smarter solution, you must know the territory.

One starting point is to decide what community problem represents your target of opportunity. Look around at what others have identified as critical community needs. A good choice is a need that has a strong constituency in the community, is not encumbered with great controversy and is of direct concern to your company. Maybe the problem affects the firm's operations (such as a poorly qualified labor supply), or maybe you have already invested heavily in it (such as subsidizing housing rehabilitation around your headquarters), or maybe it costs you money (e.g., supporting disabled employees). Pick a problem important to the CEO; pick one you have an idea about solving, one you have a hunch fits your company's knowhow. Try to build on self-interests wherever you can find them.

Don't undercut your chances of success by tackling too many community problems or initating multiple ventures on a hit-or-miss basis. Pick a target and become sufficiently knowledgeable about it to be confident in your approach. When you've handled it successfully, you can broaden your reach or take on another problem.

Designate a skilled person to identify the underlying issues and determine how the company might address them. Choose someone who understands your biases and interests and is a broad, creative thinker. A common tactic is to pick a professional in the field being studied. But unless you find a professional who is cut from a different cloth than his or her colleagues, you'll probably find yourself with recommendations to do what everyone else in the field has tried but found didn't work.

If you want to find a market niche where none is currently perceived, you must look at the problem in a different way. Let's say you're looking at a public service that is losing government funding. Why does the service need to be subsidized? Why isn't it provided by the private market? Is it an overlooked opportunity? Some services fell from the private market into government subsidization because the potential for profit didn't compete with other opportunities for private investment, and government moved in aggressively. Vocational education is an example.

Other services originated in the public sector as extensions of related public activities. Providing technical assistance to small businesses, for instance, has been an outgrowth of huge public expenditures in economic development. But which is better equipped to foster entrepreneurism: government or business? There is value in asking whether demand and market conditions may have caught up to these and other services so they could be delivered on a breakeven or profitable basis.

Maybe the business opportunity lies in redesigning the service itself, or the way in which it is delivered. Perhaps the introduction of technology, or larger geographic scale, or better management, or use of paraprofessional personnel could turn this service into a profitable venture. Or maybe a joint venture that brings a better mix of skills or spreads the risks makes it feasible as a private initiative.

Brainstorm alternative services. Is the current approach a "treatment" that must be subsidized, such as housing rehab? Could a "prevention" strategy be substituted as a private service—such as creating a mix of maintenance, financing, warrantee, and do-it-yourself counseling services sold to homeowners (to help them keep up their homes through private contractors and their own efforts)?

Look for parallels in business. Some corporations subsidize low-yield operations with revenues from high-yield operations. AT&T's rates for long-distance calling are an example, where higher profits from high-traffic lines offset lower profits from lower-traffic lines. Nonprofit social service agencies are largely dependent on grants to fund services for poor and disadvantaged clients. Yet demand for social services in corporations and among middle- and upper-income families is growing. Can the agencies be helped to penetrate profitable new markets that can offset some of the costs of serving their low-income clientele? Can your company help them reach those markets?

Another parallel in business is the development of economies of scale through aggregation and collaboration. Administration and facilities managements are a bugaboo to many nonprofit agency executives who are trained as social service specialists. We have spent years trying to train agency directors to perform tasks better contracted out. Each agency suffers from the high cost of providing services on such a small scale, not to mention the incompatibility in skills and interests. Isn't your corporation already solving such problems for its own operating divisions through service standardization and centralized delivery? Couldn't private sector franchise and holding company arrangements be adapted to standardize and aggregate overhead functions in the human services sector?

Businesses that provide contracted facilities management and administration in the health-care industry could be helped to reach new markets. How about child care, community corrections, nursing homes and mental retardation facilities? Can economies in overhead functions be gained without interfering in the client/practitioner relationship or constraining the service ingenuity of the individual service agency? Can your company collaborate with an established, small contract-management firm to reach these markets?

When you look at the problem you want to tackle, think broadly. Talk to professionals in the field, to consumers and to people in business. Rethink what the problem is, what the service is, who the buyer is, who the consumer is. Look for ways to work the margins to your benefit through technology, management skills, scale and lower-cost personnel. Think about selling prevention in place of treatment. Look for parallels in private business.

Find the fit. Probably the hardest step in developing a public service venture is finding the appropriate fit with your company's skills. Many opportunities for intervention can be identified and a range of skills found inside the company. But, if the two don't fit, you don't have a feasible business opportunity.

In some cases, a new venture idea may have enough potential to be worth pursuing even if you don't have all the needed skills. In that case, you must develop the missing skills in-house or find them outside. The latter course may involve hiring someone with special knowhow or finding a joint venture partner. It may mean acquiring an innovative small company or nonprofit agency that has developed the skills you need but lacks the capital, management skills and geographic access to penetrate the market significantly.

Finding the right fit also involves internal considerations beyond the immediate skills and resources of the company. Each company has its own style, tolerance for risk and ability to innovate. Each has its own markets and marketing networks, technologies and business development objectives. Finding the fit between community problems and your corporation's skills and resources will build on the strengths and account for the gaps.

Take a business approach. Many successful leaders seem to lose their bearings when they become involved with public service. They don't ask the important questions, such as what are we trying to achieve and how will we know when we have made progress? Result-oriented management practices are especially needed—and hard to find—in the "soft" services. Measures of results achieved, costs incurred and revenues earned apply whether the task is job training, health care or commuter transit. Sometimes, the salient financial measure is profits. Often, it is costs saved (commuter transit), subsidies reduced (getting disabled employees back to work) or tax revenues generated (creating new jobs).

The corporation may come to the venture through any of three avenues. It may be a profit-based initiative that represents a logical next step in the company's new business development activities, and that justifies a substantial capital investment and management commitment on the merits of its potential ultimate financial return.

It may be a not-for-profit initiative that represents an extension of the company's charitable and social responsibility activities, and that justifies investment and commitment on its potential to achieve an important public affairs objective.

It may be a limited-profit venture tied to philanthropy, which operates like a profit-oriented business venture but offers less than a normal return, the cost of which is charged off against the company's philanthropic budget. Under this hybrid strategy, a relatively small philanthropic contribution leverages a substantial capital investment in the new venture, which commands the best technology and management resources of the corporation in its execution. It serves a public affairs objective but may also provide a footing from which a profit-based initiative ensues.

Consider the value of approaching the venture on a partnership basis. Much of what needs doing in the community requires skills or resources that exceed the capacities of individual organizations. Nonprofit agencies and small firms have market sensitivity, public service expertise, commitment and community organizing skills. But they lack capital and scale, market access and sophisticated management skills. Corporations have the management skills, technology, market analysis skills, scale and capital, but they lack social service expertise, public service experience and, often, neighborhood trust.

Feasible ventures can be designed around partnerships between corporations and nonprofit agencies or small businesses. This kind of partnership is not common in the public service sector, but it has been forged from time to time in the private market. Innovation, the sine qua non of small firms, is exceedingly expensive in large companies. Consequently, many corporations have diversified and gained a market edge by acquiring or collaborating with innovative small businesses. The same principle applied to public service suggests many opportunities. For example, an enterprising corporation that already has experience with a nonprofit agency—such as buying services from the agency for the firm's employee assistance program—may be able to utilize a franchise or hold company structure in partnership with the nonprofit to market those services to employers across the country.

If you can, build the venture into your line operations. Many community initiatives are carried out by corporate staff separately from the firm's main business activities. But if you are drawing on the skills of the business as an institution rather than a collection of resources, you'll be most effective if you can merge the implementation milestones into line managers' performance objectives.

If you've found a close fit with current capabilities, you'll have a reasonable feel for how quickly the venture should come up to speed. If the fit is less natural and the territory unfamiliar, allow for experimentation and greater development expense. Make outside experts available. Treat the learning curve as a research and development cost. Help your people be energized and refreshed by the new effort, not saddled with unrealistic goals. But be sure they know your eye is on the results.

Measure the benefits and build on success. The public services sector is assuming many characteristics of a viable market: heightened competition for limited service funds, new interest among government administrators in measuring results and improving productivity, a turn to user fees and consumer choice, increased contracting out and use of vouchers, and a growing demand for social services in corporations and middle- and upper-income families. The current delivery system serving this emerging market is fragmented and inefficient without the mechanisms even for measuring costs and results achieved. Many of the technologies, management tools and collaborative arrangements developed to gain market advantage in the private sector have been overlooked entirely for application to enhance public service productivity.

For corporations with an eye to the service market over the long term, public service ventures can establish an early market position for profitable future growth.

In the near term, public service ventures can help the community restructure the ways in which it meets its needs. They can also help the corporation achieve difficult public affairs objectives such as strengthening the local economy and the community's self-reliance, reducing the grant-dependency of local service agencies, and providing new avenues for employee growth and satisfaction.

How you measure success depends on what your objectives are going into the venture. Make a profit? Reduce a cost of business? Generate tax revenues? Create jobs? Put people back to work? Increase the serviceable lifetime of a neighborhood's housing stock? Enhance the corporate image? You must decide what combinations of potential benefits and risks justify your initiative.

Be sure to take full measure of the results you achieve. Only then can you satisfy yourself and your stockholders that the return justifies the investment, and only by understanding your successes can you build on them. Building on the successes may enable you to improve your results and achieve them in more communities, or go deeper into the problem to tackle related issues: figuring out how to build on a successful internal van pool service by marketing to clusters of smaller employers (none of which is large enough to create his own); establishing other transportation-related services (such as shuttling social service recipients to service agencies); or helping form a private fleet management firm to meet local government transportation needs. If you can gain a toehold, understand your success, then build on it—you've done a lasting service to your company and community alike.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

TEMPORARY INCREASE IN THE PUBLIC DEBT LIMIT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will resume consideration of the pending business, which the clerk will state.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 520) to provide for a temporary increase in the public debt limit.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

AMENDMENT NO. 2040

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the Baucus amendment No. 2040.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of amendment numbered 2039 add the following: "It is the sense of the Congress that the Federal courts must remain open to litigants whose claims arise out of the Federal Constitution. Furthermore, it is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is and article 5 of the Constitution specifically provides a mechanism to respond to the constitutional decisions of the Supreme Court.".

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am about to send to the desk a cloture motion against further debate on the Helms second-degree amendment.

Before I do so, for those listening about the Senate, I wish to report that I have advised the minority leader that I intend to file this motion, and I have advised the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Oregon. I believe all parties who are principal to this debate are aware of the fact that I intend to file this motion that will produce a vote on Wednesday.

Mr. President, it is my hope that later in the day we can clear on both sides a unanimous-consent agreement that the vote on this motion will occur at 5 p.m. on Wednesday. But I will not now put that request.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk and ask the clerk to state it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair, without objection, directs the clerk to read the motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on amendment number 2038 to amendment number 2031, as modified, to the committee substitute to House Joint Resolution 520, a joint resolution to provide for a temporary increase in the public debt limit.

Jesse Helms, Roger W. Jepsen, Jeremiah Denton, Paul Laxalt, Paula Hawkins, Orrin G. Hatch, Don Nickles, Bob Kasten, Howard H. Baker, Jr., John P. East, Steven D. Symms, Strom Thurmond, Charles E. Grassley, Edward Zorinsky, Jake Garn, James Abdnor, and Robert Dole.

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, as I say, at a later time I intend to confer with the minority leader and with the two principal adversaries in this debate, that is to say, Senator HELMS and Senator PACKWOOD, as well as Senator WEICKER and others, in an attempt to get a time certain other than that time provided for in rule XXII for this vote to occur on Wednesday next.

Mr. President, I may also say that at some point it is my intention to try to reach the Hatch amendment to the Constitution, and I will consult further with the Senator from North Carolina, the Senator from Oregon, and the minority leader about that. But Senators should be aware of the fact that at some point it is my present intention to attempt to move to consideration of the Hatch amendment during some day this week.

Mr. President, I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUDMAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

TEMPORARY INCREASE IN THE PUBLIC DEBT LIMIT

The Senate continued with the consideration of House Joint Resolution 520.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, last Thursday, I voted against cloture because I support my friend from Oregon who is for allowing women the freedom to choose safe, legal abortions and is against overturning the Supreme Court's decision in Roe against Wade. While I have the highest respect for the views of those who oppose the freedom to choose abortions, I will again oppose cloture for the same reasons I voted against it last Thursday.

The controversy over abortion is not going to go away—not today, not tomorrow, not next year. The two sides now facing each other are so diametrically opposed on the subject that it will not be resolved, regardless of what this Congress should decide to do. If the prochoice forces should prevail this time around, that will not deter the prolife forces from mounting future legislative attempts to work their will in the Congress. By the same token, if the prolife forces were to prevail—if this amendment should pass and be made law—the opposition would not rest until it had reversed its loss.

Like two great wrestlers, these determined adversaries will continue to struggle, neither side allowing itself to be pinned down and only increasing its efforts when the other appears to be prevailing. The only hope is that, in the future, Congress will not allow this issue to so bind it that it cannot carry out its constitutional responsibilities. Indeed, I hope that we will not allow any single issue, however important, to prevent us from passing a budget, increasing the debt limit, providing for the national defense, or carrying out the other duties we were elected to perform.

I can appreciate the strong feelings on both sides of the issue, as my own convictions are strong. As a conservative who supports the Constitution, I am compelled to support the freedom of women to choose abortions.

The Constitution of the United States is, in a sense, a negative document. This is especially true of the Bill of Rights. It recognizes that Government is necessary to secure the rights and freedoms of the citizenry and then goes about carefully defining what Government is and what it can and cannot do. Where the rights of the people are concerned, it is liberal, but where it defines the powers of Government, it is extremely conservative.

The Bill of Rights says that the Government shall not establish a religion. The Government shall not order troops into your house without your permission. All sorts of inhibitions are placed upon the Government. From the point of view of the Bill of Rights, the attitude toward government is conservative. Its authors had just fought a war against a Big Brother type of government and were determined that such a government not exist here.

In creating Congress, the authors of the Constitution allowed the legislative body the powers necessary to allow an efficient, unified nation, but kept from it the power to intrude in the personal lives of its citizens. Article I, section 8 spells out what Congress can do. It can collect taxes, borrow money, regulate commerce, and so on. But, like the other branches of Government, Congress is not granted the authority to regulate the lives of individual citizens.

It is interesting to note that the Bill of Rights begins with the words "Congress shall make no law * * *" and ends with the granting of all undelegated powers to the States and the people.

As time has passed a number of attempts have been made to expand the scope of the Constitution to allow the Government to intrude in the lives of individual citizens, for example, the prohibition amendment. I view the efforts to outlaw abortions as such attempts. It is not the place of government, particularly an overwhelmingly male Congress, to tell American women what they can and cannot do with their bodies, and it is not the place of Congress to make religious or philosophical determinations such as when life begins.

While I realize that there are those who disagree with my views, I know that everyone in this body agrees with me when I say that no one here wants any woman to have an abortion. None of us want any person to go through the mental anguish and physical pain of having an abortion. All of us want every child to be born into families that want and love them. If they were, we would not be wrestling with a flood of crime and social problems.

So even if we cannot reach a consensus on the issue, we can at least agree that the need for abortions should be reduced. I would suggest that by improving the education of our people about human reproduction and increasing the research of safe, effective contraceptives we can do just that.

Mr. President, Judy Mann had an article in last Friday's Washington Post that referred to the issues that the Congress should be deliberating. I found it excellent reading, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

[See exhibit 1.]

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, some of us would like to think that our statements on this issue are profound and that they will be forever remembered. They are wrong. This controversy will go on and on and our arguments will be repeated over and over by others. I only hope that this issue will never be allowed to frustrate the ability of Congress to do its job.

Thank you, Mr. President.

JUDY MANN: ABORTION

The antiabortion bill that the Senate is now considering—and which President Reagan suddenly has started pushing—is a splendid illustration of how the right wing uses abortion as an organizing issue yet misses the point on ways to reduce abortions.

While permanently banning the use of federal funds for most abortions, the Helms "Human Life" bill asserts that the Supreme Court erred in its 1973 decision legalizing abortion, and declares that life begins at the moment of conception. . . .

Abortions didn't suddenly come into being with the 1973 Supreme Court decision, and most even now are not paid for with federal funds. There were 600,000 legal abortions in 1972, when women could get them for reasons of mental and physical wellbeing. There were between 1.2 million and 1.3 million legal abortions in 1981. Where was the outraged right-wing in 1972?

Abortion is a private matter that ought to be left between a woman and her physician. It is not the president's business and it is not the business of the overwhelmingly male Congress to legislate guilt trips onto American women.

Having said that, it is important to note that Americans are ambivalent about abortion, and if Congress and the president were genuinely concerned about reducing the widespread use of it—instead of playing politics with it—they would probably find a good deal of support. According to the Gallup polls, only 25 percent of the public supports legalized abortion under all circumstances; 53 percent believe it should be legal only under certain circumstances. A Yankelovich survey found that while 70 percent of the women support abortion on demand, 56 percent of them believe abortion to be morally wrong. But surveys have found little support for the legislative sledgehammers Congress has been considering.

Its approach has been wrong. The same Congress and the same administration that are so concerned about abortion allocated the grand sum of $16 million in 1981 for federal research on contraceptive development. It spent a paltry $7.3 million for evaluation of the safety and efficacy of contraceptives. It spent $79.1 million on research into the reproductive processes. The total federal support for population research in 1981 was $151.4 million. That is roughly $50 million less than the cost of one B-1 bomber.

Money is just part of the problem, says Dr. Gabriel Bialy, head of research for the Center for Population Research. "Rather than investing our resources into fighting changes in abortion laws, maybe it's incumbent on our part to do a better job of selling the contraceptive methods now available.

"One could liken abortion to chemotherapy: necessary but drastic. Currently what people working in the cancer area are focusing on is not just the development of drugs that will inhibit tumor growth but they are looking at those factors that may contribute to the growth of cancer."
